Since his May 16 message, the President has already asked for additional money on two occasions. It was pointed out at the time of that message that his first request was hardly sufficient to begin the defense program he vaguely outlined. It can be pointed out now that he still has no more than made a beginning toward fulfilling our needs.

In this emergency the President certainly has no cause to fear Congress, or the people. We are certainly as anxious as he to make our defenses invulnerable, and we are ready and willing to pay for them no matter what the cost. But the people want to know, and they have the right to know, that the money is earmarked for specific purposes, and that it is actually buying full value in security. With no reflection on the administration whatsoever, the people can have this information and assurance only with Congress on the job. The President's reference to a prolonged session of Congress as nothing more than an extended opportunity for Members to make political speeches is not only politics in the Roosevelt manner, but it is grossly inaccurate and unfair, and a reflection upon the integrity and patriotism of the people's Representatives.

The Members of Congress are elected by the people, and assume responsibilities fully as important as those placed upon the President. The people not only have the right to expect their representatives to remain on the job, but it is the constitutional duty of Congress to discharge these responsibilities. It should be remembered that Congress is still an independent branch of the Government, accountable not to the President, but to the people.

The American people are solidly united in the desire to render every possible assistance to the Allies, short of sending armed forces into the war. But this fact alone should not lead the administration to ask this country to accept the President's course blindly, without question or examination. The people should be shown clearly the course the President is charting. They should understand the devices by which he is acting along this course. And above all, they should fully realize the inevitable consequences to which this course is leading us. Here again is a job for Congress, and to evade it is further to abdicate responsibilities to the country.

The people must be made to realize that the administration has already taken acts of actual hostility, such as the trade-in method of sending planes to the Allies. By this simple device of ostensibly turning over surplus supplies, or outmoded equipment to manufacturers for credits on future orders of new armaments, the Government appears to avoid direct sales to the Allies, which is admittedly an act of war. The people will realize that the trade-in system is the sheerest kind of subterfuge when they stop to think that the purpose is not at all to strengthen our own defenses.

It should be made perfectly clear to the country, also, that the administration deliberately moved to keep early information of the trade-in system from the people by forcing an extraordinary 3-day recess of the Senate exactly at the time when the plan was ready for adoption. Thus the plan was rushed into operation without study and approval of Congress, despite the fact that Congress alone has the authority under our Constitution to authorize hostile action against another nation.

Even with Congress in session, therefore, the Executive has committed us to a definite course of hostility without consulting the people's representatives. If this happens now, the people should properly wonder what might follow if Congress is sent to the side lines with no possible check at any point upon the administration.

There is definitely a right, honest, American way of committing hostile acts, as opposed to the evasions and deceptions of undeclared warfare as the totalitarian nations wage it. If we are to go into an actual state of hostility in our support of the Allies, the people will prefer that we do it at least in the American manner rather than to adopt the devious practices of the very dictators against whom we are pitting ourselves. We should certainly avoid the patent subterfuge of the trade-in plan, by which we can hope to fool nobody but ourselves for a short time. If we want to violate international law by selling war supplies to the Allies, let us at least do it frankly and directly.

The American people deserve the fullest and most complete account of developments in this serious crisis. They deserve to know exactly what course we shall pursue, and exactly where that course will lead us, so that they may be fully prepared for the inevitable consequences. Again, the only assurance that the people will have full access to this information is that their representatives stay on the job. The only assurance that the national will may be obeyed is that Congress remain ready to express it as our course develops.

If what we have seen to date is the administration's idea of teamwork, the people must insist that Congress stay on the field through the emergency. This certainly is no time for half of the team to be sitting on the bench.

An Appeal to Secretary Wallace in Behalf of Sugarcane

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. LEONARD ALLEN

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

LETTER OF HON. A. LEONARD ALLEN, OF LOUISIANA, TO THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I have worked in close harmony with the sugarcane growers of Louisiana and I have constantly sought to help them. I have supported them fully in all matters of sugar legislation and I have many letters from them expressing appreciation of my services and cooperation. Although the President blocked our efforts to secure a larger sugar quota, I feel that every acre in cane should be carefully harvested in the present national emergency, and I am, therefore, making another appeal to the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, to stop plowing up cane. I attach hereto a copy of my appeal to Secretary Wallace:

JUNE 11, 1940.

HON. HENRY A. WALLACE,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In the midst of our national-defense plans I again desire to bring to your attention the question of the sugar situation. All nations are necessarily having to give attention to supplies of food. The European nations at this time are carefully rationing food for their armies and for their civilian populations.

Mr. Secretary, I pray that we may not become involved in the war, but the spirit of America today is to be fully prepared in all of the essentials of war. I know that you are a part of that spirit and I am sure that it is your desire that agriculture shall contribute its part in our defense plans.

In Louisiana today we have a growing crop of sugarcane which was planted in the best of faith last fall when quota restrictions were suspended by the President. Under regulations which you have issued, I am informed that it will be necessary to plow up a considerable portion of the growing crop on which all of the expenses of planting and cultivation have already been incurred. I have never felt that it was wise to destroy any foodstuff which had been produced. But it is certainly most unwise during this emergency to do that. A portion of the crop has been plowed up, but let us save the balance.

I am informed that the freezes which occurred in January and February seriously affected the crop in Louisiana and that the yield per acre will be lower than it has been in some years past. It was first estimated that as much as 50,000 acres would have to be plowed up as a result of your regulation, but in view of the freeze damage the actual destruction of sound growing cane will probably be between 30,000 and 40,000 acres, I am informed. Assuming that the yield will be 1½ tons of sugar per acre, this will amount to destruction of 45,000 to 60,000 tons of food, on which all farming expenditures have been made except harvesting. As the United States consumes something over 500,000 tons of sugar each month, this may seem a very small amount, and yet it would become very important if war should come. Seventy percent of our sugar is brought from islands separated from the mainland. Hawaii contributes 938,000 tons and is 2,408 miles from the nearest port; Puerto Rico contributes 798,000 tons and is 1,112 miles from the nearest port; the Philippine Islands contribute 980,000 tons and are 7,164 miles from the nearest port. We hope, Mr. Secretary, that our commercial lanes to these islands will always remain open, but it is certainly within the realm of possibility that the sugar which we have been receiving from these islands might be suddenly cut off in the event of war. Certainly our chances of receiving that from the Philippine Islands would be greatly lessened. Even today we are voting a tax bill of billions of dollars for national defense, and it does seem to me to be wise to guard against every possibility of a food shortage. Even though 40,000 to 60,000 tons of sugar would last the United States only 3 or 4 days, it is just that much preparedness against a sugar shortage. Of course, I would like to see the quota removed entirely, but the thing that I am asking for in this message is the right to be given to the sugarcane growers of Louisiana to harvest a growing crop.

Mr. Secretary, as I interpret the Sugar Act of 1937, you have broad discretionary powers which permit you to estimate the number of acres which will be required to produce in any area the amount of sugar needed and to provide a normal carry-over at the end of the year. The law permits you to allow all of the sugarcane grown in Louisiana today to be harvested and made into sugar. No legislation is necessary to accomplish that.

I appeal to you to amend your regulations in view of the national emergency which has been brought about by war developments, and which is being recognized by the national administration and by Congress, through tremendous appropriations of money and a vast program of national defense. I think that it would not be inconsistent with your general policy, under the Sugar Act, but it would be consistent with the national policy of preparedness to give the southern cane growers the right to harvest all of the cane which they have planted. I think that you will find it possible under the broad administrative powers granted you to avoid this destruction of sugarcane in Louisiana. I therefore, Mr. Secretary, make this very earnest plea as a matter of national defense. I pray God that it may not happen, but in this mad world now who knows but what every pound of sugar might become very precious within the not far-distant future? Who knows but what the able-bodied young men, now giving their time to the production of sugar, may all too soon have to give their time to the defense of our Nation? Therefore, Mr. Secretary, it seems to me that we ought not to destroy any product at all which we have that might add so much to our vital national defense program. I sincerely trust that you will weigh this matter most carefully in the light of grave developments of the past few days. I would appreciate receiving word that you will take affirmative action right away so that no more cane will be plowed up.

Very sincerely yours,

A. LEONARD ALLEN,
Member of Congress.

Immediate Aid to the Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

RESOLUTIONS URGING IMMEDIATE AID, INCLUDING ARMS AND MUNITIONS OF WAR, TO THE ALLIES, BY THE KEESLER-HAMRICK-GILLESPIE POST NO. 29, AMERICAN LEGION, GREENWOOD, MISS.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions, prepared by a committee composed of A. H. Bell, J. T. Thomas, Jr., Earle Equen, Tom Flowers, and A. B. Carothers, and unanimously adopted by the Keesler-Hamrick-Gillespie Post, No. 29, American Legion, Greenwood, Miss., on June 6, 1940, urging immediate aid, including arms and munitions, to the Allies:

Whereas one of the fundamental purposes of the American Legion is to perpetuate and foster the democratic ideals of government that have been maintained by the United States of America during the entire period of its existence, for the promotion of which many sacrifices have been made and for the protection of which the members of this organization, as well as many other loyal citizens of our country, joined with England, France, and the other Allied Governments in the World War; and

Whereas the same forces which menaced the peace of the world in the years 1914 to 1918 have again risen in more barbaric and monstrous form, threatening to crush the civilization, not only of Europe but of the entire world, and since there is such a strong tie between the citizens of the United States and of England and France, not only by reason of former relationships as defenders of peace, but of similarity in forms of government and ideas of peace, it is impossible for this organization to remain inactive and silent while those countries are resisting to a bitter death the preservation of civil liberties, which, if maintained, will greatly benefit us; and

Whereas we believe if our former Allies lose this great world struggle, it will be necessary ultimately for us to fight the same forces that now oppose them, and without their aid; and

Whereas, in making such sacrifices, not only for their benefit, but for the entire civilized world, they should be assured not only of our sympathy, our admiration for their bravery and courage, but that every possible aid should be rendered them immediately by our Federal Government before it is too late, the kind of aid to be determined by those in national authority, but some substantial aid without delay: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Kessler-Hamrick-Gillespie Post, No. 29, of the American Legion, Greenwood, Miss.:

SECTION 1. That this post of the American Legion definitely affirms its loyalty to the cause of good government which our former Allies are now so courageously defending, and that we condemn with all possible vigor the ferocious, monstrous, and barbaric attempts by Germany to destroy modern civilization, and decry its ruthless practice of destroying human lives.

SEC. 2. That we dedicate whatever resources we may have for their immediate aid and defense and express our unwillingness to sit idly by with a surplus of food and an inexhaustible supply of metals and ammunition that can be used by them in defending and establishing the peace of the world.

SEC. 3. That we pledge our cooperation to the United States Government and to our President and not only endorse his statement to Congress that we give the Allies first call upon anything or material we can produce but that we go further and urge that every weapon we possess which is not indispensable to preserve law and order within our own boundaries and not necessary for our immediate defense be made available to them, and that such other aid as in the wisdom of Congress, such as giving credit, furnishing food, medical supplies, and money, be extended and, if necessary, delivered.

SEC. 4. That our services be offered to crush the so-called "fifth column" in this country, as well as to stamp out all non-American, un-American, and disloyal persons and practices that may exist.

SEC. 5. That this resolution be published as an expression of this post not only as a means of promoting immediate aid to the Allies but of guaranteeing to those loyal Americans who did not return from the World War that the torch is still held high and that they are not forgotten even though a greater battle wages in Flanders Field.

Patriotism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT E. AUSTIN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ALBERT E. AUSTIN, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to include therein an address by me on the occasion of the annual Flag Day Service of the Bridgeport Federation of Men's Bible Classes, on Sunday, June 9, 1940, at Bridgeport, Conn., as follows:

On this morning in June in the year of our Lord 1940, as we in America still mark time, the Bridgeport Federation of Men's Bible Classes is assembled here for the annual Flag Day Service. You have honored me with an invitation to address you on this occasion and I can think of no fitter subject today than Patriotism, a name given to an abstract state of mind, once universally possessed by all men and cherished. But the catastrophic storm of madness that descended last September upon Europe, threatening a civilization built up through the centuries, has changed our concepts of many things and the mean of patriotism is included among them. So rapid is the whirl of events that once a change is made it does not last until tomorrow. A Stalin came with his Communism, and a Hitler came with his Nazi-ism. It did not seem possible that these two clouds on the horizon could so grow that they would obscure the bright light of the sun and threaten a world of individual freedom and independence with the blackness of everlasting night. They would change entirely our carefully built up philosophy of government and forcibly drag us back through countless generations to that period when the citizen existed for, and at the will of, the state. Should they succeed would patriotism still exist? How could it exist in a people ruled by a ruthless despot, guided by his principle that might makes right? Can patriotism exist where human life is cheap and disregarded, where the finer things of man's existence are forgotten, where the visible triumphs of master minds in stone and bronze are pulverized into dust that conquering hordes may pass unhampered on their way? Can it exist in a people whose rules have raised false gods in place of the one God, the almighty and all-knowing Father of men? No, it cannot, for nationalism is not patriotism, and what we are witnessing abroad is nationalism extreme and at its worst. Patriotism belongs to a free and independent people. We have it here, and shall have it and will have it, please God, to the very end. So the patriotism we are to discuss this morning is the patriotism of America and Americans.

Patriotism has been defined as "love of country." That country, of course, must be worthy of love, must be dedicated to truth and honor, must be inspired to high destiny, must guarantee to its citizens their right to live their lives, with ideals, in liberty and independence, must enjoy the respect of sister nations and live with them in peace and fine understanding. Our country, the United States of America, meets every such challenge, and in so doing has won the love of its people, and all of its people from whatever nation they may have come here to live with us and to be of us—Americans all. This patriotism has inspired us in peace and war; the signers of the Declaration of Independence had it in their courageous hearts, the statesmen of early and later days were, because of it, capable of wise and constructive action, it guided Washington and Lincoln in their dark and trying hours; it kept alive the flickering flame of devotion at Valley Forge, it sailed the seas with our sailors in 1812, and sent a victorious army across the sea in '17 when once before the very existence of other democratic nations was threatened. All down through the history of our country patriotism has shown itself in deeds, not words, not in a lip service that was stilled when the crisis arose, not in showy waving of the flag and vain boasting when action was demanded—has shown itself in many a man, unheralded and unsung, when the odds were against him but who carried on to feed and clothe a family, proud to do his part even in a humble way to make his children better able than he to do for their country. "Sweet and fitting it is to die for one's country" wrote Virgil the Immortal, but just as much so is it to live for one's country.

American patriotism is not so difficult to analyze or to define. It is a belief, a subscription to principles, a defense against aggression, a theory of conduct, a method of living, an abiding faith in our country's destiny. It is a belief that the founders of our Republic were men divinely inspired when for instance they wrote in their Declaration of Independence that "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed, by their Creator, with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Or when they wrote in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States of America, "We, the People of the United States, in order to make a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." Consequently our patriotism is a belief in our constitutional form of government, a belief that carries with it an unalterable determination that no one man and no group of men shall ever change it, but that it shall be changed only by a vote of the people who have sworn to sustain it and who only can change it. Our patriotism is a belief, too, that the state is a creature of the people and that it never will be that the people exist for the state. The first is freedom, the second bondage. Our patriotism subscribes without reservation to the principles laid down in our Bill of Rights and in the defense of these principles pledges its life and its sacred honor.

In our flag there are 48 stars on a field of blue, no one larger than the others, all of equal size and shape. Patriotism interprets this as indicating the sovereignty of each State which cannot and shall not be transgressed. And this does not mean only by usurpation by a central government of a State's rights and prerogatives—it means by another State or group of States. Patriotism demands also a certain course of conduct. Every patriotic citizen must exercise his right of suffrage, thus participating in the responsibilities of government. The danger in the representative form of government lies in any apathy of the electorate which may be, and often is, seized upon by unscrupulous men to gain their selfish ends. Then comes the complaint from the previously apathetic that all elected officials are more or less dishonest, actuated only by political expediency, are mere self-seekers. There are such men it must be said, and this can happen in our elective system, but oftentimes sooner or later even these men respond to the inspiration of high office. Patriotism does not agree that a citizen's full duty has been performed for our country by the fulfillment of merely perfunctory duties. A receipted income-tax bill does not discharge him from all other obligations. One takes much from his country—patriotism gives more than it takes; it gives gladly and willingly, from first to last, and looks upon the giving as a privilege of citizenship and not a duty. In this are exhibited some of the traditions which have come down through the life of our Republic—of devoted effort, of toil, of sacrifice, of privation—that the young Nation might grow and prosper and, when grown, be strong and mighty, an inspiration to other and older nations that maybe had lost the light. Patriotism is an abiding faith in our country's high destiny, requiring a sublime confidence in the divinity of her mission. In spite of doubts that may arise, in spite of fears that she may fail, even in the presence of what appears a certain defeat—valiantly patriotism proclaims its faith, "My country, may she be always right—but right or wrong, my country," and in that faith she shall survive.

"But," someone says, "even you admitted when you began that in the madness of this maddened world concepts change overnight. Is patriotism the same today?" My answer is certainly "yes," for fundamentals never change, only the application of them. We must use our patriotism, which is the sacred possession of the American people, as a broad base and make specific manifestations in the unusual situations now created or about to be created through no acts of our own. We must first of all look facts in the face, size up the situation, realizing all the while that a job has to be done, and that job is to keep our United States a free and independent Republic presenting an unyielding front against any attack from without or from within. We know we have grown soft; that we have been living lives of comparative ease and security, even though it did not always seem so. We have put away from us any thought that at some time we should have to meet the harsher and the sterner things. In this job to be done our patriotism shows, and each one of us accepts the duty laid upon us whether we are to lead or be led, whether our rank is to be high or low. Unity, as an appeal, has been overworked, but I use it again in the sense of cooperation, each one doing his assigned task that the whole may be perfect. Now our present-day patriotism prepares us for sacrifice, and, when one is made, to prepare us for another. It makes us ready to endure even to the utmost of endurance and rejoice in our strength and will and purpose so to do. A situation confronts us, not of our making, a situation serious and menacing. Our country has had them before, perhaps of lesser magnitude. So sudden was its appearance and so horrifying its application that in the first moments many of us were appalled. But now that we have had an opportunity to think the thing through, now once again we are patriots. Our patriotism specifically applied steels us for action, makes calm and sober judgment guide our deliberations and decisions, throws panic and hysteria away, and with them any fear as to the outcome. It gives us a sublime confidence in our country and in our people. Without this any billions we might spend for defense may be of little avail. But our patriotism and the fearlessness and confidence it engenders will strengthen the arms that may wield the mighty weapons if we ever need them to defend this country. Defend I say, for if war ever happens it will come to us, for we shall not go to it. For this purpose we shall arm, we shall prepare, just as speedily as the flying wheels of industry can obey the command of the vast army that we call labor, our army in the shops and factories as essential in an hour of need as is the one of soldiers and sailors in the field. With an unfaltering trust in the God of our fathers, and with that patriotism that inspired them, and now inspires us, our country will not be found wanting. Our softness will disappear in rugged strength, our days of ease will change to days of harsh endurance, our purpose will be as unshaken as are our mountains. In any days of darkness that may come we shall look forward to the everlasting light, our faith in the ultimate triumph of right shall be as our faith in the Almighty. Thus shall we show our patriotism, our love of country, our Americanism.

The Enemies Within the Gates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN A. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE ROXBURY (N. Y.) TIMES

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Roxbury (N. Y.) Times of June 8, 1940:

[From the Roxbury (N. Y.) Times of June 8, 1940]

THE ENEMIES WITHIN THE GATES

Events in Europe have underlined and emphasized the urgent need for improving and expanding our national defenses, and making sure that the United States, its shores, and its traditional ways of life are rendered secure.

To do this most effectively our military experts are, of course, studying very closely the methods of the "total war" that has overrun so many helpless countries abroad—the modern form of war that, as one observer has commented, is fought "with the morals of the cave and the weapons of an exquisite civilization."

You need to know the danger that faces your country before you can guard against it successfully.

But there is one further step. The manner in which Norway and Poland and Belgium have been brought to their knees was not exclusively based upon military power. Before a blow was struck, security was undermined from within. The advice of Goethe "divide and command" was heeded with telling and destructive effect. The "fifth column" of traitors and imported agents did their destructive work before war even began.

To achieve this aim, certain principles need to be kept in mind:

(1) We must guard—not in a mood of hysteria, but through sound common sense—against the misguided groups and individuals in our own country who do not believe in private enterprise, and would sacrifice it for some other way of life. It is they who, by word or deed, would fill the role of "fifth columnists" in America if the opportunity were ever offered.

(2) We must not let the erroneous thinking of a second group muddle our thoughts on preparedness. This group does not recognize the inseparability of our various freedoms—freedom of speech, a government of representative democracy, and a business system of private enterprise—and its failure to appreciate this important truth is likely to be actually as dangerous as the attitude of the deliberate enemies of our way of life.

(3) We need, at a time when industrial efficiency is so vital to national defense, to guard against attempts to cripple and hobble our manufacturing enterprises. The La Follette bill recently introduced in Congress, a piece of legislation that would prevent manufacturers from guarding effectively against sabotage and subversive activities within America's plants, is a dangerous example of this type.

With these principles in mind, and with the courageous maintenance of national unity and individual patriotism, America can guard against the "enemies within the gates." Without this stand, America invites disaster.

The Legion Called the Turn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM NATIONAL LEGIONNAIRE

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the National Legionnaire, by National Commander Raymond J. Kelly, entitled "The Legion Called the Turn," on the subject of the hysteria which now seems to be in existence in the country, and on the subject of keeping the country out of war.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Legionnaire for June 1940]

THE LEGION CALLED THE TURN

(By Raymond J. Kelly, National Commander)

The American Legion has a reassuring word for those among our fellow countrymen who during recent days have developed a definite hysteria, which if allowed to go unchecked, might derange the national mind.

The Legion presumes to speak with some degree of authority, because consistently in the past it called the turn and pointed the way of sanity for handling many of the problems now confronting the United States.

For 20 long years the Legion raised its voice to the highest pitch in the effort to arouse the Nation to the need for an adequate national defense. Few listened.

Since 1922 the Legion has had a definite program looking toward universal service. In the event this country again became involved in war our plan would deprofitize such a conflict, leaving special privilege for none, equal service for all. Few paid attention.

Knowledge of the existence of subversive influences, apparently just now penetrating the public consciousness under the modern description of "fifth column," is neither new nor novel to the Legion. Few were aroused to the danger.

The definite complacence of America in a world rapidly becoming an armed camp with high explosive potentialities has been reported by the Legion for many years. Few heeded the warning.

And so the Legion believes it is qualified from its record of service both in time of war and in 21 years of peace to counsel soberly and rationally the men and women of America.

In my belief the most menacing factor to the safety of the United States arises from within our borders rather than without. Our house must be set in order. But the neglect of years cannot be corrected in a few short minutes, hours, and days. What must be done we will do—if a determined and united America sets its will to the task.

In the first place, we should face the fact that Communazi conspirators seeking to undermine and to destroy our institutions are fanatics. The truth as we know it is not in them. Reasonable treatment has no effect upon them, and but serves to embolden and encourage their efforts.

We have been told that far-reaching suppressive measures against flourishing domestic ideological conspiracies might injure innocent people. In my belief the good of the whole Nation compels summary action to be taken by our properly constituted Federal, State, and local authorities to stamp out in their entirety the activities of these subverters, irrespective of what may happen to their fellow travelers or innocent bystanders. This is no time for quibbling. We must pull no punches.

In my public utterances I have stressed the importance of American Legion organizations assisting and working through recognized law-enforcement agencies. I see no reason for deviation from that policy at this time. Only rarely when there is complete collapse of recognized law-enforcement agencies, such as may happen in times of great disaster, is it our job to do what we can independently.

In recent years many of our Legion posts have prepared disaster-relief plans to become effective at the onset of such catastrophes. In other words, the machinery of Legion support for law and order is already set up with a fair degree of efficiency. And those posts without prepared plans of this kind now must form them immediately. Such plans should be integrated with existing authority in every community where there is a Legion post.

Legion support in the field should be given the attempt to secure increases and strengthening of constituted police powers. Regardless of the cost, and even if requiring new local taxes, the personnel of local police, sheriff's forces, and State police or highway-patrol organizations should be measurably increased. Better training and equipment should be provided. We should make our regular peacetime home defenses impregnable. The Legion should head up public demand for this to be done.

State departments of the Legion can well initiate and urge the adoption of State emergency council set-ups. In several States this has been done already.

National Legion officials are engaged now in conferences and discussions with the Federal Government looking toward utilization of Legion organization and membership in the most effective manner possible in event of any conceivable emergency developing. Such perfected plans will be ready for immediate use when conditions warrant their invoking.

Posts and members of the American Legion are well informed of local conditions. Information in their possession about dangerous subversion, which can be substantiated, should be turned over through official post channels to the proper authorities.

Good, law-abiding American men and women who enjoy and cherish their civil liberties do not follow the policy of shouting about them. In many cases those who clamor the loudest about the dangers of losing such liberties bear the most watching. All too frequently they fear the loss of their opportunity to work for the destruction of our form of government. There are no less than 600 Communazi organizations functioning in the United States. Many of these are Trojan horse front groups. Information about many of these subversive groups is available to posts through department and national headquarters.

Our posts and their membership should give the strongest support possible to the solving of complex problems now before the Nation in providing for a modern and adequate national defense.

For two decades our national defense lagged. We have been a complacent people. Only last week the first new United States battleship in 19 years was launched. We must appreciate that the hurried building up of such defenses may not make for the most efficient job possible. Errors will be made, and the ball will be fumbled. But the characteristic of a great pitcher is that he pitches over his errors and goes on to win. I am confident we are a Nation of thoroughbreds, not to be upset or deterred from our purpose by such mistakes.

There is no change in the official position of the American Legion in regard to the neutrality of the United States. The Legion believes in the protection at all hazards of the free peoples of the Western Hemisphere as our primary obligation. While we are ill-equipped to provide even a minimum of protection for the Monroe Doctrine, it is idle to consider the feasibility of intervening in the great conflict across the Atlantic. With what would we intervene? How would we make our potential strength felt, short of 2 or 3 years? Fast moving, aggressor nations have no intention of allowing us to select our own time and place for exerting the might of a rearmed America.

The safety of America transcends any political issue. And such safety should not be subjected to the fear developed through hysteria.

At the 1939 Chicago national convention of the American Legion we were recorded as urging the Congress to remain in session during the period of emergency. I believe there is every legitimate reason for our Representatives and Senators staying on the job in the Nation's Capital so long as national and international problems continue on a 24-hour basis. One million Legionnaires should raise their united voice in such a demand.

In the twenty-first year of the American Legion's existence, the Nation again calls. It is not a call to the armed forces of our country where once we served. Rather it is a call to develop sanity to supersede hysteria; to remove all doubt about the strength of our defenses; to have each of us individually willing to bear the heavy price of defense which must be paid to assure peace for our people. Midsummer madness, no! It's a blue chip game and we must play them close and play them to win.

For 20 years the Legion called the turn. It is confident its judgment for the future will likewise coincide with the safety and well-being for our country.

For God and country we have associated ourselves. We pledge again our loyalty to that creed.

Military and Naval Expenditures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. H. SCHWARTZ

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, immediately following the editorial placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an extract from a radio address delivered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] on May 28, 1940, in reference to present and past military and naval expenditures.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There has been much said in the public press and over the radio about the present condition of the defenses of the United States. In my judgment, there has been gross exaggeration of our alleged deficiency. There has been gross underestimation of our defensive power. It is commonly charged that during the past 10 years we have expended $7,000,000,000 on defense, and the question is asked, Why has this not prepared us? A recent newspaper article which, judging by my mail, has had large circulation in effect charges that this $7,000,000,000 has been spent and has done no good. It has been so stated in recent radio speeches. I cannot take the time tonight to give you the whole picture. I can speak briefly of our first line of defense—the Navy.

Out of this $7,000,000,000, approximately four and one-half billion has been expended for the Navy. If those who make these wild charges had made any investigation whatsoever they would have discovered that approximately three billion of this four and one-half billion was the regular maintenance and upkeep money—wages, coal, fuel oil, etc.—appropriated in part each year for the regular expense of the Navy. One and one-half billion, in round figures, was for new construction. During the 10-year period just closed this money has been used for the purpose of increasing the number and power of our ships.

We have added a grand total of 138 ships to our Navy consisting of 4 aircraft carriers, 18 heavy cruisers, 9 light cruisers, 73 destroyers, 32 submarines, and 2 gunboats. In addition thereto, 7 auxiliary naval vessels, repair ships, etc., and in further addition thereto, two 35,000-ton battleships which will be completed and commissioned next month. In addition to this, there are 8 battleships under construction, including two 45,000-ton ships, 1 aircraft carrier, 6 light cruisers, 24 destroyers, 13 submarines, 12 auxiliary vessels, and others sufficient to make a grand total under construction of 77.

According to the latest figures available, the United States has a total of 369 ships in its Navy with 77 building. Great Britain has 328 with 81 building, France has 176 with 65 building, Italy has 315 with 55 building, Japan 254 with 22 building. The German Navy is weak. We have more battleships than any other nation in the world. We have more heavy cruisers than any nation in the world. We have more destroyers than any nation in the world. Let us not reach the conclusion either that our money has been wasted or that we are weak in sea power.

Americanism and Immigration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK MIRROR OF JULY 2, 1939

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I received from a gentleman in New York City dated July 2, 1939, in which letter was enclosed an article clipped from the Sunday Mirror of July 2, 1939, entitled, "Test Shows Many Afraid to Display Americanism Sign." I ask that the article be printed along with the letter. I have purposely omitted the name of the author of the letter, in view of the fact that I have not secured his consent to publish his name. Anyway the article from the Sunday Mirror speaks for itself.

There being no objection, the letter and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, July 2, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR REYNOLDS: The attached news story from today's Mirror discloses that a Los Angeles manufacturer attempted, without success, to give away 20,000 Americanism signs reading, "No 'ism' but Americanism," and succeeded in disposing of 2 signs in all New York City. This incident only proves how right you really are in your drive to educate the people to your program, which stands against all "isms" and for Americanism.

The incident also proves above the slightest doubt that your bill to stop immigration in the interest of national defense is 100 percent right. Keep up the work, and remember that there are many patriotic Americans here in Manhattan who haven't surrendered the fort nor hoisted the white flag, even though most of our business people, big and small, are "under the bed."

May God bless you and may you keep fighting for America.

Yours very sincerely.

[From the New York Sunday Mirror of July 2, 1939]

TEST SHOWS MANY AFRAID TO DISPLAY AMERICANISM SIGN

The insidious cross-currents of communism, nazi-ism, and fascism have become so threatening in New York City that thousands of Americans living here—particularly some businessmen—no longer dare proclaim their loyalty to the United States.

This has been revealed by the curious results of a survey just completed.

A Los Angeles manufacturer put out a small metal plate, suitable for display in store windows or on automobiles, which he thought would find a ready market in the various cities of the Nation. The sign reads: "No 'ism' but Americanism."

Frankly, his only thought in the beginning was to make money—a desire not unknown to the best American traditions. He figured that with so many aliens preaching hatred and alien doctrines, Americans would welcome a chance to proclaim their Americanism. He asked only 25 cents a plate and had fond hopes of returns from his enterprise and ingenuity.

His agents—they were often World War veterans working on commission—did pretty well in Los Angeles and other western and midcountry cities. But in New York City they sold none at all, a fact most interesting because of the amazing experiences which the veterans declared they encountered in their canvassing.

ASK FOR TEST

Two representatives of George Hope, the Los Angeles manufacturer, asked the Mirror to test the findings of the veterans.

They said that they, along with Hope, were Americans and were curious to know how New York stands in view of what is threatening the world.

"If you agree, Hope is willing to give away 20,000 signs in New York City without asking a single cent for them," they told the Mirror.

So a reporter was assigned, and he started out with the two representatives, Charles Jordan, 36, of 2190 East Twenty-first Street, Brooklyn, and James McDonald, 30, of Los Angeles.

A fairly representative area was selected for the test. Roughly, it covered Broadway between Sixtieth and Eighty-sixth Streets, Ninth Avenue between Forty-second and Fifty-seventh Streets, Fifty-seventh Street from Ninth Avenue to Third Avenue, Third Avenue between Fifty-seventh and Fourteenth Streets, all of Yorkville, and some outlying spots, such as Weehawken and other New Jersey points.

In that entire area only one storekeeper and a taxicab driver were willing to accept the signs, even though repeatedly assured there was absolutely no charge.

But the startling thing was the behavior and comment of businessmen approached. Not only did they refuse to accept the signs; many seemed actually frightened.

WOULD HURT TRADE

Here were some of their typical reasons for refusing the plates:

"If I were to place one of those signs in my window, my place would be picketed."

"It would hurt my business."

"Regardless of personal feelings, we're in business and can't afford to offend anybody."

"They'd blow my tires" (this from a cab driver asked to display the sign in his car).

"I don't want them to smash my windows. We do business with all nationalities."

As expected, the visitors met the most hostile reception in Yorkville, where some of the storekeepers threatened to "throw you fellows out if you don't leave quick."

One of the two who accepted the metal plates was Frank Weitz, of 2105 Mohican Avenue, a taxi driver with a stand at Eighty-sixth Street and Third Avenue.

"I'm glad to display the sign on my car, provided it doesn't cost me anything," he said.

A plate was accepted also by the American Legion Post, No. 1197, Private Chauffeurs of New York, at 1209 Second Avenue.

"We'd like to see anybody boycott us," said Commander Harry J. Rich.

The Next President and the National Budget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY GEN. CHARLES G. DAWES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an address delivered by Gen. Charles G. Dawes, former Vice President of the United States, on the subject, The Next President and the National Budget, before the Twenty-eighth Annual Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Washington, D. C., April 30, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In properly fulfilling his functions as the head of the business organization of Government, and in undertaking his most important task of balancing the National Budget, the next President of the United States had best follow the only method whose effectiveness has been demonstrated by actual trial.

To explain and state this method is the purpose of this address.

In the year 1920, after 3 years of war-budget deficits amounting in the aggregate to $23,248,099,381, the United States, with war taxes still in effect, experienced a sudden and large fall in general prices, with corresponding losses in inventory values and an increase in unemployment.

A widespread public demand followed for reduction in Government expenditures and in the heavy taxation which was depressing business then, as our present rate of taxation is depressing it today.

In 1921 therefore, under the Harding administration, coincidentally with the institution of the Budget system, the President of the United States for the first time in our history created and operated by Executive order a system of Executive control and coordination over governmental departments and independent establishments. More Executive orders from the White House were issued in the first month after President Harding instituted this system than had been issued in the entire history of our Government up to that time. This control and coordinating system by Executive order was simply the system used in every successful private business enterprise.

Under this new system and Presidential leadership during the whole fiscal year of 1922, which commenced June 30, 1921, and ended June 30, 1922, the expenditures of Government, exclusive of debt reduction, were reduced from $5,115,927,689.50 in the fiscal year of 1921 to $3,372,607,899.84 in the fiscal year of 1922, or a reduction in expenditures of $1,743,319,789.46.

That part of the savings which was due to direct Executive pressure upon the spending authorities I estimate at $350,000,000, including $250,134,835 which, as the agent of the President and first Director of the Budget, I itemized and sent to Congress in response to a resolution calling for the figures.

Not only in the fiscal year of 1922 was the Budget balanced but the excess of ordinary Government receipts over ordinary Government expenditures was $736,496,251. Taxes were reduced and the Government debt was lowered by $1,014,068,845.

There was achieved by a President a complete victory in the desperate and underhanded fight made against the institution of an Executive and coordinating control system by the decentralized 43 departments and independent establishments of the United States. He not only established firmly a system regulating the business of Government in accordance with universally accepted business principles but demonstrated its effectiveness in his hands in reducing governmental expenditures.

This system was in operation for 11 years. On March 4, 1933, the present administration came into power, and only 3 months later, on June 10, 1933, an astonishing Executive order was issued by the President, abolishing the Federal Coordinating Service of the United States.

This Service, which had been set up under the Director of the Budget, was an essential part of the executive control system, without which there could be no proper supervision of corelated affairs of Government for the support of which money had been appropriated by Congress.

Since this coordinating system was simply the one which is in universal use in all successful private business enterprises, if the administration was not satisfied with its functioning, it should not have abolished the system but changed its personnel.

This unfortunate action taken at the inception of the most gigantic peacetime governmental spending operation in history was one of the chief causes of the present condition of chaos in the business system of our Government.

This action fulfilled the prediction I made in 1921 in my report, as the first Director of the Bureau of the Budget to the President, which was transmitted by him to Congress: "If in the future there should at any time come into office an Executive indifferent to the operation of the Government as a business machine, there would, under the immutable laws of human nature, immediately spring up an effort on the part of the independent departments and establishments at first to curtail and restrict the activities of the coordinating agencies and then to wipe them out of existence."

For nearly 7 years now, since June 10, 1933, the business of the Government has been carried on not only without a coordinating control over routine business but without a proper system of Executive control, as was the case before Harding's administration.

The next President, if he is to save the Nation from bankruptcy and its people from ruin, must make the old fight over again, and this battle will be waged under desperate disadvantages. Against him will be arrayed the largest, strongest, and most formidably entrenched army of interested Government spenders, wasters, and patronage-dispensing politicians which the world has known.

When an executive is determined to reorganize a private enterprise on its way to bankruptcy and in the same condition as that which now exists in Government business, it is absolutely and fundamentally necessary that he convince his organization that he is in deadly earnest and will stand no nonsense from spending department heads like those who are now riding horseback throughout the demoralized and uncoordinated business system of the United States Government.

If the President is a fighter and without qualification pledges himself in his conscience and before his people, and before Congress, to fight for a balanced Budget, he should not fail. But it is no time for weakness and political trimming. He must be made of stern stuff.

The 10 Departments of this Government, as well as its great number of independent establishments, have been under practically independent operation for the last 7 years. They have run like units in any army which has no general staff or commander in chief. Concerned only with the interest of their own departments their heads are armed against invaders of their domains from any outside source no matter how authoritative. It is not the rank and file of governmental employees of whom I am speaking here. The rank and file are not threatened with loss of independent power. It is the heads of the departments and establishments who are responsible. They are skilled in specious excuses. They use, albeit with great politeness, the damnable devices of bureaucratic procrastination; they sound aloud their sycophantic praises of any feared higher power, but they can be made into team players and brought into the proper recognition of the superior lien of the plans of the Nation over the plans of their department only by sheer force, intelligently, persistently, and vigorously applied by one man, the President of the United States.

The President will make a fatal mistake if he relies on the Cabinet as an effective agency for imposing pressure for economy upon the business organization. The Cabinet is the body which most needs watching and more than any other body must itself at times be subjected to the strongest overriding Executive pressure. While the President cannot successfully exercise this power over the business organization without a proper internal business system at his command, the system, if it is not the conduit for a stern, intelligent and continued Executive pressure, is useless. Once since the junking in 1933 of the coordinating and Executive control system established in 1921, the present administration took the first step toward creating an internal system, based on correct business principles.

Donald Richberg was given by the President, as his representative, coordinating powers and business precedence over the Cabinet heads. But this plan passed out without any effective functioning.

Before outlining the method which was followed in 1921 to reduce Government expenditures and balance the Budget, let us compare the conditions which confronted the Harding administration in its first year with those which will confront the next President at the beginning of his service.

1. The business of our Government—the largest business in the world—was in a disgraceful condition of disorganization and chaos. Thus it is today.

2. For 132 years up to that time the departments and independent establishments of Government had been completely decentralized. They are operating today also without a central coordinating control.

3. The Government then had no proper machinery such as exists in every properly organized business, public or private, for ascertaining intelligently the difference between what the departments of Government want to spend and what they properly can get along on. The Government today has no such machinery.

4. No impartial appraisal of the actual necessity of a department demand was made. The appraisals were in general made by the spenders themselves. This is the case today.

5. Whatever was the public attitude of the heads of the departments and independent establishments, their pressure was always exerted along lines which tended to increase governmental expenditure, to prevent coordination, to decentralize the business of the Government, to increase independent powers, to discourage all teamwork except that designed to increase expenditures or to keep out interlopers who maintained that money could be saved for the Government by the adoption of a proper business system. This is the case today.

6. The administrative heads of the departments were selected, as a rule, with less reference to their business qualifications than to their qualifications as advisers to the President along other lines than governmental business administration. At the inception of their appointment they were introduced to a business with which they were generally unfamiliar, and were compelled to rely largely upon the advice of subordinates who were wedded to the theory of the right of independent operation of a department. As a rule, they became the earnest advocates of departmental plans which their inexperience in departmental business prevented them from fully comprehending in all their aspects. Being held to no effective responsibility by the President to operate their departments along a unified governmental policy, they became, in general, only a shelter and protection for the independent operation of the departments. This is the case today.

7. The departments and independent establishments as individual units were, in many cases, suffering from internal bureaucratic control and lack of proper internal coordination, as would be the case in any private corporation having a succession of executives selected often for political and not business considerations. Especially was this true in departments whose operations involve technical and specialized problems. This is the case today.

8. The monstrosities of the uncoordinated business system arising out of conflicting objectives, the lack of perspective, the duplication of work by the different departments, the wickedly unnecessary waste, may or may not have been seen by them; but no head of a subordinate department of Government was willing to give up any portion of his personal power or his appropriations to assist in their removal. This is the case today.

9. After appropriations were made, no departments tried to save money by operating on less than their appropriations, nor was any effort made to compel them to do so. In a private corporation this would be ridiculous, if it were not tragic. Appropriations were regarded always as indicating the minimum of expenditure, not the maximum, as in private enterprise. This is the case today.

As I now outline the following measures, which in the present unparalleled confusion of governmental business affairs the next President might adopt to balance the Budget, it should be kept firmly in mind that the plan of procedure recommended is simply that actualy carried out successfully by the President of the United States in 1921. This procedure is as follows:

First: The President, by Executive order, must enable the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to create an organization which will empower the Director as its head to assemble for the use of the President the impartial information necesary for the President to make the decisions incident to business policy, and when a decision is made by him will enable the Director to impose obedience directly on the body of the governmental business organization, and see that it is carried out. A corps of impartial investigators, by detail under Executive order from their former departmental positions to permanent service in the Budget Office, must be made responsible to the President, through the Director of the Budget. In the long run the Director of the Budget must get his impartial information about Government business from men of long experience in actual governmental business administration. The old Federal central coordinating service, operating under a chief coordinator in the Budget Office, must be immediately restored.

Second: The President must make it a condition in appointing any man to his Cabinet that the latter pledge his honor to him and to the people of the United States specifically to support him in his plan to reduce governmental expenditures and balance the Budget. A similar solemn commitment should be made by each head of an independent spending department at the time he receives his appointment.

The Cabinet, unless their eyes are fixed on an axe hung on the cabinet wall by the President, who has notified them upon their appointment that the penalty for disloyalty to him in his effort to balance the Budget is decapitation, will be obsessed under the laws of human nature with the idea that there are vested rights in each of them not subject to veto by a coordinating business control which operates in terms of a government determined to balance its budget.

The stronger the Cabinet the Presidents selects, if this preliminary cooperation is not pledged, the more impossible will it be for his administration to succeed in its most important task.

Third: At an extremely important public meeting of the business organization of Government, at which, as its head, the President presides, called the first month of his term of office, there should be present his agent, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the members of the Cabinet, and the heads of the independent establishments (who over that part of the business of the Government transacted in the departments or establishments rank as would operating vice presidents in a private business corporation), and the chiefs of all the bureaus in the departments and establishments.

In presiding, the President will announce to the organization and to the country his Budget policy and serve notice that he has made the Director of the Budget his agent to transmit his orders in the operation of the Government's routine business under a proper business system and to see that they are executed. He must emphasize the powers of the Director as his agent to summon any officials, including Cabinet officers, for conference when necessary to enable him to enforce coordinating or other Executive orders.

At this public meeting the Bureau chiefs will be ordered to make within 30 days a report of what part each one can save of the unspent remainder of his current annual appropriation.

On June 23, 1921, at the first meeting ever held of the business organization of our Government, the bureau chiefs, at the request of the Director of the Budget, promised to the President a saving out of appropriations for the next fiscal year which began on June 30, 1921, only 7 days later, which promise they afterward itemized and fulfilled in the sum of $112,000,000.

Fourth: The fourth step, only to be taken during the first year of the administration, just as it was taken only during the first year of the creation of the system of executive control under Harding, is of commanding importance. The period immediately after the inauguration of the President on January 20, 1941, is crucial. With Government expenditures approximately $9,000,000,000 per year, he must attack them at once, and continually thereafter. The reduction in Government expenses for the first calendar year must be partially secured in the first 6 months during which the President will be the least equipped for the task. Unless he commandeers outside talent of the highest order, intelligently to assist in the task of applying effective pressure against the fortified inertia of departmental plans and prejudices during this period, the savings of his first calendar year will be unsatisfactory.

In 1921, 16 able business executives called by the President into the service of the Director of the Budget, at $1 per year, individually and separately went through the departments and establishments as investigators, and helped the Director of the Budget, and, through him, the President, in finding where the axe could be properly and effectively wielded on waste and extravagance.

The next President, to help him for his first year, must call in a larger number of such men than were called in 1921, for there are now in existence a larger number of departmental and independent establishments transacting an enormously greater volume of business.

For the President to make intelligent decisions in his first year as to where cuts in expenditure can be made it is absolutely necessary for him to have the help of investigators not under the control of the spending departments.

Considering the short time they have to do their work and the large scope of some of their investigations, these men may not find all existing administrative errors, but their temporary use is imperative. It is the only method by which there can be proper and impartial consideration given to the economy side of questions of expenditures during the first calendar year of the next administration. By the second year, the President and the Director of the Budget will have built up by Executive order a proper personnel from the body of the governmental business organization, detailed to service as investigators, or as members of the reestablished Federal coordinating boards, and responsible no longer to the department heads, but only to the President and his unifying system.

Proper business organization insures not an intermittent and outside control for economy and efficiency but a continuing and internal Executive control. Outside commission findings may occasionally stimulate efforts for economy and efficiency in routine functioning, but the permanent agency for the transmittal of Executive pressure upon the body of the business organization of government toward economy, which definitely fixes the responsibility for extravagance and failure, must be an internal one directly responsible to the President through the Director of the Budget.

Because under the English parliamentary system of government there is no chief executive, like our President, charged with responsibility for the routine administration of governmental business, it was necessary for Britain, after the Great War, to use the Geddes Committee, afterward called the "ax committee," to obtain information and formulate a repressive policy for dealing with the post-war financial crisis, which resembled that now confronting the United States. But this course is inadvisable in the United States. In fact, in 1931, 2 years before the present administration abolished our American Federal coordinating and control system, the Royal Commission on the Civil Service, acting upon the basis of a report made by me to the Prime Minister and Chancelor of the Exchequer and presented before the Commission by Sir Josiah Stamp, unanimously recommended to Parliament the adoption of our then American system.

Desperate business conditions are not properly met where there is any question of divided authority or divided leadership, as is so often the case with commissions. We are spending at the rate of around $9,000,000,000 per year. Unnecessary delays in this matter are enormously expensive. The fog banks of discussions, recriminations, and procrastinations which so often characterize committees or commissions acting either in a public or private capacity should be avoided.

The Budget can best be balanced in the way which any private organization, with its business in the demoralized condition of our present governmental business, would take as a matter of course. Mistake not, the Budget of the United States can be balanced.

To the Brink

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, for some years past the St. Louis Post-Dispatch has been extremely unfriendly in its editorial policy toward me. The directors of the editorial page of the Post-Dispatch entertain for me a cordial dislike—a feeling which I return in Scriptural measure, pressed down, and running over. But in the edition of June 11 the Post-Dispatch published a leading editorial upon the subject of our possible involvement in the war, and upon the recent policies of the administration which, to my mind, is so sane, so eloquent, so well-reasoned, and so patriotic, that I desire to afford to every Member of this body an opportunity to read it, in the hope that they may see fit to do so.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the editorial be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 11, 1940]

TO THE BRINK

President Roosevelt all but declared war yesterday.

He did not go all the way because, fortunately, this is still a democracy and, under our system, only the Congress of the United States, the elected representatives of the people, can declare war.

But the President, with his immense power, can lead the Nation to the brink. This is what Roosevelt has done.

The President opened his speech with the words: "Every generation of young men and women in America has questions to ask the world."

While the country is still at least technically at peace, while the Bill of Rights is still functioning, we are going to take advantage of it and ask the President some questions.

But, first of all, we should like to draw a very brief contrast between Franklin Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. Wilson led the United States into war in 1917 after a long period in which he did his agonizing best to keep us out of it. He led us into war only after a long series of overt acts by Germany against the United States—the sinking of our ships and the killing of our citizens.

This time there are no overt acts by Germany against the United States. Our ships are not being sunk. Our people are not being killed. Roosevelt, however, is doing his agonizing best to get us into the war. And he is doing so without the approval of public opinion. In contrast with the situation in 1917, we can now measure public opinion accurately. All the polls show that the people of the United States are overwhelmingly opposed to going to war.

Is this a democracy or isn't it? Are the people or their elected representatives to be consulted on a question of the utmost gravity—a question that involves the blood of American men—or not?

Is it not true that Roosevelt has proceeded along the very lines that Mussolini did, namely, to work up a war fever without permitting the Italian people to express their true convictions?

Is it not true that, for a year or more, Roosevelt has been so obsessed with foreign policy as to neglect domestic issues and, worse, as to neglect the proper economic and military preparation of our country for the trying times that may be ahead?

Mr. Roosevelt, of course, sincerely believes that the defeat of the Allies would endanger the United States, and this sentiment is shared by millions of his countrymen, including this newspaper, but what is the sensible thing to do under the circumstances? Is it to enter the war in Europe or is it to build up our own defenses in a rational way?

If we assume, for the sake of discussion, that this country is ready and willing to follow Roosevelt into a European war, with what will the country fight?

Will it fight with an army which is microscopic compared to the great legions of Germany, Italy, and France? Will it fight with its Navy and leave the Pacific bare to the marauding ships of Japan? Will it fight with its handful of antiaircraft guns, not sufficient in number to guard even one moderately sized city? Will it fight with its 300 B–18 bombers, of which General Arnold, chief of our air force, said to send them into battle would be suicide? Will it fight with its few so-called flying fortresses, which are now revealed to have three vital defects?

Obviously not. Far from being able to fight in Europe, the United States is actually unprepared to defend its own shores. And why, since this is the undeniable fact, does Roosevelt all but declare war on the dictators? His fifth cousin said: "Speak softly and carry a big stick." This Roosevelt speaks loudly and has nothing to back it up.

The President said yesterday that the material resources of the Nation would be offered to the Allies. What does he mean by this? By what authority does he make such a statement?

It is of a piece with the remainder of the President's speech—one of the most reckless speeches ever made by an American statesman. Is it not a fact that both Britain and France have billions of dollars earmarked for purchases in this country, and is it not also a fact that the things they need—modern airplanes and armored tanks—we haven't got either to sell or to give?

Has the President read the recently issued report of the Senate Naval Committee, which says that for the United States to go to war would mean a tragic sacrifice of the Nation's liberties and assets? Does he know that the committee, after carefully interviewing high-ranking officers of our armed forces, says that the United States is not prepared to give the Allies concrete help by intervening now, and will only jeopardize its own welfare by doing so?

The Naval Committee's report, printed in part on this page last Sunday, should be required reading for the President. It asks a question, too. It asks: "Why not face the basic military and economic fact that it is not within our power or means to create military or naval establishments of sufficient strength to police the world, but that it is within our power and means to prevent others from transporting their wars to this hemisphere?"

Mr. Roosevelt talks about the European shambles in terms of words like "justice," "freedom," "liberty." Those are precious words and those are precious things, but is it not true that the war in Europe is concerned about many other things besides abstract principles?

Is it not true that the war started in September of last year when Hitler invaded Poland and the declared reason for the entrance of France and Britain was to protect Poland. Was Poland a democracy? Ask the poor peasants of Poland, crushed under the heels of the Polish landlords, about that. Ask the Jews of Poland, who suffered the Polish brand of pogrom long before the Hitler brand was invented.

Justice, freedom, liberty, yes. These were the things we went to war for in 1917 and what happened? Instead of making the world safe for democracy, we ushered in the era of dictatorships, the age of the monstrous Hitler, the ghoulish Mussolini.

Is it not true that we are witnessing in Europe a tremendous convulsion of forces, of rival imperialisms, of have-not nations versus have nations, of age-old hatreds, of age-old quarrels? Is it not a radical oversimplification of a vast historical upheaval to describe it in the terms used by Mr. Roosevelt?

Mr. Roosevelt did his best to keep the war from happening. He failed. Now his job is to be President of the United States of America.

Commencement Exercises at Fisk University

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM POWER MALONEY

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief address delivered by William Power Maloney at the commencement exercises held at Fisk University, Nashville, Tenn., on June 30, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As the only member of the Maloney family available at the moment, I have come to this commencement to congratulate the three young ladies who, by their splendid talents and high endeavor, have won the first of the Margaret Sarah McKim Maloney scholarships.

In addition to the cash endowment that makes possible these awards today, certain real-estate interests in New York City have been deeded to Fisk University and will, at the earliest possible moment, be sold, in order to swell this scholarship fund. So we hope that soon these scholarships may be of greater financial help to you, and even more worthy of your striving.

It is particularly fitting that these scholarships were founded at Fisk University, for Margaret Sarah McKim Maloney was the only grandchild of James Miller McKim, the great abolitionist and organizer of the underground railroad, who, with his wife Sarah, braved the threats of lynching to bring back John Brown's body from Harpers Ferry for burial in the Adirondacks.

The dear lady in whose memory these scholarships are given was never weary of helping. Everyone she helped became her friend, for she knew how to give as if she were receiving. Practiced by her, giving was a fine art which left fragrant memories.

In the happiness of those she helped she found content. And if anything could add to the eternal peace she now enjoys, it would be the knowledge that, though gone, she may still keep on helping. That she may long continue to help, the Margaret Sarah McKim Maloney scholarships were founded to aid and encourage you, the women of Fisk University, who today study music, art, and literature—things she herself once loved to learn.

Among you, bright-eyed, eager, talented young ladies, who love the things she did, Margaret Sarah McKim Maloney would be more than content to be held in friendly remembrance. So we who cherish her memory are, through these scholarships, confiding it to your care, in the sure belief that she will not be forgotten, for you are a remembering race.

America's Role

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON TRANSCRIPT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Boston Transcript entitled "America's Role."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Transcript]

AMERICA'S ROLE

America has a role to perform. It can be a great role in world history, or it can be a dark smear on its pages and a tragedy for all mankind.

The President spoke rightly that there can be no isolation for America. America must share in the responsibilities for the world's progress. We cannot, even if we would, isolate ourselves, economically, spiritually, intellectually, or morally. We can choose, however, the part we shall play. We can send or not send soldiers to Europe as we choose. But we cannot isolate ourselves nor fool ourselves that we can.

Let us first define our present responsibility, and having done so, let us be more specific as to a national and foreign policy for its execution. Agreement upon our responsibility and national policy then permits an intelligent judgment upon the question of aid to the Allies.

First, our responsibility is to preserve freedom for ourselves, our children, and such of the rest of the world as thinks as we do that only in a state of freedom can culture and civilization advance most rapidly. We have no responsibility and no desire to preserve the status quo of the European political and tariff boundaries which have met in head-on conflict with the rapid changes of the world's economic life. These changes are a part of the industrial revolution which is not yet finished. It has been the very resistance of the different European nations to these factors of change which caused the last World War, with its subsequent famine and pestilence, and brought Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini into power.

No. We have no desire to resist the inevitable conditions of economic change. But upon America more than upon any other nation on earth lies the responsibility of preserving the light of freedom. We, and the war-worn British Empire, are the only free nations left with sufficient natural resources, the industrial ingenuity, and capacity, and manpower to do the job. And after the war is over it will be our responsibility also to share in the effort and cost of reconstruction. Worse days of famine and pestilence are coming, and we must stand ready to feed the starving and combat disease.

And now, second, let America adopt a national and foreign policy upon which the Nation can agree and steadily pursue with a singleness of purpose. We must defend with our lives, at all costs and all sacrifice, the most strategically defendable area in which the light of freedom can be kept burning. The area within our national border is not successfully defendable from a strategic standpoint if beset by hostile forces on all sides. The Monroe Doctrine recognizes this fact. The most strategically defendable area is the continents and outlying islands enclosed by the two great oceans. No better natural barriers exist to aid in military defense. The policy must be directed on the principle of guarding against attack from outside. It must not include suppression by force of the liberties of other nations by us. Such action would destroy, from within, the freedom it attempts to preserve against attack from without.

This is a gigantic task. But it is a task which can be done if we have the will, courage, fortitude, and singleness of purpose. Time is of the essence. There must be no waste motion. Economic policy must be directed toward this one aim. Diplomacy must be focused on this end. Military policy must be coordinated and concentrated on this single purpose. To straddle the fence, to divert energies to other fields by training an army to fight in Europe is to spread the results of our efforts so thin over several defense lines that none will be made impregnable. We have no trained and equipped army of sufficient size to be of present material aid. The people of this country, according to the latest Gallup poll, are 93 percent opposed to sending men to fight in Europe. We have time to build the defense of freedom on our continents, whereas we should have been fighting before this had we decided to defend freedom on a line along the Rhine.

Such a policy carries many implications. It means concentration of airplane production on types of planes suitable for continental defense. It means establishment of adequate naval air bases at suitable points. It means the construction of long-range submarines. It means an adequate intercontinental merchant marine. It means the training of men primarily for the air and naval services. It means the training of sufficient Army personnel and the production of sufficient Army equipment of a character necessary for operations within the freedom area if required. It means the training of an army of skilled labor in an extensive chain of training schools. It means a program of high taxes upon every American family. It means the elimination of many present Government expenses not a part of the defense program. It may later mean conscription both for industry and the armed forces. It means greater economic cooperation between North and South America. It means a new and definite policy for American diplomacy. It means the research for and commercial development of substitutes for vital raw materials necessary in wartime as are now imported from outside the freedom area.

It does not mean the formation of an army designed for fighting in Europe. It does not mean the building of tanks and other Army mechanical equipment in the quantity and of the type necessary for American participation in Europe. It does not mean conscription of men for the obsolete 1917 type of military training, but rather for the mechanical training necessary both for industry and the armed forces.

Forces hostile to freedom are on the march and in double-quick time. The success of these forces and the rapidity of their march alters entirely the situation as evaluated by us and by the American people a year ago. To the extent we can send materials to the Allies in Europe without weakening our defense preparation of the Western Hemisphere, we should do so. The labor and supplies for such materials have to be paid for by somebody. The Allies should pay for them so far as they have assets to do so. It may later become wise for us as a nation to give these materials, paying for the labor and supplies ourselves as a matter of our own defense cost. Experience has shown that credits for war materials have been the cause of later international difficulties.

But every drop of free American blood must be reserved for defense of the western area of freedom and only spilled in a cause disassociated from the tragic history of European politics. If we work hard and build our defense fast enough, we may still avoid actual warfare.

But the need of the hour now, above all else, is the consolidation of American public opinion upon an explicit, clear-cut, and more comprehensive national policy.

Purchase of Foreign Silver

OF

HON. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

STATEMENT BY PERCY H. JOHNSTON

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have in my hand an article recently published which gives the views of Mr. Percy H. Johnston, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, regarding the buying of foreign silver, which I ask to have printed in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHNSTON URGES UNITED STATES BUY ARMS INSTEAD OF SILVER—STATE CHAMBER HEAD ASKS TOWNSEND BILL PASSAGE TO END METAL PURCHASES

Percy H. Johnston, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, urged yesterday that the United States stop buying foreign silver and spend the money thus saved on national defense. His recommendation was contained in a statement issued at the chamber's offices, 65 Liberty Street.

Mr. Johnston said continuation of the silver purchases in the present emergency would be a "tragic farce" and urged the immediate enactment of the amended Townsend silver bill, which has been passed by the Senate but held up in the House of Representatives.

"Every million dollars the Government spends in the purchase of foreign silver now means dollars gone that the Nation could have expended for airplanes or other vitally needed defense equipment," said Mr. Johnston.

"Since 1934 the Government has spent about $985,000,000 for the purchase of foreign silver for which it had no use. In the last fiscal year alone the Government paid foreign producers more than $150,000,000.

"The Nation needs every dollar it can save and raise for rearmament. President Roosevelt vetoed the rivers and harbors bill to save money for national defense. He can win further commendation by voicing his approval of the objective of the amended Townsend bill. A word from him to the leaders of the Senate and the House would insure speedy passage of the bill. A stroke of the President's pen then would save more millions of dollars for defense.

"Most of the 1,950,000,000 ounces of foreign silver which the Treasury has acquired since 1934 is now gathering dust in underground vaults. It could not be disposed of except at tremendous loss.

"Had the huge sum which it cost been expended wisely by the Government for airplanes, battleships, tanks, and other needed defense equipment, the Nation today would be far better prepared to meet the challenge which events in Europe now compel us to face."

Mr. Johnston is chairman of the Chemical Bank & Trust Co. and president of the New York Clearing House Association.

What Has the Democratic Party Done and What Does It Have To Offer the Negroes of America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY DR. WILLIAM J. THOMPKINS AT DOWNINGTOWN, PA.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Dr. William J. Thompkins, Recorder of Deeds for the District of Columbia, at the Community Day exercises of the Downingtown Industrial and Agricultural School, Downingtown, Pa., on May 19, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. Waring, members of the faculty, student body, and friends, I have been invited here today to present for your consideration, in the form of a debate, the question of What Has the Democratic Party Done and What Does It Have To Offer the Negroes of America. My opponent, Judge Edward W. Henry, of Philadelphia, will discuss with you What Has Been Done by the Republican Party and What It Has To Offer the Negroes of America.

Before beginning this forensic, I should like to congratulate Dr. Waring, principal of this institution, for having made possible this engagement whereby parents and their children may have presented to them the merits and demerits of both of the major political parties.

I wish further to pause long enough to pay tribute to the Democratic United States Senator from this Keystone State, and to the citizens of Pennsylvania whose votes made it possible for a man of the stature of Senator JOSEPH F. GUFFEY to serve the citizens of this great Commonwealth and the citizens of this country in a manner that has surrounded him with glory and honor, and has made him one of America's most able statesmen.

In discussing what the Democratic Party has done for the Negro, I might just as well bring it home to you by telling you first what the Democratic Party has done for the Negroes of Pennsylvania, and how your Democratic Senator has fitted into that program.

I will never forget listening to the fervent plea made by Senator GUFFEY before the Senate committee considering the antilynching bill in the Seventy-fourth Congress. I can see him now as he walked calmly up to the committee table and said:

"I am heartily in favor of the objects and necessities of this bill and if the bill has any defects, I am satisfied that this committee can remedy and make the proper changes in the bill, and I sincerely hope that the full committee will recommend this bill, so we can discuss the matter at length on the floor of the Senate, at which time I will take great pleasure in supporting and working for the bill."

In keeping with the above statement, Senator GUFFEY gave the antilynching bill his full support on the floor of the Senate, which fact may be attested to by Walter White, secretary of the N. A. A. C. P.

The record of your able Senator shows that the second day after the inauguration of the President, Senator GUFFEY requested that the brilliant editor of the Pittsburgh Courier be named as an assistant to the Attorney General, and you all know that President Roosevelt granted that request and named Robert L. Vann as assistant to the Attorney General of the United States.

He has brought the benefits of all the New Deal social agencies to the front door of every home in Pennsylvania, and to the end that such may have been possible, he supported all of the New Deal legislation which gave to us such agencies as the Civilian Conservation Corps; the old-age pensions; the soil conservation; National Youth Administration; social-security legislation; minimum-wage laws, and so forth.

You are all aware that it was largely through the interest of Senator GUFFEY that millions of dollars have been spent in this great State, resulting in thousands of Pennsylvania citizens, both white and black, being put to work. You know of the project under the Commerce Department here in Pennsylvania, which gave employment to more than 700 Negro citizens; all of these things were accomplished through the efforts of your Democratic Senator, even though he had to fight the opposition in order to bring it to pass.

The comforts that the citizens of Pennsylvania have enjoyed during the past 7 years; the money they have earned, both Democrats and Republicans, is the result of the loyalty and devotion of Senator GUFFEY to the citizens of his State as their representative in the United States Congress. It is a tribute to the citizens of Pennsylvania, whose vote sent to the Senate a man of the intelligence, ability, statesmanship, and desire to serve whose name is JOSEPH F. GUFFEY. It is my hope that you will continue to send Senator GUFFEY to Washington as long as he is willing to make the sacrifice necessary for the proper service of his constituents.

Now, I have been asked to answer the question, What has the Democratic Party done for the Negro?

I always cherish the pleasure of an opportunity to speak in behalf of the New Deal and what it has done for the Negro people of America. I say "behalf" advisedly, because the New Deal needs no defense. The greatest defense that can be offered to those who grudingly attack the accomplishments of the New Deal is the New Deal program itself. So, in the language of Al Smith, "let's look at the record."

Whenever the ruler or supreme executive of a nation is confronted by a situation imperiling national stability and continuity, if he possesses power and is guided by wisdom, he will immediately employe every resource at his command to meet the danger.

If he is an executive charged with the responsibility of executing laws enacted by a parliamentary assemblage, operating within constitutional restraints, he will issue a call to the representatives of the people and request the necessary powers to meet the national emergency. This President Roosevelt did, and the Congress conferred upon him the necessary powers to meet the most wretched and deplorable national situation which had ever confronted a newly elected Executive in the history of our country.

Every department of our national life was out of order—industry, finance, business, and education—while the frightful visitor, Despair, was an unwelcome guest at the hearthstones of millions of American families. Unemployment, crime, and hoarding completed the "four horsemen of America" who were riding swiftly as President Hoover was leaving the White House.

Came then Franklin Delano Roosevelt, with bold heart and brilliant mind, trained in the craft of statesmanship and administrative leadership—with a character rooted and grounded in the finest traditions of American life; with an unflinching soul that had found itself in lonely hours of meditation and reflection, and which understood the realities of the situation.

Summoning to his aid the best brains of the country, regardless of party affiliations, the "four horsemen" were brought to a halt, and the people everywhere rejoiced in the feeling of a new hope—a hope well founded as time has proved. Negroes, like all other American citizens, possessed that hope, and Negroes, like all other American citizens, are confident that their faith and trust in our humanitarian President was not given in vain, for they, probably more than any other race, had felt the pains brought on by the do-nothing government of Republicanism; and they, like any other patient who is sick, know when they are obtaining relief.

When the bottom fell out of the American economy in 1929, the colored people of this Nation were among the first victims of the resultant depression. Hundreds of thousands were separated from their jobs and were without adequate resources to sustain life. Their living conditions, never at par, became more wretched as families were forced to double up in crowded and dilapidated quarters. Their morale was strained and their health impaired. The youth of the race seemed to have no future. The outlook was bleak.

There was no hope for amelioration of these conditions until President Roosevelt launched his vast program of social reform to lift the whole American people out of the mire of despair. This program, designed to aid that ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed third of the Nation has been of inestimable value to the Negro race, the masses of whom have been concentrated historically in the low-income group with only meager hope and encouragement for advancement. New work opportunities were created for these people in a variety of occupations through the Work Projects Administration. New homes have been and are being made available to them through the public housing program of the United States Housing Authority. Schools have been constructed and hospitals developed by grants from the Public Works Administration. The youth of the race has been inspired and trained by the National Youth Administration and the Civilian Conservation Corps. Thousands of workers in industry have been protected by the Social Security Act and the wage and hour law. Thousands of black farmers have participated in the agricultural and rehabilitation programs of the Farm Security Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, and the Soil Conservation Administration. Light has penetrated many a dreary home and the tasks of home and farm have been eased by the cheaper electricity rates made possible by the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Rural Electrification Administration.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

Employment by the Work Projects Administration has meant more than jobs to thousands of young men and women of the Negro race. It has meant opportunity to engage in occupations for which they were trained in school and college. It has meant opportunity to develop themselves in their chosen occupations, to compete on equal terms with members of other races, and to gain administrative experience.

Last year an average of 300,000 Negro workers were employed by W. P. A. Representing 14 percent of the total W. P. A. workers, they received an estimated $15,000,000 in monthly wages. These workers were engaged in a variety of tasks ranging from professional service to unskilled labor. There were physicians, dentists, and teachers on projects; there were actors, artists, and writers; there were skilled mechanics, technicians, and scientists. In short, doors of employment which had been previously closed or nearly closed to Negroes were opened to a large number of colored persons in accordance with their need and talent.

PUBLIC HOUSING

Everywhere it is recognized that next to employment the most urgent problem facing the Negro is the problem of obtaining decent, safe, and sanitary housing. Not until the Government launched its public-housing program in 1934 was there any large-scale effort to provide decent housing for low-income families at rentals within their reach.

Today 8,000 Negro families are living in low-rent housing projects developed with Government aid. Under the present program of the United States Housing Authority plans have been formulated for the rehousing of about 45,000 additional Negro families. This figure represents one-third of all housing units for which loan contracts have already been approved by President Roosevelt upon recommendation of Administrator Nathan Straus.

Not only has the program built new homes for thousands of families who otherwise could not afford a decent place to live, but also it has created employment for technicians, building-trades workers, skilled and unskilled, and for "white collar" workers in the management and operation of projects. Protective clauses included in the buildings contracts of all U. S. H. A. aided projects have already enabled Negro building-trades workers to earn nearly two and a half million dollars in wages.

YOUTH PROGRAMS

Two agencies have been established to assist the youth of the Nation in attaining economic and social adjustment. These are the National Youth Administration and the Civilian Conservation Corps.

In December 1939 there were approximately 78,500 Negro young men and women employed on the student-aid and work programs of the N. Y. A., representing 11.1 percent of the total of 708,000 persons so employed. The N. Y. A. provides employment, gives scholarship grants, and training to persons between the ages of 16 and 25. The types of employment training cover a wide range of occupations.

Approximately 250,000 young colored men have participated in the rehabilitation and conservation programs of the C. C. C. since its establishment in 1933. During 1939 the sum of $700,000 was allotted monthly by colored C. C. C. boys to their parents and dependents back home.

PROGRAMS FOR FARMERS

The Negro farm population has been assisted by the programs of the Farm Security Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, and the Soil Conservation Administration. Through F. S. A., Negro farmers have been rehoused in modern farmsteads, have been advanced rehabilitation loans, and have participated in rental cooperatives. Larger long-term loans were made available through F. C. A., which also stimulated the organization of credit unions. In June 1939, records of the F. C. A. showed that there were 48 credit unions organized among Negroes, with a total membership of 4,178.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The building of public facilities has been the basic programs of P. W. A. These structures include schools, hospitals, community centers, bridges, dams, and roads. More than 115,000 Negro children in 24 States are attending schools built during the past few years with the aid of P. W. A. funds. Allotments for the construction of these school buildings amounted to more than $34,000,000, excluding the $3,500,000 worth of allotments made to Howard University.

Hospital facilities for Negro patients have been increased by at least 7,242 beds through the aid of grants and loans by P. W. A. Community centers and other recreational facilities have been made available to colored people in many sections of the country through P. W. A. grants and loans.

OTHER AGENCIES

Other agencies which have contributed to the welfare and security of Negro workers include the Social Security Board, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Rural Electrification Administration, the Federal Housing Administration, the Home Owners' Loan Corportation, the National Labor Relations Board, and the Wage and Hour Act.

The New Deal, more than any other administration, has realized that Negroes are American citizens, and as such have a right to participate in every phase of American Government from the humble position of charwoman to the stately position of Federal judge. For the first time in the history of this Government we have a Negro presiding over a Federal court—first Hon. William H. Hastie, now Judge Herman E. Moore.

I could go on to enumerate other benefits that have come to the Negro under the New Deal, for the ocean of its philanthropy knows no shore, but my time is limited. No one would dare stand before a colored audience and say that we should not have had a low-cost housing program; that there should have been no Works Progress Administration; that the National Youth Administration was a blunder; that the C. C. C. camps have been of no value to the Negro youth; that the grants from the P. W. A. for the construction of schools, hospitals, and additional buildings for our colleges were not necessary. What is it, then, that the New Deal has done that needs defense insofar as the Negro is concerned? Nothing.

The Negro is not going to be fooled or guided by Republicans into the belief that this administration is responsible for the present status of the antilynching bill, either. Everyone knows that for 25 years the Republican Party bluffed about the Dyer antilynching bill and it was never brought to discussion in the Senate, notwithstanding the Republicans had the House, the Senate, and even the Supreme Court, for more than half a century. At the first opportunity where voting cloture would have ultimately brought the antilynching bill to a successful end the Republicans declined to vote because they knew that the Democrats would have been given credit for the passage of the bill.

In the House of Representatives, where debate is limited, the Republicans had to join with the Democrats and vote passage of the bill because they had no shield to hide behind. But in the Senate, where debate is unlimited, and a two-thirds vote is required to limit debate, the Republicans joined with the southern filibusterers and defeated the motion to limit debate. The record shows that practically every Democrat, with the exception of the southerners, voted for cloture, but the Republicans refused.

The Democratic leadership did all within its power to break the filibuster by holding continuous sessions extending far into the night in an effort to wear the filibusterers out, but it didn't work. When this failed, the Democratic leadership cleared the way for a vote on the motion offered by a Democrat to limit the debate, and as I said, the Republicans joined with the southern Democratic filibusterers to defeat the motion, wherein if they had voted with the Democrats who favored the motion, debate would have been limited and the antilynching bill would now be on the statute books.

We are living in a day when actions speak louder than words. We are living in a day when Negroes are no longer gullible and know that actions speak louder than words when they read and learn and form their own opinions. They are able to judge for themselves who is right and who is wrong.

The thing for Negroes to do is to rally behind their friends and scorn their enemies—those who had an opportunity to do but did not. To turn against a man who has endeavored to be the President of all the American people and who has succeeded, would be nothing less than treason, and no Negro can afford to be guilty of such an offense.

There are two sides to this question: You either have to be "good God" or "good devil." You either go up with the crowd of new dealers, or down with the anti-new dealers.

I agree with what my opponent will say relative to Abraham Lincoln, and what the Republican Party did for Negroes under his administration; that was almost a century ago. The people of today do not want a "has been" or a "gonna be," but an "isser."

President Roosevelt is doing for the American people what the American people want done; that was shown by his overwhelming victory at the polls in 1936, and in the several primary elections that have been held instructing delegates to support him for a third term.

If the Republicans had a panacea for recovery, for Budget balancing, why didn't they tell Hoover; he wanted to know. In the closing days of his administration he tried in vain to obtain from his Republican stalwarts information that would help him relieve the distress and suffering of the American people. He finally turned to Roosevelt, and summoned him to the White House and requested this information.

What is it that the Republicans will do if reelected that they didn't do while they were in power and control of the Government? How will they balance the Budget? Will they do so by abolishing the C. C. C., which gives employment and training to the youth of our Nation? Will they abolish the Work Projects Administration, the Public Works Administration, the National Youth Administration, and the other Federal agencies inaugurated by President Roosevelt to preserve the Nation. God perish the thought.

The only question to be decided by the American people of which the Negro is a part is, Are you willing to return to the days of 1929 to 1932—the days of starvation—no homes, no food, no clothes, and no leadership; or will you continue on the upward trend with the New Deal administration of Roosevelt, that has brought this country out of the mire and mud of the depression years, into a land that has restored peace and contentment to millions of homes and families?

"Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide
In the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side
Some great cause, God's new Messiah, offering the bloom or blight
Parts the goats upon the left hand and the sheep upon the right
And the choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and that light
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside
Doubting in his abject spirit 'till his Lord is crucified
And the multitude make virtue of the faith they had denied."

Airplanes for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the pen of Mr. John T. Flynn, under the caption of Plain Economics, dated New York, May 22, 1940, in reference to the question of 50,000 airplanes for United States defense purposes, which article interests itself largely in the cost of production, maintenance, and so forth.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

NEW YORK, May 22.—It is becoming increasingly obvious that some sort of immediate survey or study of our defense needs is essential. Otherwise we are apt to give the world a spectacle not of our strength but of our weakness.

As we begin to hear, from experts, the facts and figures about a 50,000-plane air force, it is difficult to believe that someone is not spoofing us. After all, a plane is a very tangible thing. It is not like a speech to Congress, something that can be knocked out in an hour or two on a typewriter.

Our plane factories have been straining every nerve to turn out the orders of England and France. Since January 1, they have delivered only $43,000,000 worth of planes, or less than $11,000,000 a month.

News writers and even editorial commentators keep on talking about a billion-dollar appropriation for 50,000 planes. They refuse to recognize that $3,000,000,000 is the lowest amount that many planes can be turned out for. Then the planes must be equipped with guns and instruments; airfields, hangars, supply stations, and repair plants must be built. That means, at the very lowest, another billion. That means $4,000,000,000, and this is on a basis of only about half the cost of our planes to the Allies.

Then the planes must have men to handle them. Capt. William Whiting, general inspector of aircraft for the eastern division of the Navy, says that when this Government gets 10,000 planes they will have to have 20,000 pilots and 300,000 men for the ground crews.

How many men 50,000 planes would require I do not know. Certainly they would require 100,000 pilots, and it is fair to assume that they would demand at least twice as many men in the ground crews—100,000 pilots, 600,000 in the ground crews—700,000 men. What would it cost to support such a vast army of air men only? Does anyone suppose that would cost less than a billion dollars a year—not just a billion dollars for 1 year, but continuously?

Then there is the technique of producing 50,000 planes. That's over 4,000 a month. That means mass production on a large scale. And that, of course, means freezing the plane models. Now, suppose we had set out to produce 4,600 planes a month last year. Experts tell us that the planes of last year are already out of date. So vast a production program would leave no room for flexibility.

How much would the country have to spend on plants to build another $3,000,000,000 worth of planes in a year? Has anyone given a figure on that? Does anyone know? It would be a gigantic sum of money, and it could not, of course, all be amortized in the cost of 1 year's production.

In short, it begins to look as if we were talking about spending anywhere from five to seven billion dollars a year on this adventure. That is, if we are serious about building 50,000 planes.

Relations With Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY RAYMOND CLAPPER

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very pertinent article printed into today's Washington Daily News, written by Raymond Clapper, entitled "No Deal With Japan."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 13, 1940]

NO DEAL WITH JAPAN

(By Raymond Clapper)

CHICAGO, June 13.—Talk of the desirability of a deal with Japan is spreading through the Middle West, stimulated by the Chicago Tribune and followed up by other oracles. The idea is that to prevent the totalitarian powers from ganging up on us, we should detach Japan and make an ally of her. Then, if it became necessary to face Germany, we should have Japan a loyal friend at our back.

If we are taken in by that argument, we will have learned nothing from the disastrous experience of Britain. It amounts to a proposal for appeasement. The proposition is the product of fear.

Because we are afraid, we should try to appease Japan. How? By selling out now. By turning adrift to the tender mercies of the yellow race Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, the Dutch East Indies, and all way stations.

In order to buy Japan's friendship and support, we would put the seal of our approval upon such a betrayal. We would scuttle on every international ideal. For our treachery we would gain nothing but a Munich, to last until the day when Japan wanted something else that had not been included in the bargain. Then Japan would take whatever it was that she wanted and pay no more heed to her deal with us than she paid to her treaty pledges when she went into Manchukuo, into China proper, or when she fortified the mandate islands in the Pacific.

If Japan is determined to extend her domination in the Far East, at least let it not be done with our approval, as part of a deal with us. Let us not be a party to it in a craven act that would instantly be a tip-off to the totalitarian powers that we had lost our nerve as completely as the British lost theirs in the early 1930's when Japan went into Manchukuo, or as the French lost theirs when they permitted Hitler to reoccupy the Rhineland.

Don't think that a deal with Japan would not be recognized as a tip-off to all Latin America, a tip-off that the third great democracy also was on the run. Are we to invite every Latin American country to begin saying to us, as the little nations of Europe did of Britain, that they cannot depend upon us? Are we to give them that encouragement to rush into deals with Hitler as the new rising force that is to replace the United States as the protector of the Western Hemisphere?

Of course, the idea of a deal with Japan is stated in neat, seemingly safe terms. So was Munich. Yet Munich turned the balance fatally against the Allies. Everything since has been inevitable sequel.

This is world revolution, not only war for conquest. It is a revolution to overthrow capitalist democracy everywhere, to overthrow the system set up through British leadership and to supplant the British domination and pattern with German domination and pattern.

Britain achieved a world-wide empire, shaped to the mechanics which best suited her. Germany aspired to replace that world domination with mechanics of her own. Italy and Japan are her left and right hands. The old Bolsheviks had an idea of world revolution, but they couldn't put it over. Hitler has a similar idea and he is on the way toward putting it over where the Communist world-wide revolution failed.

Note Mussolini's significant phrases in his declaration of war: "Blackshirts of the revolution * * * we take the field against the plutocratic and reactionary democracies * * *. This gigantic conflict is only a phase of the logical development of our revolution * * * it is a conflict between two ages, two ideas * * * an event of import for the centuries * * * proletarian, Fascist Italy."

This is not old-style nineteenth century imperialism any more than was the unsuccessful Communist try at a world revolution. Britain has been mistress of the world, why not Germany? Why not destruction of the old capitalist democratic governments? Once it sounded like ballyhoo. But Germany is sacrificing thousands of her lives to achieve it, and the great stakes are almost within her grasp.

When France and England have been crushed, only the United States and our system on the Western Hemisphere, plus what we may take over from the British Empire, will be left standing in the way.

In this situation we can trust nobody but ourselves. We can trust only our own force. We want none of the false sense of security that a deal with Japan would give us, a deal that might prove as treacherous as Munich. Japan is playing the same game as the other crowd and we should be foolish to deceive ourselves. We must make busy being the strong neighbor in the Western Hemisphere. No neighbor now is a good neighbor unless he is strong. We need guns, not treaties.

Seismology in Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

PAPER BY EDWARD L. TROXELL

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, Admiral L. O. Colbert, the head of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, after conference with me and much correspondence, lent valuable assistance to the study of seismology in Connecticut. In that State there is a very serious problem resulting from certain geological faults, which situation has been covered in an excellent paper prepared by the superintendent of the Connecticut Geological and Natural History Survey, Prof. Edward L. Troxell, of Trinity College in Hartford, Conn.

Under date of April 4, correlating all available information, Professor Troxell delivered a paper entitled "Seismology in Connecticut." I ask unanimous consent that Professor Troxell's paper be inserted in the RECORD for the general benefit of all.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEISMOLOGY IN CONNECTICUT

(By Edward L. Troxell)

Frequently we hear of a man taking out fire insurance and shortly thereafter his building burns down; suspicion is attached to such a remarkable coincidence. But have you heard the story of the man who took out earthquake insurance and then went to his friend and asked, confidentially, just how an earthquake might be started? Well, the fact is you cannot start an earthquake; you can't stop one; we can't even predict when they will come. We can, however, take precautions against loss and damage from them and that's very important.

Let us make clear just what an earthquake is. It's not a crack in the ground; it's not a building tumbling down, as many people think; it is rather, merely a trembling of the earth, a wave motion, a vibration. Of course all those other things may result from the earthquake; one result may be that the earth opens up; landslides may come; and rivers may be muddy for weeks afterward; so-called tidal waves may sweep across the ocean adding to the destruction already wrought.

While I have felt the tremor of an earthquake, I have never heard the sound that is reported by so many people. This sound is said to resemble that of an automobile crossing a bridge; or of a furnace exploding; it is also described as a rumbling or a low, growling noise. The cause of an earthquake may be many things: the explosion of powder or dynamite, the passing of a train or of a truck along the road. A volcanic outburst usually sets the earth a-trembling. The most conspicuous tremors, however, come from the breaking of the earth's crust and the break may occur many miles beneath the surface. Take a small stick in your hands and begin bending it; as you apply more and more force the stick bends and bends until at last with a snap it breaks and you feel the sting in your fingers; this sting is caused by the vibration and is analogous to the quake in the earth when the crust breaks, a quake or trembling that may go throughout the earth.

Very sensitive instruments are made today that are able to record even the slight tremors that come from some distant place, tremors so small that one would not notice them ordinarily. Moreover, these instruments are capable of recording the exact time of the disturbance, the intensity—how violent it is—and even the direction from which the tremor came. It is such an instrument, a seismograph, that we hope to have here at Hartford some day in the not-too-distant future, perhaps to be installed by our National Government, or perhaps as a gift from some generous and public-spirited donor. No seismograph exists in our whole State, although in neighboring States there are several of them. We have had the thing in mind for some time because the peculiar structure of the rocks at Trinity College and the nearness of the rock to the surface make the campus at Trinity a particularly fitting place to install a seismograph.

The purposes of having a seismograph here are manyfold. In a general way, it will fit into the broad plan of the Government in investigating earth disturbances; specifically it will enable us to learn more about earthquakes as a hazard for buildings, for dams, and like construction. It may throw light on peculiar recurrent vibrations such as those now noticed in Vermont, for which no explanation is at hand; it may tell us something about the "Moodus noises," so mingled with superstition in the past and continuing down to the present time. Insurance companies are paying more and more attention to the study of earthquakes because of the risks they have to take.

Many of my hearers might have the feeling that earthquakes are few and far between in Connecticut, and it is true that the severe shocks, which are strong enough for the average person to experience, number no more than ten or a dozen throughout the recorded history, but we know that there are a great many minor shocks, and it is these that have significance for the seismologist. If we were to recount the earthquakes of importance we would go back through 150 years or more. In 1755 a severe earthquake, rated IX, shocked practically all of New England. Six years later an earthquake with rating VIII was felt all the way from New York to Boston; it probably was one of the most severe in the region of Hartford.

From 1791 to 1805 the so-called Moodus noises were prevalent, and it is interesting that within the month we have been hearing of more disturbances in the town of East Haddam. In 1837 came an earthquake to Hartford with an intensity of V, and in 1840 there were disturbances in the region of New Haven, with a rating of VI. In 1908 fissures, cracks in the earth, opened up along the Housatonic River.

In 1925 there were again the strange noises in East Haddam, and a quake at Hartford rated at V. Following that, at various points of Connecticut, earthquakes have been experienced, three in 1929, two in 1931, one in 1934, two in 1935, and again a noticeable shock of mother earth in 1937.

If we but knew the truth there are probably earthquakes every day here at Hartford; most of them of course so gentle that they can be detected only on a sensitive instrument. As it happens our only knowledge of these quakes is brought to us from seismographs outside of Connecticut, for nowhere in our whole State is there an instrument in operation. Can you imagine a physician trying to get the temperature of his patient by guesswork without the use of a sensitive thermometer? That is the position in which we find ourselves at the present time in Connecticut. Even a single element, of the three usually installed in a seismological station, would give us the exact time of an earthquake and its intensity, factors so important in the study of earthwaves.

There has been no important shock in this section or, for that matter, in any part of the United States in the last 3 or 4 years. This, however, is not as reassuring as it might seem; it may be merely the calm before the storm. The theory of earthquakes presupposes a gathering of forces that eventually are released, the longer the period of gathering the greater the effect when the release comes. Stresses accumulate; then as time goes on the strains are set up and at least there must be a readjustment—that is when the trouble comes.

In examining the need for a seismograph here in Connecticut it is worth while noting what eminent authorities and prominent officials in our Government have said. Dr. N. H. Heck, Chief of the Division of Terrestrial Magnetism and Seismology, sums up the whole situation very well; he points out the difficulties, the expense involved, and the need for assistance in interpreting seismological records, and he concludes:

"I hope that in spite of this some kind of a solution of the problem may permit the operation of a seismograph in Connecticut. The geological conditions appear quite favorable."

He says further:

"Improvement of the location of epicenters of moderate earthquakes which occur all around you would be an important scientific contribution, and past history indicates that destructive earthquakes are not impossible."

Mr. J. M. Johnson, Acting Secretary of Commerce, made the following statement:

"It is considered that such a station would be an important link in the group of stations which are actively cooperating in the location and study of New England earthquakes."

Mr. Johnson made this statement after becoming "familiar with the facts (as he says) as to the need for such a station in Connecticut."

Our distinguished Trinity alumnus, Dr. William Bowie, sometime Chief of the Division of Geodesy in the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, wrote to the president of the college:

"I should like to see such a station at Trinity. Seismology is a rapidly developing science and is of prime importance to research in the field of geology."

Admiral Leo Otis Colbert, Director of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, made this statement in 1938:

"In the colonial period there were severe earthquakes in the Connecticut River Valley and today there is considerable seismic activity in various parts of New England. As a result of this condition several institutions have established seismograph stations in that region and they are cooperating actively with Harvard University Seismograph Station, Harvard, Mass., in investigations of local earthquakes and with this Bureau in its general teleseismic work. There are no seismograph stations in Connecticut.

The records from a seismograph station in the vicinity of Hartford would be of considerable value if such records were made available at once to those institutions and organizations making intensive studies and investigations in seismology."

According to Senator DANAHER, Dr. Colbert "believes that the site for a seismograph at Trinity would be excellent and feels that the advantage, particularly with reference to possible building operations, would be very great and would fully justify a seismograph at Hartford."

Admiral Colbert further states that merely "* * * a single vertical component * * * with short period galvanometer and suitable recorder if placed in routine operation at Trinity College, would be a valuable contribution to seismological and allied investigations in New England."

As to practical value, in conference with Mr. T. Z. Franklin, of the Aetna Insurance Co., these data were brought out.

There is a long time value in the study of earthquakes; we know so little of what is actually going on and only in the more distant future will we be in a position to interpret the quakes, great or small, which we hardly realize are existing now. Putting it one way, we would be able to find out what we don't know, and that is indeed important.

Earthquake resistance is not expected or desired for all buildings alike, even in a single city; for example, on filled ground, gravel, etc., which is to be found in Hartford or Boston and other cities, we would want to build more securely. As I understand it, the companies would not want to sell insurance on buildings in certain parts of Boston at the present time. As it stands now, we have no data as to where, how great, the probable time an earthquake might come. We need to spot the foci, the centers; we want to discover the point from which most of our tremors originate.

It is Mr. Franklin's view that this information would be extremely valuable; the more we know the better off we are, especially as our knowledge applies to the risks we are taking from earthquakes on filled ground. That is where the principal value would come from a seismograph in Connecticut, in a large city like Hartford.

For the last 3 or 4 years there have been fewer quakes in the United States in general and in New England in particular. This may mean that there is an accumulation of stresses; that the forces are being built up; that in the elastic rocks which exist here in New England there has been no rupture yet, but that when one does occur it will be all the more severe.

So we see that, aside from the general interest and application of seismology, it has indeed a practical value. With precise information on the intensity, the frequency, the direction of earthquake waves, engineers can be advised on the constructing of buildings to make them quakeproof. It may be that we are not building strongly enough; on the other hand, through fear of these unseen forces, we may be taking precautions away beyond any possible requirement for quake resistance. What we need is more information.

Now, in the fraction of a minute remaining, let me express my gratitude to Dr. Ogilby, president of Trinity College; to Mr. James Goodwin, of Hartford; to Mr. T. Z. Franklin, of the Aetna Insurance Co.; to Senator DANAHER for help in our attempt to study earthquakes in Connecticut, and, of course, to WTHT for this opportunity to discuss our plans.

Stepping Toward War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHAN GURNEY

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM SIOUX FALLS (S. DAK.) ARGUS-LEADER

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Argus-Leader of June 11, 1940, entitled "Stepping Toward War."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Argus-Leader of June 11, 1940]

STEPPING TOWARD WAR

This is a momentous week in a tragic year. It is a week whose significance may be delineated more accurately and emphatically in history than contemporary observation permits.

But for the present we see Italy moving upon the field of battle and the President of the United States uttering an epochal pronouncement.

It was yesterday morning that Mussolini, the boss of Italy, decreed that Italians should throw their military might into the war on the side of Germany and against the Allies.

Counterbalancing that decision came the statement from President Roosevelt yesterday in which he said that the United States "will extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this nation."

Clarification of the President's statement will be sought, no doubt, at once.

But there seems little occasion to question what he has in mind. Obviously he believes that the full force of American material resources should be thrown into the war on the side of the Allies.

In his address—and certainly every word and every phrase in it was carefully thought out—he included no modifications and provisions. He made the flat assertion that our material resources will be made available to the Allies.

This approaches a declaration of war against Italy and Germany. In fact, it can be so construed across the Atlantic and perhaps it will be.

If we are to throw our material resources into the battle on the side of the Allies—and that, by the way, is a matter for Congress, not the President, to decide—we will be a belligerent and certainly subject to treatment by Germany and Italy as a belligerent.

This would mean, of course, that it would be to the advantage of Germany and Italy to disrupt our industrial production, to sabotage our factories, to submarine our ships and, if possible, to drop bombs upon our sites of strategic importance.

If our material resources are to be employed as the President suggests, it means that we again have ventured into a war in Europe in defiance of the determined resolutions that were made in the wake of the first World War.

These features and the inherent meaning of the President's speech cannot be treated too lightly. And there should be no misunderstanding of the implications. If we are to take the step that places us in the war, let us at least know what we are doing. Let us enter the conflict with our eyes open.

The gravity of the situation is such that the suggestion of deluding the American people in respect to what this or that proposal may hold in prospect is decidedly out of place.

We earnestly hope that Congress discusses this subject with complete candor. Our present neutrality laws provide that supplies may be sold to belligerents on a cash-and-carry basis. The same law applies to all belligerents. If it is to be amended in the manner proposed by the President, then it no longer will be a neutrality law.

It will be equivalent to a declaration of war against Germany and Italy. In that event, Congress should have the courage and the honesty to let the people know exactly what is taking place.

Commander Kelly, of the American Legion, spoke last night immediately after the President. He advocated extreme preparedness and pointed out that this has been a part of the Legion's program for several years. He furthermore said that the Legion was opposed to participation in a war in Europe and believed in the concentration of our effort in defending the Western Hemisphere.

That attitude represents the opinion of many Americans, though there is a growing conviction that we should do just what the President suggested. Some such observers, however, have displayed a failure to appreciate the fact that the extension of broad material aid to the Allies means American participation in the war.

There is no purpose in underestimating the seriousness of the situation abroad. It is well that we realize that England and France are fighting against desperate odds. Though Italy is not regarded as a great military nation, she is throwing her strength into the battle at a crucial period. The situation in France is particularly critical, with the Germans making advances in the north and Italy now creating trouble in the southeast. England is conserving her resources for the expected assault upon her own territory.

In his conduct in this situation Mussolini has revealed himself as a creature quite suited in character, in spirit, and in type to be an associate of Hitler. In common with Hitler, he believes that might is right and that the sacrifice of the lives of innocent people is a mere trifle.

Americans face a momentous decision as the week's events draw to a climax. They are determining our course—whether we are to join with the Allies or whether we are to concentrate in the defense of the Western Hemisphere.

Certainly there is no question where our sympathies lie, but a sympathetic interest and actual involvement are not the same.

But permit us to reiterate the fact that the adoption of President Roosevelt's recommendation of yesterday will classify us among the participants in the war.

To construe it differently is something other than straight thinking. And let us reflect deeply and ponder seriously before taking this course.

Preparedness Platform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 13 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY BASIL BREWER

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article dated New Bedford, Mass., May 31, 1940, prepared by Basil Brewer, publisher, entitled "Preparedness Platform, Standard-Times Mercury."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREPAREDNESS PLATFORM, STANDARD-TIMES, MERCURY

MAY 31, 1940.

Abandon politics in preparedness program, from the President down.

Nullify pressure groups, labor and business.

Suppress "fifth column" and Trojan-horse groups.

Draft industry, labor, and men for training to whatever extent, and in whatever number, necessary.

Abandon hour restrictions wherever skilled labor shortage threatens to handicap production. Stop beating the old class hatred tom-toms. The welfare of all is threatened.

Shake up Army and Navy personnel, and smash red tape and cumbersome inspection technique, which throttles mass production of planes and other vital equipment. Tailor-made uniforms or equipment won't meet this crisis.

Stop "preparedness propaganda" from official Washington and substitute honest-to-God preparedness.

Cease discussion of preparedness plans and strategy with the openness of a dialogue in the Grand Central Station.

Let trained and known dollar-a-year men organize this gigantic preparedness program as efficiently and economically as the crisis permits.

Abandon "window dressing" civilian advisory boards and create a board with authority.

Build new airplane factories underground.

Build airports underground.

Build forts underground to defend our coasts and the Panama Canal.

Create mechanized divisions and equip them as rapidly as if we were now at war. Same for antiaircraft.

Divert relief money to the preparedness program as fast as this program relieves unemployment.

Pay no attention to the squawk of the ostrich-minded that this is making us military—if we don't have adequate defense quickly, we may not have anything to defend.

Cease guileless and misleading chatter about building 50,000 planes but get plane production now, and start now to train pilots and ground forces, in quantity, by draft if necessary.

Hold consultations with the other countries of this hemisphere on mutual defense now and make agreements, if possible, with them.

Get drastic efficiency into the whole program; sacrifice the democratic process as little as possible but as much as is necessary.

BASIL BREWER, Publisher.

Military Instruction and Training of Civilians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHIL FERGUSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced the following bill, that provides for the training of American youth:

A bill (H. R. 10074) to establish schools and camps for the military instruction and training of civilians

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to establish and maintain schools for the military instruction and training of civilians who may be selected upon their own applications. The courses of instruction at such schools shall include training in the care and use of firearms, including target practice, vocational and mechanical training, and other subjects pertaining to basic military training. The location of the schools and the hours of instruction shall be so prescribed that the students may attend without changing their customary places of abode or giving up their ordinary means of livelihood. Such schools shall be established at any C. C. C. camp upon voluntary application of enrollees of the C. C. C. Any available buildings, property, or equipment of the camp may be used in such school.

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army, either active or retired, as instructors of the schools established under this section: Provided, That, in time of peace, retired officers, retired warrant officers, or retired enlisted men shall not be detailed on active duty under the provisions of this section without their consent. The Secretary of War is also authorized to call to active duty members of the Officers' Reserve Corps and the Enlisted Reserve Corps as instructors under the provisions of this section: Provided, That, in time of peace, such personnel shall not be called to active duty without their consent. The Secretary of War is also authorized to employ, at such rates of compensation as he shall prescribe, civilian instructors, including members of the Army of the United States or National Guard who are not on active duty, and such compensation shall be in addition to any other pay or allowances provided by the United States for such members of the Army of the United States or National Guard who are not on active duty.

For the purpose of establishing and maintaining the schools provided by this section, the Secretary of War shall (a) provide suitable buildings or rooms for instruction and facilities for target practice; (b) furnish the necessary arms, ammunition, and equipment for all prescribed courses of instruction; (c) maintain the buildings, rooms, target ranges, and equipment; and (d) provide for the issue, care, and safekeeping of all property of the United States Government used in connection with these schools.

Upon the completion of the required course of instruction the student shall be awarded a certificate of proficiency, and a record of the names and addresses of each recipient of such certificate shall be kept in the manner prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Male citizens of the United States between the ages of 16 and 25 years may be voluntarily enrolled in the schools provided by this section. No obligation for military service shall result from such voluntary enrollment. Students enrolled under the provisions of this section shall not be deemed to be in the military service and no right to pay, allowances, compensation, pension, medical attendance, or hospitalization shall accrue by reason of enrollment in or attendance at these schools.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain, upon military reservations or elsewhere, camps for further military instruction and training of graduates of the basic schools provided by this act, of members of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps who have completed 1 year of service in that division, of persons who have attended one or more citizens' military training camps, and of honorably discharged enrollees of the Civilian Conservation Corps; to use for the purpose of maintaining said camps and imparting military instruction and training thereat, such arms, ammunition, accouterments, equipment, tentage, field equipage, and transportation belonging to the United States as he may deem necessary; to furnish at the expense of the United States uniforms, subsistence, and transportation within such limits of territory as the Secretary of War may prescribe, or in lieu of furnishing such transportation and subsistence to pay travel allowances at the rate of 5 cents per mile, or transportation in kind may be furnished and in addition thereto candidates may be paid a subsistence allowance at the rate of 1 cent per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the camp, and for return travel thereto, and to make the payment of travel allowances for the return journey in advance of the actual performance of same, and medical attendance and supplies to persons receiving instruction thereat; to provide the necessary buildings, water, fuel, light, and screening; to authorize expenditures for damages resulting from field exercises and other expenses incidental to the maintenance of said camps; and to sell to persons receiving instruction at said camps, for cash and at cost price, plus 10 percent, quartermaster and ordnance property, the amount of such property sold to any one person to be limited to that which is required for his personal equipment and all moneys arising from such sales shall remain available throughout the fiscal year following that in which the sales are made, for the purpose of that appropriation from which the property sold was authorized to be supplied at the time of the sale. The Secretary of War is authorized further to prescribe the courses of theoretical and practical instruction, including vocational and mechanical training, to be given at the camps authorized by this section; to fix the periods during which such camps shall be maintained; to prescribe rules and regulations for the government thereof; and to employ thereat officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army, active or retired, and members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, and Enlisted Reserve Corps: Provided, That retired and reserve personnel shall not be placed upon active duty for this purpose without their own consent except in time of war or national emergency declared by Congress.

Members of camps of instruction provided by this section shall be entitled to hospitalization, rehospitalization, medical and surgical care in hospitals and at their homes, pay and allowances, transportation, subsistence, and burial expenses as provided for members of Citizens' Military Training Camps by the act of June 15, 1936 (49 Stat. 1507), and any amendment thereof.

Members of camps of instruction provided by this section shall receive an allowance of $5 per month while in attendance at such camps. Certificates of proficiency shall be issued to all qualified graduates of the camps provided by this section and a record of the names and addresses of all candidates to whom such certificates are issued shall be kept in the manner prescribed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. The volunteer camps shall be established in every State in the Union where the Secretary of War determines there are sufficient numbers of enrollees to justify the establishment of such camps. These camps shall be apportioned among the various States and Territories on the basis of population.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of War is authorized to cooperate with any existing establishment of the Government or relief agencies in carrying out this training program.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of War shall submit annual estimates to the Congress for the funds necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and authorization for the appropriation of such funds is hereby made.

Mr. Speaker, this Congress has now approved all requests for funds of the Regular Military Establishments and Navy recommended by the President. I hope these requests will be adequate. This Nation wants to take every step necessary to prepare us for any eventuality. Under the Monroe Doctrine we have assumed the terrible responsibility of protecting the sovereignty of the American republics.

I feel, perhaps, our marines now fixed at 30,000 and our standing Army something over 400,000, as provided in recent legislation, is not yet big enough. We must, however, for the present, accept the request of our President and military leaders as the best professional informed advice we can get. Probably this is all the increase our regular armed forces can digest this year. It is my sincere conviction that in addition to the increased regular forces we must train a huge civilian force. The thoughts of this Nation have never been so shaken as they have with the death struggle of democracies in Europe. Every citizen now feels a love and devotion for his country as never before. Europe has shown us that the things we love and the country that we are blessed by living in may be snatched from us by hungry, wildcat dictator nations. We hear today more than ever before about compulsory military training. That may be just around the corner. We have always built our defenses on the theory that we could raise, train, and equip an army after we got into a war. Germany's demonstration in Europe has proven there is no time to provide defenses after a nation is in battle. To meet the threat of these dictator nations we must devise a method of training every able-bodied American youth that desires to receive training. Ninety-five percent of the boys enrolled in the C. C. C. camps, if afforded the opportunity, would volunteer to take military training in their recreation time, yet we do not afford them this opportunity. We train a small percentage of our youth in the college R. O. T. C. and in the citizens' military training camps in the summer, but only a relative handful when we think of modern armies of millions of men.

The bill I have introduced today would provide military training for those boys between the ages of 16 and 25 in every community in which a sufficient group of boys signify the desire to take this training. Trained instructors would be provided to give these boys instructions in the handling of weapons. A man cannot learn to use a gun, or a rifle, or a machine gun, or an antiaircraft gun, or a tank overnight. These basic courses would be provided, as I say, in every community where such numbers of American youth volunteer to take this part-time training. The same thing would be true in the C. C. C. camps in every camp where sufficient numbers expressed the desire that the training be provided.

The only criticism I have received of this bill is from the military authorities who say that our officers already have their hands full; but when you think of all the retired Army officers, all the Reserve officers, all the National Guard officers who could devote part time to this schooling, I believe we could find sufficient officer personnel in addition to our regular forces to carry on this part-time training and instruction in the use of arms. These instructors, I am sure, would give up the necessary time in order to take a course preliminary to taking a position as instructor.

Now is the time when an overwhelming majority of the people want to have a part in getting this Nation prepared to defend itself. Let us give them this opportunity to take this training that would be afforded to every able-bodied group in the Nation or its Territories.

After they have completed the training course, I provide for the establishment of camps. In these camps they would get a more thorough training for 6 months or a year's time, not for pay but to provide themselves with the training necessary to defend this Nation. I provide only $5 per month in pay for those taking part in these camps. I also make the provision that none taking part in these camps will be required to join any established branches of the military. It is entirely a voluntary proposition. But when the day comes that this country is in peril, when it is necessary to draft the men and wealth of this Nation to defend it, we would have a list of physically fit boys with the fundamental training necessary to make them real defenders of this Nation. And another thing that is even more important—you cannot combat "fifth column" activities by negative action only. I believe we should have an adequate F. B. I., and we are going to have one. I think subversive activities should be stamped out in this country, and the aliens deported who advocate the overthrow of our Government. Yes; I believe the Communistic Party should be outlawed. But, on the other hand, we must offer something constructive to the youth of America. We must give them food for thought. We must make them realize that this country must be defended, or we will lose our freedom to a dictator system. There would be a vast difference in the mental attitude of a man trained in the use of a weapon, trained in Army life, when he is called on to join the Regular Army, and a man drafted from behind a soda fountain, from behind the dry-goods counter, from behind the bank cage, and pushed hurriedly through a training course in crowded training camps, in our time of need. The boy with training that felt at home with a weapon would be a much more valuable soldier in 3 months because he had given thought to becoming a soldier than a man taken cold from a profession or a job could possibly become in three or four times the same length of time.

When the defense bill of the Committee on Military Affairs was before the House I introduced an amendment to provide for the training of these civilians. I did not have adequate time in which to explain it. I do not believe Congress has yet done its duty if we do not make some provision for the training of a large number of civilians at this session. I hope the Military Affairs Committee will give this bill their serious consideration, and report it or a similar measure for passage before we adjourn.

Electric Power for National Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE JERSEY SHORE (PA.) HERALD

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the Jersey Shore Herald, of Jersey Shore, Pa., regarding the fine work being done by the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. regarding national defense. This company is wide awake to the necessities and needs of the country it serves. It is looking after the national needs as well as the needs of the people. John S. Wise, Jr., president of the company, is a dynamo of energy, working in company with the board of directors and the managers of the various districts to give the best service and the most efficient service to all, with an eye for national service as well as local. The National Defense Power Committee will find the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. are prepared for future eventualities. If the Government has other sections of the country as well prepared to furnish electric energy, they will not go to the expense of the great superpower projects in connection with T. V. A., Boulder Dam, Grand Coulee, or St. Lawrence waterway, at national public expense, but will rely more on private enterprise for aid and assistance in national needs in peacetime and during any eventualities that might occur.

The article referred to follows:

[From the Jersey Shore (Pa.) Herald of May 29, 1940]

PENNSYLVANIA POWER & LIGHT CO. PREPARED FOR DEFENSE NEEDS

Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. is fully prepared to meet any extra demands for power that may be occasioned by speeded up national-defense measures, it was announced today by John S. Wise, Jr., president of the power company.

Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. has 18 major electric generating plants, of which 94 percent employ steam generation using anthracite coal for fuel. As the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. plants are scattered in various locations in the territory served by the company, the company is considered to be in a better position from the standpoint of national defense than would be the case were all of its power-generating facilities concentrated in one plant in one location. The company maintains a large stock of anthracite coal adequate to supply its steam electric-generating plants for a period of approximately 1 year. The power plants are connected together by high-voltage transmission lines, all of the plants feeding into a general power transmission system that covers the entire area in the 28 counties in eastern Pennsylvania served by the company. In this territory there are situated 10 third-class cities, 188 boroughs, 1 incorporated town, and 513 villages of over 100 population.

In October of 1939, President Roosevelt combined the National Defense Power Committee and the National Power Policy Committee into a new committee known as the National Power Policy Committee. Data which was prepared by the company, and sent in December of 1939 to the National Power Policy Committee, shows that Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. has an assured capacity in all of its electric facilities, which, after allowing for necessary reserves, provides an adequate margin over the present demands upon the company.

All of Pennsylvania Power & Light Co.'s electric-generating plants and its transmission lines are connected with or tied in to generating stations and transmission lines of six large neighboring power companies in this vicinity, namely, the Scranton Electric Co., Luzerne County Gas & Electric Corporation, Pennsylvania Water & Power Co., Metropolitan Edison Co., Philadelphia Electric Co., and Public Service Electric & Gas Co. of New Jersey. These seven large power systems, operated and connected through high-capacity transmission lines, form what might be termed a local grid system through which large amounts of power are transmitted back and forth between the various companies as needed. The effect of this interconnection of local grid system between the large neighboring public utility companies is to form a power pool under the operating plan of which surplus capacities are always available.

Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. not only has extra capacity immediately available, but, in addition, the company is at this time installing two high-pressure boilers and an additional turbo-generator in its plant at Harrisburg which, when completed early next year, will provide an additional 21,000 kilowatts of power capacity, making the total available capacity of Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. 441,000 kilowatts, or about 588,000 horsepower. The available capacity, present and planned for the future, will be adequate to meet all 1941 power loads including estimated national-defense equipment.

Mr. Wise also announced that the company is completing engineering studies and plans for extensions and additions to its Hauto, Harwood, Pine Grove, and other power plants in the event that still further power might be needed because of any unforeseen development. The addition of power-generating machinery in these plants does not, under the methods contemplated, mean large additions to plant property or plant buildings. By means of higher pressure boilers and turbines, and use of present water and other facilities, generating capacity of the plants may be considered increased in present buildings in a comparatively short time. This will increase the company's capacity after 1941 by 93,000 kilowatts.

President Roosevelt, in his fireside chat on Sunday night, May 26, pointed out that the speeded up national-defense program could be cared for largely by private industry. The announcement just made by Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. is particularly timely.

Let Us Pass the Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

LETTER FROM NEW YORK STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor and I enthusiastically support the legislation proposed in S. 591 and asked for by the American Federation of Labor of my State.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

THE NEW YORK STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Albany, N. Y., June 11, 1940.

To Members of the House of Representatives from the State of New York.

HONORABLE SIRS: As a last appeal, we again invoke your active interest in getting S. 591, housing bill, to a vote and its passage by the House of Representatives.

The extent of work opportunities that the defense program will provide for building-trades mechanics and laborers is negligible. Curtailment of the W. P. A. program and the lack of sufficient private enterprise to take up the slack will displace and leave unemployed additional hundreds of thousands of these workers.

Passage of S. 591 by the House of Representatives is therefore essential to a rounded program that will continue to assure a reasonable minimum of such employment opportunities. To make no such further provision at this critical stage would eliminate factors vital to the Nation's economic balance and to the success of its whole industrial program in furtherance of national defense and security.

Hence this further urgent appeal to you to do your utmost to bring about adoption by the House of Representatives of the pending housing bill, S. 591.

Respectfully yours,

NEW YORK STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
THOMAS J. LYONS,
President.
E. W. EDWARDS,
Secretary-Treasurer.

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

COMMENCEMENT ADDRESS OF HON. U. S. GUYER, OF KANSAS

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent given to me by the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I have the honor of including herein a splendid and informative address delivered by my colleague, the Honorable U. S. GUYER, from the Second District of Kansas, on the occasion of the Fifty-ninth Annual Commencement of Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, on June 3, 1940. On this occasion, my colleague from Kansas [Mr. GUYER], was honored by having the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws conferred upon him.

The address is as follows:

President Gage, members of the class of 1940, my old college friends, ladies, and gentlemen, prefatory to anything I may say on the subject of my address, permit me a word to my old college friends of the olden golden days of long ago when all the world was young.

It has been a half century since I began my course at old Western. Fifty years is but a drop in the ocean of time, but these 50 years have seen startling changes. In Toledo the telephone was a dream unrealized, and the airplane a mythological joke about a fellow named Icarus. However, I might add that even without the telephone we had adequate conversation. But those 50 years seem very short to us boys and girls of old Toledo. Ffty years is an eternity when we peer into the unfathomed future, but it seems very short when we backward gaze. Today the deathless memories of those beloved years come back and hover on the far horizon of the yesterdays like the glamor that tangles in the western tree tops out yonder in the twilight after the sun has set. The busy, crowded intervening years have hurried on with incredible swiftness. The tragedy and heartbreak of it is that the old companions are not all here. Many have gone to that undiscovered country. To them we salute with all the love and affection of the homesick heart.

For lack of a better subject I have chosen Opportunity, suggested by the matchless sonnet of the late Senator John James Ingalls. I am not asking you to subscribe to its philosophy or to share my opinion of this much-debated child of Ingalls' poetic genius. Let us dismiss it with the many clever parodies which it has inspired while I declare that William Shakespeare did everything better than anyone else until Ingalls wrote Opportunity. It is the master sonnet of the English tongue and the stately march of its majestic music sets all the orchestras of the soul to singing:

"OPPORTUNITY

"Master of human destinies am I!
Fame, love, and fortune on my footsteps wait,
Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate
Deserts and seas remote, and passing by
Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late
I knock unbidden once at every gate!

"If sleeping, wake; if feasting, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate,
Condemned to failure, penury, and woe,
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore,
I answer not and I return no more."

Now a word personal to the members of this fine class. Comparisons are proverbially odious, but I will venture far enough to say that no doubt you are much brighter than we were 50 years ago. While I am sure much has been subtracted from the old curriculum of our day, I am just as sure that much has been added. Recently someone showed me a new volume of Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic War, and I am certain that the old warrior has added several chapters to that ancient political campaign document, for it was news to me. I fear the same thing has happened to geometry, for from casual observation I would make affidavit to the fact that several strange and new propositions have been added since I wrestled with it in the sacred precincts of old Drury Hall down at Toledo.

But there are certain fundamental facts and integrities that have not changed and will not change. Life's problems remain about the same in spite of time and its flight. The marvelous advance in science, industry, and machinery has not modified the great verities of life. Honor, honesty, and integrity are not subject to fluctuation or eclipse. Upon these eternal verities you must build even when thrust upon an age of doubt, of hopes and fears, an age that well may mark an epoch in the history of the human race.

I know just what the problem of the girl and the boy is, who come out of college this year. I, too, was catapulted from college into the depths of a so-called depression. That was in 1894. There did not seem to be a bright spot in all the sky. The highways were congested with what we termed "tramps" in those days. Those men were willing and did work for 25 cents per day and were mighty glad to get it. I speak, of course, of the farm where the worker got his board beside his munificent wages. You could buy a quarter section of as good raw land as ever the sun shone on for $300. But there was no market for it except for the few who knew the value of such land and who had the vision to see ahead a year or two when the sun of prosperity would shine again. All this was followed by the greatest era of agrarian prosperity and opulence ever recorded on this continent.

That era lasted from 1897 to 1914 and aided with its first harvest of gold from the Allies really reached until the full effects of the great war overwhelmed us along with the rest of the world. That generation of young people who met the issues of life from the beginning of the century until this great depression began to take its toll in 1929 found it a golden age for youth.

It was during that period of peace and prosperity that the world made a great surge forward as triumphant as the depression has been devastating. In that golden era science, art, and industry made gigantic strides all alike glorious for youth and its dreams.

I have in mind an episode that vividly illustrates the rapidity with which the face of the whole industrial and mechanical world has changed as if overnight.

If you will forgive a personal reference, I recall a most dramatic story told to me over 40 years ago by my father, the Reverend Joseph Guyer, when I returned for the holiday vacation from the University of Kansas where I was pursuing my legal studies. In October an old friend had visited him in central Kansas. They were boyhood and manhood friends, preached in the same church for over a quarter of a century, and were born in the same year—1828. I remember how my father laughed at Milton Wright because the bishop said that his boys were going to perfect a flying machine that would fly; how the venerable bishop had described that old biplane; how the boys had built a slide on the side of a sand dune; how one of them would lie down on the lower part of the plane while the other pushed him off; and that when he reached the bottom of the slide he had gained sufficient momentum to keep the air, 25, 50, and sometimes a hundred feet. And then, with all the audacity and finality of one who has demonstrated a proposition in geometry, Milton Wright exclaimed:

"When Wilbur and Orville find an agent to drive that machine, they'll fly like birds."

That was where my father laughed. The whole world laughed. Flying had been the jest of the ages ever since Icarus blossomed out in Greek mythology. The highest expression of impossibility was: "You might just as well try to fly," an expression so deeply rooted that it still persists in our language.

You might just as well have told my father that October day long ago that they would invent a delicate little instrument that would reach out its invisible arm across the continents and from the voiceless silence of the air steal the music of a thousand orchestras and fling it back across the hemispheres to ravish the ear of the earth in palace and cottage and hovel as to tell him that men would fly. You might as well have told him that this marvelous little instrument would stretch out its magic wand and gather up the words of a hundred orators a thousand miles away to charm the people with their eloquence as to tell him that men would fly. You might as well have told him that there was at that moment a boy over at Amherst College, 23 years of age, who on the 4th of March, 1925, would stand on the historic old portico of the Capitol at Washington and whisper his message to every nook and corner of this mighty land of ours, as to tell him that men would fly.

I wonder what my father would have thought if, in a moment of prophetic vision, Milton Wright would have told him that, before a third of a century had fallen into the abyss of the past, a boy 5 and 20 years of age would in 33 hours wrap about his youthful brow the chaplet of immortal fame by conquering the old Atlantic by cheating its hungry billows, and landing safely in the field of Le Bourget in Paris?

What are we going to do next? They tell me, sir, that they are going to dig down into the dusty archives of dead and forgotten centuries and reproduce the voices of those whose tongues have been sealed by the silence of death for thousands of years. They tell me that they will reproduce the golden voice of Him who walked by the side of the tideless sea of Galilee; of Him who whispered to all the world, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

That they will tune in on the 18th of June in 1815 and, amid the thunders of Waterloo, they will hear the conqueror of Napoleon pray, as he looked at his watch: "Oh, for night or Blücher." That they will pick up the 19th of November in 1863 and, over yonder on the soil of old Gettysburg, made sacred by the blood of our fathers, will hear a heartbroken voice begin:

"Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

Impossible, you say. Of course, it is impossible. That was precisely what my father told Milton Wright in October 1895, about the airplane. There is nothing impossible if the intellect of man centers upon it and thinks and dreams about it long enough.

For a thousand years before our fathers founded this blessed country of ours the great minds of the earth were centered upon one colossal question: "What are the rights of man?" How far can arbitrary power trample upon the rights of the individual? How far can the individual disregard the rights of society? Then, one day, a tall, tawny-haired son of old Virginia sat down at a colonial table and in 4 hours wrote all the conclusions of a thousand years of fighting and thinking into the Declaration of Independence, and that question was forever settled.

I repeat it, there is nothing impossible. If you have any respect for your reputation as a prophet, erase the word "impossible" from your vocabulary. There is nothing impossible for America so long as she is filled with youth that looks straight into the sun, that gazes across the far and radiant stretches of the sky, clear-eyed, clean-lived, lion-hearted, like that unconquerable Viking of the air, like that incomparable eaglet, unafraid.

I have spoken only of the enterprises of aviation and the radio. I might declare the same of the automobile industry and other new enterprises which started before the war of 1914 that have peopled our industrial centers with specialists in a dozen new industries that were born in the age of opportunity to which I have referred. These were the great creative victories of peace with its healthful prosperity and progress. Will such another age come again?

That is a vital question to this class of 1940. I answer in the affirmative. Since 1929 we have had a state of stagnation. The whole world was for a time staggered by the impact of this world-wide depression following the World War. In France and England it was comparatively over in about 5 years. On account of the application of new theories which either have functioned miserably or have not had time to properly develop, our depression has persisted until some people have concluded that it will always be with us.

But this is the theory of the defeatist and has no place in the horizon of the class of 1940. Energies that have been chained and dammed up for years will soon again be liberated as they were in the past, so that the present generation of students may have an open field for the exercise of the energies which the good God has given them for the benefit of mankind.

These energies, like electricity produced by some giant dynamo, are stored up for future use, and when once we make the proper connection with the forces and the material we shall experience the normal conditions which are the heritage of those who live in this opulent continent.

About 90 years ago the compilers of the Encyclopedia Britannica in making a survey of the earth with reference to just how many people could be supported on this North American Continent, working on the well-known theory that where a soil and climate will provide a livelihood for a certain number of people the people will in due time arrive, declared that the soil of this continent would support 2,600,000,000 people and that at the rate of German and English increase in population there would be on this continent that number in A D. 2400.

With such wealth under our feet what has not the youth of this favored land to look forward to? Do not judge the future of this country by what you have seen the past 10 years; for soon government will take its cold, clammy hand from paralyzed industry, and when once liberated, free enterprise will employ the idle people to produce for this ever-increasing population. This vast rich land was never patterned for an almshouse nor for a free-lunch counter.

All this country needs is an industry that can put the people back on the pay roll and it will blossom as the rose, but it never will until a revivified private industry has the opportunity to fill its pay rolls once more. Then agriculture, famishing for a market, will flourish again and every form of enterprise will prosper. Then it will not be a question of curtailing the output of agriculture but the task of feeding the world around us. Then the teacher, the physician, the lawyer, and the business executive will again come into his own.

There has not been a single giant enterprise established in the past decade. No recent new world-embracing invention has been developed. What a virgin field for the youth of today. What a world of radiant paths for the elastic steps of youth! The inventive mind of man has stored up unnumbered new prizes to challenge the mind of youth. Upon each one, giant industries will rise. Television and a dozen other half-solved problems clamor for solution.

So much concerning the material opportunities awaiting this new generation, eager with its infinite enthusiasm and ample ability.

What of the finer aspects of life, literature and art? The world was never so ripe for a renaissance of the finer decencies of life and letters. After a sort of revolt against civilization, a kind of drunken debauch which came in the wake of the Great War, we are ready for a forward surge in art and literature, in painting, sculpture, music, and poetry.

The post-war period, with its retrogression, produced little of which we could boast. Our best sellers could not go through the United States mail without violating the Federal statutes against obscenity. I have said that there had not been painted a picture since the war that had caught the gaze of the public eye for its beauty or thought, but I can say this no longer, for last week in the rotunda of the Capitol of the United States we unveiled Howard Chandler Christy's masterpiece, The Signing of the Constitution, which is the greatest historical painting of this continent—a great creative and constructive work. One might say the same thing about sculpture with the exception of Borglum's creation at Mount Rushmore, which rivals the massive grandeur of ancient Egypt.

While the world is famished for good music, one cannot turn on the radio without being feloniously assaulted by a nightmare of jazz.

What about drama? The cinema? The silver screen, or shall we just term it all "the movies?" Here we find sensuality enthroned; sex deified; vice and crime lionized. Literature, art, music, and the drama constitute the mirror which should reflect the soul life of the people, the stream upon whose bosom should be etched the intellectual and moral life of the Nation. We must not censure too much the stream if when we look upon its surface it sends back a picture black with diabolism and lechery.

Here is a fertile field for the young men and women of 1940. I believe there is a demand for better books, better music, and better art. The public, I believe, is surfeited with salacious literature and risqué dramas and movies. I am sure the public taste is improving for the finer things of life and is willing to pay for them.

Here, I believe, is the challenge of the educated, cultured youth of 1940. It is not a hopeless field, for I believe the people are awakening to the unenviable attitude of so many of their fellow Americans in regard to their conduct and the encouragement which has been afforded to the baser and coarser products of what should be the finer arts of peace and sanity; a turning toward the God of our fathers who guided us alike in peace and war, in prosperity and in poverty. May that good God protect us alike from the flames of war and the no less consuming retrogression that follows in its wake.

Finally, I wish every member of this graduating class the highest happiness and the greatest prosperity which your efforts so richly deserve.

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by John T. Flynn from the Washington Daily News:

[From the Washington Daily News]

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

NEW YORK, June 13.—One of the grave errors being made by statesmen all over the world today is in fighting the wrong enemy.

For the last 8 years England was busy fighting Russia. She did not expect an invasion by Russia. She feared the Russian social system. She feared it might succeed. And, if it did succeed, her Tory ministers feared communism would spread to England.

Therefore England's whole foreign policy was based on isolating Russia, injuring Russia, and, as part of that, making up to Germany in the expectation and hope that Germany would be the barrier against Russia. A strong Germany might ultimately make war upon and destroy Russia.

What these men did not see was that there was a more terrible threat to England's democracy in Germany's fascism than in Russia's communism, because it was more terribly efficient and, so far as the rights of capitalist property were concerned, just as deadly. Now England faces her real enemy—fascist Germany and fascist Italy.

Now we in America face an enemy. That enemy is fascism. Put a little differently, it is the force that is slowly sapping the underpinnings of our capitalist, democratic society. We can fight that enemy. Or we can run off on a fool's adventure fighting some other enemy. We are doing the latter.

Nothing can take our democracy from us save the collapse of our economic system. If that collapse comes again, wild-eyed leaders will arise—wild statesmen of all kinds. There will be red leaders who will want to overturn our democracy and plunge us into the arms of communism. But they will not be very strong.

There will be reactionary leaders of the Hitler or Huey Long type who will seek to set up dictatorial governments. Between them all will be the bewildered liberal groups—workers out of work, starving farmers and city dwellers on one side, and on the other shopkeepers, businessmen, "white collar" workers horrified at the threat to the economic system which they want to preserve. What will happen? It is easy to foresee.

The frightened, conservative groups will be far stronger, far more intelligent, far more influential than the radical group. They will have the funds, the organs of opinion, the radio, all the instrumentalities of society. They will throw that strength on the side of some disguised fascism which will crack all our democratic safeguards, all our cherished ways of life.

But none of this can happen unless we have an economic crisis. There is one sure way to produce that economic crisis. That is to go into this war. There is only one way to avoid it—to stay out of this war and correct the conditions which make 11,000,000 people idle.

We are not, however, bothering about this enemy today. Instead, we are fighting Hitler. We are directing our attack against the wrong enemy, as England did, and we shall pay the same price.

America, Awake

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD copies of three editorials from the Darien Review, Darien, Conn., written by one of our former colleagues, the Honorable Alfred N. Phillips, Jr., of Connecticut. While these are not necessarily my own views, I am sure that the Members of the House would be interested in knowing the sentiments of a former distinguished Member of this body.

The editorials are as follows:

[From the Darien (Conn.) Review of May 16, 1940]

AMERICA, AWAKE

To the Readers of the Darien Review:

In the 17 years during which the Review Corporation has published the Darien Review I, as president of this corporation, have purposely withheld endeavoring to impose my ideas upon the readers of the Darien Review because I feel that a newspaper has an obligation to the community in which it is published—this obligation transcending any personal connections and aspirations of the publisher, especially if he is in public life. Now, however, I believe that the situation which confronts us is so dangerous that I take this opportunity to appeal directly to every reader of this newspaper.

While in Washington, as Representative of this congressional district, I felt that it was my duty to do everything I could for a stronger national defense even in the face of hostile criticism and ridicule as a "militarist," as a "warmonger," and as a "red baiter." However, I believe events have unfortunately borne out the wisdom of my judgment. I cite the past only to point out the possibilty that present or future predictions may not be ill-founded.

I call upon the people of Darien and the people of the United States everywhere to awake. Immediately communicate with your Governor, with your representatives in the legislature, with your Representatives in the United States Congress and support the President to the end that we are prepared in a military sense. Just the other day, in conversation with a prominent and high-ranking soldier, I learned that we are sadly lacking not only in antiaircraft guns, in medium caliber artillery such as antitank guns and in small arms, but actually in uniforms. Our Navy has aked for money for various purposes, including the making and placing of protective steel nets across the entrances to such bodies of water as Narragansett Bay, but our Representatives in Washington, including Representative AUSTIN from this district, voted against it. Our Navy has repeatedly recommended the fortification of the island of Guam, in the Pacific, and testified that in the event of war with Japan, the Japanese Fleet would be held up 2 whole weeks because of Guam being a fortified spearhead against attack; and yet our Representatives in Washington, including Representative AUSTIN from this district, voted against this. Two weeks would have meant a great deal to the people of Norway, Holland, and Belgium.

The National Guard is not numerous enough, together with our small Regular Army, to give us sufficient men for defense. Even so, employers are grumbling about letting National Guard men have 3 weeks away from employment for military training this summer. Also, it has been repeatedly testified that our Navy cannot be divided—it is a one-ocean Navy, or else it can be successfully attacked; and yet there are those in Washington who are trying to keep down our naval appropriations to "save money."

If our National Guard is called out, as it will be this summer, for military maneuvers or otherwise, who will protect us at home? Who will protect our waterworks, our telephone exchanges, our power plants, our bridges, and the electrification system of our railroads in case of some quickly operated subversive attack? Why do we not immediately organize, equip, and train a home guard to substitute for the National Guard in emergency, this home guard to be composed of "modern minute men"—men too old or too young for immediate military service, but capable of home defense?

It was testified before the House Naval Affairs Committee in Washington, of which I was a member, that if two cities in the United States were bombed out of existence we would not be able to put any new airplanes in use because these two cities furnish practically all of the airplane engines in the United States, one of these cities being in Connecticut, the other in New Jersey. Why do we not decentralize the production of such necessary war equipment so that a thousand plants all over the United States make such parts, some plants duplicating the work of others, so that if one plant is blotted out of existence the other can carry on?

Let us awake and let us prepare. Democrats, appeal to your Democratic Party organization for preparedness and against those who would hold us back. Republicans, appeal to such outstanding candidates of yours as VANDENBERG, of Michigan, who right now is holding back military preparedness. Independents, let it be known that you will not stand for a further delay in adequate military preparedness which is endangering the very safety of your loved ones.

What protects America right now against hostile attack with our fleet in Hawaii (where it probably should be to protect our rubber and tin supply from the East Indies to the United States) and with no fleet on the eastern seaboard, and the Panama Canal easily destroyable, with no adequately equipped army to protect us against a "lightning stroke"? How do we know that the Germans haven't a huge fleet of Zeppelins ready to fly thousands of men over here for the invasion of America under the protection of a cloud of war planes?

Let us awake and let us prepare or we face the fate of the small neutral countries of Europe.

AMERICA, AWAKE

To the Readers of the Darien Review:

Events have moved swiftly since my last week's message on national defense to the readers of the Darien Review. Since then both Houses of Congress have taken prompt action to appropriate more funds for national defense, this action being taken after the personal appearance of the President before a joint session of the Congress for the purpose of discussing the shocking state of our lack of military preparedness. Activities have been legion along the line of building up our sadly lacking defenses. But these are only "on paper," so far. Months of hard, intense work will be needed to consummate all of this.

In the State of Connecticut the Governor has recognized the seriousness of the situation by placing armed guards on 24-hour duty in our armories and in announcing the organization of a State guard—a home guard, just as suggested in last week's message to you—to complement the work of the National Guard and serve when the National Guard is in camp.

However, this is not enough in view of the critical situation in Europe as affects those whose political philosophies are more like ours. If they perish, we stand a chance of perishing, too. When the Chief of Staff of the United States Army testifies that there are only 441 antiaircraft guns in the whole United States (compared with some 700 in the London area alone), and that we haven't arms, ammunition, equipment, or uniforms for more than 75,000 men, and that it will take 2 years to build adequate seacoast guns and when such an expert on flying as Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker says that we will need hundreds of thousands of trained men to carry out the aviation-defense program of the President—and we certainly need this program—then we are in a sad plight indeed.

Also, it is shocking to visualize our condition if the British Fleet is turned over to Germany, also realizing that our fleet is not large enough to defend both of our seacoasts at once.

Let us arm, let us arm, let us arm. Let us organize immediately for national defense, for home defense. Let us build up the Regular Army, Navy, Marine Corps, National Guard, and Aviation Corps. Let us fill up the Connecticut National Guard by draft if necessary, to needed strength. Let us organize an adequate home-defense corps.

Communicate with your Governor and your representatives in the legislature and the United States Congress, to aid in all of this.

Let us work 24 hours a day for preparedness, to the end that airplanes, battleships, and war machinery and war munitions are provided. And let us decentralize our manufacturing so that our means of defense cannot be easily blotted out.

Let us unite and immediately get ready to resist any and every kind of invasion, and thus avoid the destruction of our loved ones, our form of government, our religion.

[From the Darien (Conn.) Review of May 29, 1940]

AMERICA, AWAKE—LET US HAVE UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

Events and information have amply demonstrated our serious lack of defense. Trained soldiers capable of meeting the onslaughts of trained European soldiers cannot be made overnight. Courage and initiative have their place. However, these must be coupled with military training to make a soldier not only capable of meeting a trained enemy but also able to defend himself in such a fashion that the enemy cannot take advantage of him because of his lack of knowledge.

It is splendid to have our National Guard—even a stronger National Guard. It is necessary to have a home guard for home defense when the National Guard is called out. However, if we add together the total number of those in the Regular Army and in the Regular Army Reserve, the National Guard, and the proposed home-defense units, we still are far short of the numbers needed for adequate national defense—trained national defense.

Therefore let us no longer delay, let us not temporize with our security, with our liberties, while civilization as we have known it in the world crashes like a bombed house over our heads.

Let us have universal military service immediately for all of those young men who have reached the age of 18 years.

Let us house these young men well. Let us feed these young men well. Let us train them adequately immediately to defend their mothers, their sisters, their homes, their liberties, and their religions against those who look with longing eyes gloatingly upon our huge silver hoard stored at West Point, our huge gold hoard stored in Kentucky, our Territories and our insular possessions—and who would destroy us if for no other reason than because we are the last bulwark of democracy and Christianity in this "new" barbaric world.

Let us arm, let us arm, let us arm. Let us organize immediately for national defense—for home defense. Let us build up the Regular Army, Navy, Marine Corps, National Guard, and Aviation Corps. Let us organize an adequate home-defense corps.

Let us have universal military service.

Communicate with your Governor and your representatives in the legislature and the United States Congress, to aid in all of this.

Let us work 24 hours a day for preparedness to the end that airplanes, battleships, and war machinery and war munitions are provided. And let us decentralize our manufacturing so that our means of defense cannot be easily blotted out.

Let us unite and immediately prepare to resist any and every kind of invasion and thus avoid the destruction of our loved ones, our form of government, our religion.

Deportation of Harry Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER H. GROSS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, not being a lawyer I cannot discuss the legal side of this, but I want to express the feeling of the man on the street or behind the plow, those good people who love liberty and never use it as a license.

Last fall I was in the Canal Zone and contacted about 40 officers of the Army, Navy, as well as of the air force, and every one of them asked the same question, "Why don't you in Congress get rid of the Communists?"

Why do not you get rid of Harry Bridges? An officer in the Army Intelligence Service said the Communists are Americas greatest threat. If our armed forces fear them how can anyone in this body defend them? The Secretary of Labor has refused to take action, as well as defended them, and we have had to listen to the chairlady of the committee defend Bridges on this floor. Bridges has called up the Secretary of Labor from California on the long-distance telephone as often as several times a week. If the administration had not defended this hell-raiser he would have been deported long ago. He is guilty of nearly all the crimes on the calendar. He should not be deported, but shot on American soil as a warning to all of his kind.

If They Vote To Go Home, Vote To Keep Them There

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEONARD W. HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to place myself on formal record as being utterly opposed to the adjournment of the Congress, in line with the plans of Mr. Roosevelt and his leaders on both sides of the Capitol.

If there ever was a time for us to remain on the job to discharge our responsibilities, and to service the present needs of our country, it is now.

The people have a right to learn what is going on; they have a right to make their opinions known; and they have a right to expect that Congress will remain on the job to do every needed thing and to prepare for every development that can be reasonably anticipated.

If Mr. Roosevelt, through pressure on his New Deal majority, can force the adjournment of Congress the people will be thoroughly helpless and thoroughly out of touch with their Government, except through such communiques that Mr. Roosevelt may issue from time to time on the state of the Nation.

The people of this country are not willing to trade democratic processes for White House communiques, not yet, or ever. The country, in my opinion, is determined not to suspend our constitutional functions in favor of one-man rule.

To adjourn the Congress now would be to adjourn the right of the people to representation, in every matter touching the present crisis, in the only forum which is wholly theirs.

Protests from all over the country are deluging Washington against this administration's plan to adjourn this Congress. The editorial in the Washington Daily News of June 12 typifies what, I am confident, is the opinion of all of our people. Under leave to include it as a part of my own remarks, I append it here. It is as follows:

IF THEY VOTE TO GO HOME, VOTE TO KEEP THEM THERE

Within a few days Congress may be called upon to cast the most important vote of 20 years.

That will happen if administration leaders persist in their effort to force an adjournment.

Any Congressman who does vote to adjourn and go home should be commanded by his constituents to remain at home.

Any elected representative of the people who is so insensible of his Constitutional obligations that he would voluntarily abandon his post at a time like this is, we believe, unfit for the responsibility of service in Congress.

The terrible conflict in Europe goes rapidly from bad to worse. Any day may bring the need for fateful decisions involving our Nation's peace and security. Borrowed billions have been laid on the line for rearmament. But to turn dollars into weapons in the quantities needed, old industries will have to be invigorated and new ones created. Only Congress can do what is necessary to mobilize idle capital and manpower for this supreme task.

Overnight it may become not a matter for academic debate but an imperative necessity to order compulsory military training and conscript men for defense duty. Congress alone has that power and responsibility.

Our Government has operated in the red through 11 years of apparent peace and security. Confronted now with need for gigantic new defense expenditures, nothing substantial has been done to weed out old wastes, and the only tax proposal yet made won't even balance the nonmilitary outgo. Congress is the Nation's fiscal guardian.

Yet it is suggested that Congress pack up and go home. It is suggested that if an "emergency" should arise the President will summon Congress back to a special session—a procedure which requires several days in a period where there may be no day to spare. Incidentally, an adjournment and a special session summons would mean that the lawmakers would be legally entitled to collect travel allowance, at 20 cents a mile, to their homes and back to Washington. No such allowances are legal if Congress merely recesses a few days at a time through the summer. We would accuse no Congressman of wanting to be a mileage patrioteer.

But we repeat that any who votes to go home at a time like this ought to be made to stay there—and very probably will be.

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in order to give the Members of Congress a clearer understanding of the insidiousness of the propaganda employed by the administration and others who are set on involving us in war, I quote a letter sent from the Polish Embassy in Washington to the Polish Minister in Warsaw. This letter is self-explanatory, and gives revealing facts that Members of Congress ought to know.

Re internal political situation in United States of America (public opinion against Germany, the Jewish question).

TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS IN WARSAW:

Public opinion in America nowadays expresses itself in an increasing hatred of everything Fascist, hatred of Chancelor Hitler, and, in fact, everything connected with national socialism. Above all, propaganda here is entirely in Jewish hands. Jews own practically 100 percent of the broadcasting stations, cinemas, press organs, and periodicals. Although American propaganda is somewhat roughshod, and paints Germany as black as possible—they certainly know how to exploit religious persecutions and concentration camps—yet, when bearing public ignorance in America in mind, their propaganda is so effective that people here have no real knowledge of the true state of affairs in Europe. Nowadays the majority of Americans regard Chancelor Hitler and national socialism as the greatest evil and the greatest danger that have befallen the world.

The whole situation in this country constitutes an excellent forum for all classes of public speakers and for refugees from Germany and Czechoslovakia who are not backward in inflaming American public opinion with a torrent of anti-German abuse and vilification. All these speakers extol American liberty and compare it with conditions in the totalitarian countries. It is interesting to observe that in this carefully thought-out campaign—which is primarily conducted against national socialism—no reference at all is made to Soviet Russia. If that country is mentioned, it is referred to in a friendly manner and people are given the impression that Soviet Russia is part of the democratic group of countries. Thanks to astute propaganda, public sympathy in United States of America is entirely on the side of "red" Spain.

Side by side with this propaganda an artificial war panic is also created. Americans are induced to believe that peace in Europe is hanging by a thread and that war is inevitable. No effort is spared to impress upon the American mind that in the event of a world war the United States of America must take an active part in a struggle for freedom and democracy.

President Roosevelt was first in the field to give expression to his hatred of fascism. He had a twofold purpose in mind: Firstly, he wanted to divert American public opinion from difficult and complicated domestic problems, particularly, however, from the struggle that was going on between capital and labor. Secondly, by creating war panic and rumors of a European crisis, he wanted to induce Americans to endorse his huge program of armaments, as that program was in excess of normal American requirements.

Commenting on Roosevelt's first purpose, I must say that conditions on the American labor market are constantly growing worse—unemployment today already totals 12,000,000. Federal and State administrative expenditure is increasing daily. The billions of dollars which the Treasury spends on relief work is the only factor which at present maintains a certain amount of peace and order in this country. So far there have been only the usual strikes and local unrest. But no one can say how long this state subsidy will continue. Public agitation and indignation, severe conflicts between private enterprise and enormous trusts on the one hand, and with labor circles on the other, have created many enemies for Roosevelt and caused him many sleepless nights. As to Roosevelt's second purpose, I can only add that, as an astute politician and expert on American mentality, he has succeeded in quickly and adroitly diverting public opinion from the true domestic situation and interesting that opinion in foreign policy.

The modus operandi was perfectly simple. All Roosevelt had to do was to stage correctly, on the one hand, the menace of world war brought about by Chancelor Hitler, while on the other hand, a bogey had to be found that would gabble about an attack on the United States of America by the totalitarian countries. The Munich Pact was indeed a godsend to President Roosevelt. He lost no opportunity in translating it as France's and England's capitulation to bellicose German militarism. As people say in this country, Hitler drew a gun on Chamberlain. In other words, France and England had no choice and had to conclude a most shameful peace.

Furthermore, the brutal treatment meted out to the Jews in Germany as well as the problem of the refugees are both factors which intensify the existing hatred of everything connected with German national socialism. In this campaign of hatred, individual Jewish intellectuals such as Bernard Baruch, Lehman, Governor of New York State, Felix Frankfurter, the newly appointed Supreme Court Judge, Morgenthau, the Financial Secretary, and other well-known personal friends of Roosevelt have taken a prominent part in this campaign of hatred. All of them want the President to become the protagonist of human liberty, religious freedom, and the right of free speech. They want the President to punish all anti-Semitic agitation. This particular group of people, who are all in highly placed American official positions and who are desirous of being representatives of true Americanism, and as champions of democracy are, in point of fact, linked with international Jewry by ties incapable of being torn asunder. For international Jewry—so intimately concerned with the interests of its own race—President Roosevelt's ideal role as a champion of human rights was indeed a godsend. In this way Jewry was able not only to establish a dangerous center in the New World for the dissemination of hatred and enmity, but it also succeeded in dividing the world into two warlike camps. The whole problem is being tackled in a most mysterious manner. Roosevelt has been given the power to enable him to enliven American foreign policy and at the same time to create huge reserves in armaments for a future war which the Jews are deliberately heading for.

It is easy for American domestic policy to divert public opinion in this country from an increasing anti-Semitic feeling. This is done by talking of the necessity for defending faith and individual liberty against the menace of fascism.

JERZY POTOCKI,
Ambassador of the Republic of Poland.

I now quote another letter so that the Members of Congress may be better informed as to the extent which this administration has implicated the United States in the present European war:

PARIS, February —, 1939.

[Strictly confidential]

Embassy of the Republic of Poland.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS IN WARSAW:

A week ago the Ambassador of the United States, W. Bullitt, returned to Paris after a leave lasting 3 months, which he spent in America. Since his arrival I have had two long conversations with him, which enable me to inform you of his views with regard to the European situation and to give a survey of the policy in Washington.

1. There is no foreign policy in the United States aiming at taking any direct part in the development of conditions in Europe. Such a foreign policy would also be impossible, for it would not be sanctioned by public opinion, which in this respect has not altered its isolationist point of view. On the other hand, the American people show proof of an extraordinary strengthened interest in European affairs. Indeed, internal affairs are relegated to the background when compared with them and lose that attention which they formerly enjoyed. The international situation is considered by official circles to be extremely serious and threatened with the danger of an armed conflict. Those in authority are of the opinion that should it come to a war between Britain and France on the one hand and Germany and Italy on the other, in which Britain and France might suffer defeat, then the Germans might become a danger to the real interests of the United States on the American continent. For this reason the participation of the United States in the war on the side of France and Britain might be anticipated from the outset, but naturally only a certain time after the outbreak of war. Ambassador Bullitt expressed himself in these words:

"Should a war break out, we shall certainly not participate at the beginning, but we shall finish it."

In Ambassador Bullitt's opinion, the above-mentioned point of view of official Washington circles lacks all idealism, and results entirely from the necessity of defending the real interests of the United States, which in the case of a Franco-British defeat would simultaneously be seriously and directly threatened from the Pacific as well as from the Atlantic.

Ambassador Bullitt stated that the rumor that he had said to President Roosevelt that the frontier of the United States lay on the Rhine was false. On the other hand, he expressed his conviction that the President had most certainly said that he was sending airplanes to France, for the French Army was the first defense line of the United States. This, as a matter of fact, corresponded entirely with his own views.

2. Italian demands on France are absolutely devoid of any foundation and argument which might even justify them to some extent. France, therefore, cannot and may not make even apparent concessions. Any surrender on the part of France would mean the undermining of her prestige in Africa. For that reason every possible compromise at the cost of French interests must be avoided.

Speaking theoretically, the fear exists that Britain might possibly attempt with Berlin to force upon France, at a moment of tension, a compromise not reconcilable with her own interests. In such a case, France will be able to count upon the strong support of Washington. As far as Britain is concerned, the United States controls various and immensely important means of coercion. The mere threat to make use of them would suffice to cause Britain to withdraw from any policy of compromise at France's expense.

It is to be reckoned with that Britain's prestige has greatly suffered in the eyes of American public opinion through the events in the Far East and the results of the Munich Conference. On the other hand, American public opinion realizes how much Britain desires today collaboration with the United States, and its support.

Given these conditions, it must be assumed that Hitler and Mussolini would not allow Italian claims on France to be the reason for the commencement of an open conflict with Britain and France.

It is naturally a weak side of the United States that, although they have already now decided upon their standpoint in a possible case of conflict, nevertheless, at the same time they can take no active part in the positive solution of European problems as American opinion with its conception of isolation would not permit this.

3. The relation between leading American circles and Italy and Germany is negative, principally for the reason that although they are of the opinion that the recent successes of the Rome-Berlin axis, which undermine both the prestige and the authority of France and Britain as imperial powers, threaten almcst directly the real interests of the United States. Consequently the foreign policy of Washington will counteract any possible further development of the situation in this direction.

In their relations with Italy and Germany, the United States have at their disposal various means of coercion which are already being very seriously examined and organized. These means which are principally of an economic nature are such that they could be used without the slightest fear of any internal political resistance. Both for Rome and for Berlin they will undoubtedly be sufficiently effective and perceptible. Ambassador Bullitt is of opinion that any pressure exerted upon Italy and Germany by the United States on the one hand and by Britain on the other could in great measure prevent the outbreak of an armed conflict or avoid the development of the European situation in a direction which would be undesirable from the point of view of Washington.

Replying to my observation that from the present state of affairs it was not clear whether the United States would be prepared to fight Germany and Italy for the French colonies, or to fight for certain systems and ideologies. Ambassador Bullitt declared categorically that Washington's attitude would be solely determined by the real interests of the United States and not by ideological problems.

I must add that Ambassador Bullitt seems quite convinced of the ruthless resistance of France to the Italian demands, and consequently does not entertain any possibility of mediation on the part of Britain or perhaps of Britain and Germany, the aim of which would be a compromise at France's expense.

For the time being I should like to refrain from formulating my own opinion with respect to Ambassador Bullitt's statements. It is in fact my desire to obtain from him beforehand some additional explanations. One thing, however, seems certain to me, namely, that President Roosevelt's immediate policy will tend to support France's resistance, to stay the German-Italian pressure, and to weaken Britain's tendencies to compromise.

J. LUKASIEWICZ,
Ambassador of the Republic of Poland.

Memorandum by M. Jan Wszelaki, Polish Commercial Counselor, on a conversation with Mr. Joseph Kennedy, Ambassador of the United States of America, in London on June 16, 1939

[Strictly confidential]

Ambassador Kennedy, whom Ambassador Biddle had notified of my arrival in London, asked me to call on him. My visit lasted for three-quarters of an hour.

The following points are worthy of note:

1. The Ambassador began by asking me what the impression of Germany's economic situation was in Poland; he himself stressed the fact that he believed that Germany would be able for some time to go on ruining the world with expenditure on armaments and that she really seemed to have no alternative but war. In his opinion, any abandonment on the part of Germany of her line in politics, including her financial and economic policy, would be tantamount to a lost war for her. War, on the other hand, at least provided a certain possibility for Germany of enforcing her claims, and therefore, if pressed, she would not shrink from this eventuality. He commented somewhat scathingly on certain optimists who inclined toward the belief that Germany would be easily and rapidly conquered or who counted on a quick revolution in that country.

2. The Ambassador emphasized the fact that the western powers were being brought to the verge of bankruptcy if the present rate of armaments were to continue for any length of time. Even if there were no war during the current year, neither Great Britain nor the United States would discontinue or restrict their program of armaments. As a result, Great Britain had already privately provided for currency restrictions; it was already impossible to invest British capital abroad, or to transfer it to other countries, without permission of the Government. Each day was bringing fresh difficulties and limitations of this kind.

3. During the course of the conversation the Ambassador asked me about the situation in Poland and our requirements, which provided me with an opportunity of taking up the subject at greater length. The Ambassador said that we were the only people in eastern Europe whose armaments, and also whose military qualities, could be relied upon with absolute certainty. He mentioned his opinion that the Polish volunteers on the republican side in Spain had proved themselves superior as soldiers to all others on either side. He asked what we required from Britain in the way of material and financial assistance. I answered by giving an outline of the situation in general, repeating, to a certain degree, the introductory statement which Colonel Koc had made in front of the Englishmen the day before. I drew special attention to the cash credit. The Ambassador asked me how much cash we were demanding from the British. I answered by stating that we were informing them of our needs in this respect. The sum total of these needs, once they had been fixed by joint agreement, would then show the total cash required. The Ambassador agreed that the cash was the essential point and stated that if the British were going to limit their assistance in this respect at the present moment, they would have to provide 10 times the amount later on in order to obtain the same results. He added that he would see the Prime Minister and Lord Halifax and would insist on the necessity of aiding Poland immediately with cash.

4. In conclusion the Ambassador mentioned that his two sons, who had recently traveled all over Europe and had seen and learned a great many things, intended, after their return to the States, to deliver a series of lectures at Harvard University on the situation in Europe and in the various countries.

The Ambassador attaches great importance to these lectures since they would be largely responsible for the trend of American public opinion. "You cannot imagine," said the Ambassador, "to what an extent my eldest boy, who has recently been in Poland, is able to influence the President. I should say that the President believes him more than he does me. Perhaps because Joe pictures the situation with such conviction and enthusiasm."

I am to see the Ambassador again next week and meet his son.

LEGATION OF THE POLISH REPUBLIC IN STOCKHOLM,
Stockholm, April 15, 1939.

TO THE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, WARSAW:

In connection with the report of the 8th of April of the current year No. 19/3/4, the legation communicates that further information received on the subject of the sojourn of Minister Hudson on Stockholm proves that he has not met with great success in this territory.

It seems that Minister Hudson showed too little ability in the conducted conversations here and ever antagonized the native agricultural elements.

As I was informed by one of the prominent representatives of the financial world here, Hudson probed this country as to the attitude of the Swedes in case of war, suggesting the necessity of detaining all the exports of raw materials to the Germans.

The Swedes then gave him to understand that they wished to retain their neutrality, and in case of war the Baltic will be seized by the Germans, and as a consequence they will not be able to avoid supplying ore. The situation evidently would be different if the Baltic would be in control of the English.

During the conference with the press, Hudson, it seems, urgently insisted on the necessity of enlarging the English imports to Seecen, giving to understand that the outcome of the foreseen endeavors of the delegation of the agricultural spheres would not give results, English would have to consider the revision of the commercial treaty. That prospect, as my informer told me, does not, however, frighten the Swedes. According to him, that treaty is not very profitable, since it contains hard clauses for the Swedes in respect to coal which they could buy cheaper elsewhere.

However, Sweden can also learn something from the demands put on her by England. Sweden's constant efforts to persuade other countries to buy Swedish goods which she can sell them only with the help of treasury subsidies, institute by themselves a dangerous diversion from a healthy management. This subsidized export weighs constantly over negotiations for trade agreements and institute for the country accepting this export the starting point for ever-growing demands for increasing its exports to Sweden. At home one often forgets the harmful side of this subsidized policy. The last effort of England was originated to use to advantage her power as a great importer in order to provide for herself a wider market in Sweden.

Goteborgs Handels-och Sjofarts Tidning from the 12th of April comments on Cassel's articles and showed the deductions. The paper especially points out to the English that the majority of their imports from Sweden consist of important raw materials and semi-manufactured goods necessary for its industry, such as wood and paper pulp, and that they buy them because of necessity and not from good will. And what concerns the subsidized exports dairy products, especially butter, which the English, thanks to the subsidy, received at a price 60 percent lower than their Swedish consumers; so if the gift to the English hurts them nothing is easier than to decrease the passivity of the commercial balance of England by this import from Sweden.

The general who from the beginning fought those subsidies as harmful for the economy of Sweden and the difficult way of promoting agriculture and dairy production thinks that it would be to the advantage of Swedish economy if the subsidy for the export of butter were abolished, the prices for the domestic consumption lowered, and the production directed toward other channels.

I have placed these remarks in the RECORD in order to inform Members of Congress and the people of this Nation about actual facts as they exist between our Government and that of foreign nations. Surely no one reading these reports will, for one moment, absolve our own Government from intrigue, and certainly not excuse anyone from the Executive to those who represent this Government in its foreign relations. This has all been done without any knowledge of Congress, and after all it is the legislative branch which is responsible for the security of this Nation. The time has come when each and every man in the Congress of the United States must lay all political thoughts aside and join hands in order to keep us from becoming involved in the present European conflict, which this correspondence clearly shows is the policy upon which this administration has embarked.

I have more of these letters, and it is my firm opinion they should be printed so that this information may be available to every Member of this Congress of the United States.

Against Adjournment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, Congress must not adjourn. In my campaign for election to Congress in 1938 I made the statement on several occasions and from various platforms that the country was due for a great upheaval, and that catastrophe would face us before another election. My conclusions, then made as a result of careful previous study, have now been borne out, and we all know now just how serious a situation we face. We should not even think of adjourning. I knew when I came here that this Seventy-sixth Congress would be another very important 76 in our national history.

Some Members feel that they must get home to campaign and to build their political fences. I feel that the grateful and patriotic people back home will do our campaigning for us if we stay on the job here for them and take care of their problems as we should. Even if defeated, we should do this, because it is our pledged duty under our solemn oath of office.

Rather than to adjourn, let the 531 Members of Congress concentrate their efforts and ingenuity on our national problems and on the preservation of peace, and we can certainly feel then that we have done our duty.

I have received already in this morning's mail over 50 messages from citizens of our State demanding that we stay on the job here. Every mail brings another deluge. One woman writes as follows:

Note what you say about Congress adjourning the 22d. Pretty risky business to go away and leave one man in charge. He may have us in the midst of the war before we know it. Some people think that we are in duty bound to mix into it, but it must be they haven't sons who would have to give their sweet young lives.

A telegram from a business group is very definite on the subject and reads as follows:

JUNE 12, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Personal Delivery, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned think it most important that Congress remain in session during the much-talked-of crisis, if one actually exists. We also regard the defense program as urgent, and earnestly ask your support. It is our opinion that if this country faces a great emergency the blame rests directly upon a policy of meddling and of too intemperate talking. Let's set matters right in our own country before attempting world-wide reformation. We insist upon no foreign interference in this hemisphere. Why should we interfere in the affairs of Europe?

Mr. Speaker, Congress must not adjourn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 2, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] indulged in smearing me by proxy and subtly attempted to fit me with the alleged crimes of people I do not know. In other words, he tried to fit me with a coat which, I believe, is a size which fits the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] himself better and is, therefore, also suitable to the N. S. A. N. L.

I replied to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] on May 6, not by personal attack upon him or upon the members of the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League. I discussed, instead, the purpose of the league, which seems to be boycott and racial agitation to bring about hatreds toward those they designate as their enemies; a league which in reality expects that the majority of the American people must conform to the wishes of those who comprise the leadership of this un-American organization.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and his people have not at any time even attempted to disprove statements which I have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I am sure that, did I deviate from facts in one paragraph, such error on my part would be used to flay me and to tear my reputation asunder.

Why are the national press, the Communist press, the Jewish press, Jewish organizations, Jews in general, Jewish broadcasters, Jewish stooges, and Jewish Members of Congress employed in a campaign to slander me, a plain individual, Member of the lower House, and one of the common people? Is it not because my statements are true? Is it not because my statements have been based upon what the Jews say about themselves in their own books? Is it not because the data I use and the statements I make are based upon documented information taken from State papers and from World War intelligence reports? I know, from the information I have, that members of the "fifth column" who operated as enemies of the United States during the World War, had their offices in Wall Street. They were, indeed, the big-wigs among the international financial exploiters.

Can anyone be so naive as to believe that I would not be ridiculed, satirized, and condemned by my own statements were even one of them untrue? These international mud-slingers have not even pretended to meet me on common ground. They have been no fairer to me than they are to the average American who believes in the fundamental principles of our Republic. They do not deal intelligently with any subject, for they try instead to confuse the people by misquotation and deliberate false statements. In this they often go too far in their attacks, which is clearly proved by their apologies to me for statements made in The Voice, and for satisfaction in a suit against the author of a book which libeled other Members of Congress and myself.

The gentleman from Illinois bemoans the fact that I have written 420 columns in the RECORD. How terrible, indeed, when the New Deal has wasted billions of dollars without the slightest relief or reduction in the ranks of the unemployed. What a dreadful thing it is to inform our own people about actual facts. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and his masters now object to anyone who, in pursuance of obligated duty to the people of this Nation, apprises them of those who are now actively engaged in sabotage of industries and destruction of the Government of this Republic.

I regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and his people condone the activities of the "fifth column," and I particularly regret that the gentleman himself does not honor his obligation and inform the people of this Nation of the real facts.

My remarks have been inserted in the RECORD in order to protect innocent American Jews who are in no sense responsible for the activities of the international financiers who backed the World War, the communistic revolution in Russia, the communistic revolution in France, and who are now the sugar daddies of the "fifth column" in the United States, which is operating under the benevolent protection of the New Deal, its leaders, and other hidden rulers to whom I have often referred as the invisible Government of the United States.

My reason for informing the people about the actual situation which now confronts us in the United States is to protect the Jews who have dropped the hyphen and become, like the rest of us, plain American citizens. My remarks have been inserted in the RECORD to save the innocent when the American people finally discover the real identity of the "fifth column" and its financial sponsors.

I shall ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] or those who wrote his speech to answer the following question: Why do the international Jews label everyone who refuses to lick their boots anti-Semitic? Why not call them anti-Jew, and stop trying to fool the people by designating those who expose international intrigue as anti-Semitic, when they are, instead, pro-American, or let me say, just plain ordinary American citizens with our country's interest at heart. If the Jew discovers someone who does not like him, why not call him anti-Jew and be done with it? Such statement would be more proper and would certainly be much more appropriate than the pseudonyms now employed by the international financial Jewish organizations.

Do you not believe it would be ridiculous for a people who have, by hook or crook, obtained control of gold, money, and credit, to ask for help from those they have deprived of gold, sound money, and secured investments? Do you not believe it would be ridiculous for a people who are engaged in large-scale national and international banking, and who own or control our daily press, radio, movies, news service and distribution, newsstands and the major parts of major industries, to ask us, who have nothing, to help them and to protect them from being attacked or discovered by the very people who have been deprived of their property? Do you not believe it would be ridiculous for a people who control alcohol production, gambling, lending agencies, pawn shops, and all governments with the exception of Germany, Italy, and possibly Japan, to ask us, the American people, to help them and to sacrifice the lives of our young men in order to keep them in control, and to go to war with such nations as object to their domination? Do you not think it is ridiculous for a people who control national and world industries and whose people are fully employed in such industries and in the Government of the United States, to complain or to revile those who are trying to rehabilitate this Nation and return it to the principles of sound constitutional government?

A distinction must, however, be drawn, for I realize that there are people among us of Jewish descent or Jewish parentage who are unemployed, but it must be remembered that they are Americans as they are not in sympathy with the international Jew and his ambition. They are, therefore, treated by him as he treats other ordinary, plain American citizens, namely, with the utmost contempt and inconsideration.

Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 2, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], indirectly, by referring to others, attempts to implicate me in their presumed crimes in order to label me "Nazi." Mr. Speaker, on inquiry as to the meaning of the word "Nazi," I find it is an abbreviation for "national socialism," and it is socialism and its more streamlined brother, communism, that I opposed and condemned in 1938, and which I hold in utter contempt today.

The word "Nazi" is, therefore, not applicable to anyone who opposes communism or socialism. Neither is "Nazi" applicable to anyone who believes in the fundamental principles of this Republic.

I defy anyone to find one paragraph, sentence, or word in any of my remarks or any statements that I have ever made that are not in the strictest accord with the fundamental principles of this Republic as set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

I also defy anyone—and that goes for the Jewish Intelligence Service, too—to find where I have been connected in even the slightest degree with any foreign government service.

I came to this country from Norway in 1892. I served in the Merchant Marine, the Revenue Service, and volunteered with the Virginia Naval Reserves; was petty officer in charge of the U. S. S. Siren in 1899, and continued to serve in the Merchant Marine until 1907, when I took up the study of medicine at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Baltimore, Md. I have been connected with the Merchant Marine and United States naval forces for over 20 years, and in 1935, enlisted again by request, in order to help reorganize medical units for the thirteenth naval district. I was 59 years old at this, my last enlistment, and after having spent 14 days in a hospital following an operation, I, to comply with orders from the commanding officer of the thirteenth naval district, drove to Boise, Idaho, a distance of 526 miles, to organize a medical unit. I made that trip 5 days after being discharged from the hospital, and drove approximately 1,050 miles, in the middle of the winter, when the mountain passes and roads were covered with snow.

In 1936, I spent 2 months with the fleet on its battle-problem cruise. In 1937, I served in the United States Navy again, during two periods, for training and as chief medical officer aboard the U. S. S. 57, on a trip to Canada.

My service record is in the Bureau of Navigation, and anyone who so desires may, as far as I am concerned, examine that record.

I therefore challenge the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and any others who have accused me, to prove the statements which they have made in regard to my patriotism.

I admit that I am rabidly opposed to Marxian socialism, nazi-ism, and communism, and for that I apologize to no one.

It is unfortunate that Jewish commentators on the air and in the papers should see fit to use their positions to revile and abuse me, without ascertaining whether or not they are dealing with facts. Their attitude is incomprehensible to Jewish friends whom I have in my community, for they know that I have never looked upon them in any other manner than as Americans.

It was only after I came here and found that alien-minded international Jews, such as the Warburgs, dominate the Federal Government and occupy many major positions, especially in its departments, that I realized that we are as Jew-dominated as England and France, and as Germany was until 1933.

Here in the House, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] objects to remarks which I have inserted in the RECORD, but he has not been able to contradict any sentence in my remarks. Like the rest, he only resorts to name calling, which, if nothing else, but proves the truth of the statements that I have made. As a matter of fact, his objections are not to my remarks but to the space they occupy in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that, Mr. Speaker, I contend, is a matter for the Joint Committee on Printing and for the House to decide.

The only issue taken with my remarks is in regard to the so-called House letter, and, Mr. Speaker, this letter may be found unsigned in the 1928 and 1929 volume on the Geneva hearings in the Senate of the United States, and it was, therefore, a Government record of 12 years ago. I shall, however, refer to this later.

I may also say at this point that I have not at any time attacked any Member of this House, indirectly or directly, by inference or otherwise, and it is not my desire to do so now, for I am only concerned in establishing my position as it is recorded in the service of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] yesterday objected to the inclusion with my remarks of photostats of letters which bear the original signatures, and are therefore as authentic as photostatic letters used by the Government in its questioning of witnesses before the Dies committee. If photostats of letters can be used to investigate private American citizens, they certainly should occupy the same status in proving that Ambassadors Bullitt, Biddle, and Kennedy have been engaged in international intrigue calculated to involve this country in the present European war—intrigue which is today verified by statements in the Washington Times-Herald. If the Members of this House could read the information in this book, they would not only recommend impeachment of our foreign ambassadors, but they would question the intentions of the Executive himself.

Mr. Speaker, I have these records here in my hand, and I believe, although it will take a little space, that it is the duty of Congress to insert this information in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the people of this Nation may be informed of the extent to which this administration has involved this Nation, without the consent or even the knowledge of the Congress of the United States.

Could the people be informed of the actual facts as they are set forth in this information that I have here on this table, no one in this country would consider our participation in any foreign war.

Mr. Speaker, the information contained here in this evidence which I have in my possession is substantiated—and I want to emphasize this—by the article which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald this morning.

THE NON-SECTARIAN ANTI-NAZI LEAGUE

The letter which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD May 2 from the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League infers that Mr. Pelley wrote a speech which I gave in New York, and which I inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2707. I flatly deny this, and I defy anyone to find one sentence in that speech that is not based upon the very essence of the Constitution itself. It is these very principles that the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League and other international Jews disclaim, and because of their unwillingness to accept these principles that I enunciate they resort to mud slinging and other forms of character assassination.

In order to inform the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League and their sympathizers of the real organizers of the Nazi government, or the National Socialist Government of Germany, I shall again quote an authority whom I do not believe the league can deny, and that gentleman is Rabbi Judah L. Magnus, now president of the University of Jerusalem. On January 16, 1919, he said:

It was Friedrich Julius Stahl, a born Jew, who laid down the classical theory of the German Nationalstaat based upon conservative Christianity and the politics of power. It was Benjamin Disraeli who is the father of the latter-day "tory democracy" of England. Just so, when the Jew gives his thought, his devotion, his spirit to the cause of the workers and of the dispossessed, of the disinherited of the world, the radical quality within him there, too, goes to the roots of things, and in Germany he becomes a Marx and a La Salle, a Haase, and an Eduard Bernstein. In Austria he becomes a Victor Adler and a Friedrich Adler; in Russia, a Trotzky.

Just take for the moment the present situation in Russia and in Germany. The revolution set creative forces free, and see what a large company of Jews was available for immediate service. Socialist revolutionaries and mensheviki and bolsheviki, majority and minority Socialists—whatever they be called; and I assume that it is not a question at all at this moment of agreeing or disagreeing with any one of them—Jews are to be found among the trusted leaders and the routine workers of all those revolutionary parties.

It should be evident from this that it was the Jews themselves who organized the Nazi, or National Socialist Government of Germany, and they now shout "Nazi" at me and at others who are opposed to socialism and communism and the very government that they themselves organized and established in Germany.

The letter from the Nonsectarian Anti-Nazi League, which Mr. SABATH quotes, raises this point—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5467:

Now, the Jews can be termed internationalists because of their religion and because of their racial group. Jews in the United States, England, France, Germany, Spain, Africa, South America, Canada, etc., are all Jews, and all have the same religion. But have you ever heard of the Catholics, Mr. THORKELSON? The American, English, Spanish, Italian, etc., Catholics all have the same religion. And how about the Protestants? Haven't the American, British, German, etc., Protestants the same religion? If their religion stamps the Jews as internationalists, how about the Catholics and Protestants?

In replying to this paragraph let me point out that a Catholic who claims Spain as his country is a Spaniard, and I, while of Norwegian descent and a Lutheran, claiming the United States as my country, look upon myself as an American. Religion does not affect citizenship. But a Jew living in Spain or any other country, as the letter states, considers himself first a Jew. To prove this let me quote from another distinguished gentleman, former Justice Brandeis:

Let us all recognize that we Jews are a distinct nationality of which every Jew, whatever his country, his station, or shade of belief, is necessarily a member. * * * Organize, organize, organize—until every Jew in America must stand up and be counted—counted with us—or prove himself, wittingly or unwittingly, of the few who are against their own people.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to dwell upon this letter from the Nonsectarian Anti-Nazi League to any great extent, for it is so illogical that little consideration should be given to any statements made in it. For instance, the writer makes this statement:

You state that ours is a democratic Republic. That means, if it means anything, that democracy and republicanism are the keystone of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more absurd than that statement, for the keystone of this Republic is based upon State representation in the Senate of the United States, and popular representation in this House of Representatives, and that is so set forth in the Constitution of the United States. In other words, the keystone of this Government of the United States is the Constitution—and not "democracy," which is communism, nor "republicanism," which is merely a political party and therefore immaterial to this discussion.

Mr. Speaker, while I was absent from the House, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 3006, an article and two letters, one from Emanuel Chapman and one from the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League. Both letters are libelous, but, I may say, no more than one would expect from either Mr. Emanuel Chapman or the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League.

In his remarks the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] incriminates me by insinuating that I am a fellow traveler of those he has designated as criminals. How can he know my thoughts or my sympathies? He must, of course, rely upon what I say, and my remarks made before the Christian Mobilizers appear in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 2707.

In the early part of his remarks he refers to the so-called House letter, which I have already said is a part of the Geneva hearings of the Senate, published in its hearings in 1928 and 1929. The letter appears in the hearings without signature, but is a part of the permanent records of Congress.

In my remarks accompanying the letter, I said to disregard the name appended to it, and the addressee of the letter, and I requested the Members to read the substance matter because it is important. The officers mentioned in the letter were decorated by the British Government, and are so recorded in the Whittaker's Almanac of 1919 and 1920, a book which may be found in the Library of Congress. The Carnegie remarks to which the letter referred were published in a bock entitled "Triumphant Democracy." In this, Mr. Carnegie expressed the hope that the wound that was left bleeding when the United States was separated from the British Empire may again be healed, and so restore the Empire. The same opinion was also expressed by Cecil Rhodes. This proves the substance matter of the letter which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 11, 1939, and it is that to which I referred when I advised the Members to read the report.

As to Colonel House, I can only refer the Members who are interested in his war activities to the book, Philip Dru, Administrator, and to his autobiography, which is an indictment in itself. They may also read Woodrow Wilson, Disciple of Revolution, and Propaganda for War. These and many other volumes give a picture of Mr. Edward Mandell House much more complete than I would attempt to set out in these remarks. In the Senate hearings, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, report 944, part 6, this statement was made:

The committee finds, on the basis of testimony and exhibits introduced into the record and discussed in chapter VI, Relation of Export Trade to United States Foreign Policy, 1915–16, that the essential problem in the submarine controversy between the United States and Germany lay in the matter of the status of armed merchantmen.

The committee is of the opinion that the unofficial negotiations of Colonel House, by which this private person sought to bring the United States into the war on the Allied side, contributed to the abandonment of the sound position in regard to armed merchantmen proposed by Secretary Lansing in the modus vivendi. The committee is, however, at a loss to account for the abandonment of this suggestion by the State Department merely in the face of the British refusal to consider it. The committee takes note, however, of the fact that the modus vivendi would have resulted in an increase in the effectiveness of the general blockade of the British Isles and an increased damage, correspondingly, to the American export trade in war materials. The committee also notes that use of the retaliatory powers to embargo war exports granted the President by Congress in September 1916 was rendered impossible by the discovery that their exercise would probably do more damage to American industry than to Great Britain.

I may say that this report is revealing, for it shows clearly and concisely that it was the financial international bankers, the House of Morgan, if you please, who were the main instigators in committing the United States to war in 1917.

I can very well recall 1917, when anyone who was seen in company with a person bearing a German name was considered to be pro-German, and I hope that we will never again allow ourselves to be stampeded by any sort of propaganda to bring about such ridiculous hysteria.

I do not want to go into a lengthy discussion of the remarks which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3006, but I want to call his attention to this fact:

The Jewish international press and the international Jews in the United States were openly pro-German until 1917, and subrosa pro-German during the period in which we were at war with Germany. Proof of this I have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on September 25, 1939, under the title, "Can the American People Be Fooled Again?" It was the House of Warburg and Mr. Shieff who furnished money to Lenin and Trotsky for the Communistic revolution in Russia, and it is these international bankers who are actually responsible for the loss of life in Russia which resulted from that revolution, and for communism as it now prevails throughout the United States. This money was furnished from New York, from Wall Street, if you please, from the financial fathers of the Communists in the United States, and this money was distributed through the Rhenish-Westphalian Syndicate, a Warburg organization in Germany, through the German Reichsbank and other Jewish financial controlled banks; through the Nya-Banken in Stockholm, the Hambro Bank in Norway, and through Haparanda, on the border of Sweden and Finland. It was through this latter city that much of the arms passed that were used by Lenin and Trotsky.

It is this information that I have set forth in my remarks in the House and my sole purpose in so doing has been to bring the truth before the people, the people who, in spite of the vicious propaganda that is trying to poison their minds, still believe in the fundamental principles of this Republic. To anyone who reads my remarks, this has been obvious, for I have not at any time deviated one iota from the basic principles of this Republic as set forth in our fundamental laws.

This is the position I have taken, for in spite of what may be said about me, I am not antiracial, anti-Semitic, anti-Jew, Nazi, or Fascist, but I am instead a plain, ordinary American citizen who believes in the fundamental principles of this Republic as set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH OF JUNE 11, 1940

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I have come to a realization that is now shared by a great many of us here and by a representative cross section of the press in this country, that Congress alone stands between this Nation and total war.

Let us not deceive the people further with false cries of neutrality. We are not neutral. We are merely nonbelligerent.

In connection with the hysteria that is creeping over our people and which has found expression even in the Congress, I wish to commend to the attention of every Member of this body, a great editorial from a great paper, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. I ask unanimous consent to conclude these remarks by extending that splendid editorial in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 11, 1940]

TO THE BRINK

President Roosevelt all but declared war yesterday.

He did not go all the way because, fortunately, this is still a democracy and, under our system, only the Congress of the United States, the elected representatives of the people, can declare war.

But the President, with his immense power, can lead the Nation to the brink. This is what Roosevelt has done.

The President opened his speech with the words: "Every generation of young men and women in America has questions to ask the world."

While the country is still at least technically at peace, while the Bill of Rights is still functioning, we are going to take advantage of it and ask the President some questions.

But, first of all, we should like to draw a very brief contrast between Franklin Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. Wilson led the United States into war in 1917 after a long period in which he did his agonizing best to keep us out of it. He led us into war only after a long series of overt acts by Germany against the United States—the sinking of our ships and the killing of our citizens.

This time there are no overt acts by Germany against the United States. Our ships are not being sunk. Our people are not being killed. Roosevelt, however, is doing his agonizing best to get us into the war. And he is doing so without the approval of public opinion. In contrast with the situation in 1917, we can now measure public opinion accurately. All the polls show that the people of the United States are overwhelmingly opposed to going to war.

Is this a democracy or isn't it? Are the people or their elected representatives to be consulted on a question of the utmost gravity—a question that involves the blood of American men—or not?

Is it not true that Roosevelt has proceeded along the very lines that Mussolini did, namely, to work up a war fever without permitting the Italian people to express their true convictions?

Is it not true that for a year or more Roosevelt has been so obsessed with foreign policy as to neglect domestic issues, and, worse, as to neglect the proper economic and military preparation of our country for the trying times that may be ahead?

Mr. Roosevelt, of course, sincerely believes that the defeat of the Allies would endanger the United States, and this sentiment is shared by millions of his countrymen, including this newspaper, but what is the sensible thing to do under the circumstances? Is it to enter the war in Europe or is it to build up our own defenses in a rational way?

If we assume, for the sake of discussion, that this country is ready and willing to follow Roosevelt into a European war, with what will the country fight?

Will it fight with an army which is microscopic compared to the great legions of Germany, Italy, and France? Will it fight with its Navy and leave the Pacific bare to the marauding ships of Japan? Will it fight with its handful of antiaircraft guns, not sufficient in number to guard even one moderately sized city? Will it fight with its 300 B–18 bombers, of which General Arnold, Chief of our Air Force, said to send them into battle would be suicide? Will it fight with its few so-called flying fortresses, which are now revealed to have three vital defects?

Obviously not. Far from being able to fight in Europe, the United States is actually unprepared to defend its own shores. And why, since this is the undeniable fact, does Roosevelt all but declare war on the dictators? His fifth cousin said: "Speak softly and carry a big stick." This Roosevelt speaks loudly and has nothing to back it up.

The President said yesterday that the material resources of the Nation would be offered to the Allies. What does he mean by this? By what authority does he make such a statement?

It is of a piece with the remainder of the President's speech—one of the most reckless speeches ever made by an American statesman. Is it not a fact that both Britain and France have billions of dollars earmarked for purchases in this country, and is it not also a fact that the things they need—modern airplanes and armored tanks—we haven't got either to sell or to give?

Has the President read the recently issued report of the Senate Naval Committee, which says that for the United States to go to war would mean a tragic sacrifice of the Nation's liberties and assets? Does he know that the committee, after carefully interviewing high-ranking officers of our armed forces, says that the United States is not prepared to give the Allies concrete help by intervening now, and will only jeopardize its own welfare by doing so?

The Naval Committee's report, printed in part on this page last Sunday, should be required reading for the President. It asks a question, too. It asks: "Why not face the basic military and economic fact that it is not within our power or means to create military or naval establishments of sufficient strength to police the world, but that it is within our power and means to prevent others from transporting their wars to this hemisphere?"

Mr. Roosevelt talks about the European shambles in terms of words like justice, freedom, liberty. Those are precious words, and those are precious things; but is it not true that the war in Europe is concerned about many other things besides abstract principles?

Is it not true that the war started in September of last year when Hitler invaded Poland and the declared reason for the entrance of France and Britain was to protect Poland? Was Poland a democracy? Ask the poor peasants of Poland, crushed under the heels of the Polish landlords, about that. Ask the Jews of Poland, who suffered the Polish brand of pogrom long before the Hitler brand was invented.

Justice, freedom, liberty; yes. These were the things we went to war for in 1917, and what happened? Instead of making the world safe for democracy, we ushered in the era of dictatorships, the age of the monstrous Hitler, the ghoulish Mussolini.

Is it not true that we are witnessing in Europe a tremendous convulsion of forces, of rival imperialisms, of have-not nations versus have nations, of age-old hatreds, of age-old quarrels? Is it not a radical oversimplification of a vast historical upheaval to describe it in the terms used by Mr. Roosevelt?

Mr. Roosevelt did his best to keep the war from happening. He failed. Now his job is to be President of the United States of America.

A POEM FOR TODAY

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a poem by Ruth Yolande Shaw, in which is expressed a sentiment which, happily, prevailed during the last World War, when the people of the United States took off the blind bridles of religious, political, and racial-origin differences and joined hands and hearts in a common cause. Surely the period through which we are now passing calls for nothing less.

THE TWO ALTARS

Jack Smith belonged to the Y. M. C. A.
Pat Mehan to the K. of C.
Both marched away 'neath the flag one day
To fight for the land of the free.
Jack bowed his head as he said a prayer;
Pat knelt with his parish priest;
Then they stood up square to go "over there"
To grapple the Hunnish beast.

Now, their altar rails were not the same,
Tho' they messed in the same old shack
But, just the same, 'twas the same great names
They worshiped, both Pat and Jack.
While Jack stood up straight as he humbly prayed,
Pat knelt at a candled shrine,
But the same God heard each whispering word
That hearkens to your'n and mine.

They didn't agree, did Jack and Pat,
On methods of worship true;
But what of that! They went to mat
For the old red, white, and blue.
They knelt apart, but 'twas side by side
They fought for their homes and right,
And the blood-red tide of the Kaiser's pride,
They battled by day and night.

So "over the top" to the glory side
Where never is war nor tears,
Where the true and tried in God's love abide,
With nothing of doubts and fears.
And the God they met as they entered
Where the souls of men are free,
Was the God of Jack's Y. M. C. A.,
And the God of Pat's K. of C.

RESOLUTION BY THE CITY COUNCIL OF SANTA MONICA, CALIF.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Santa Monica, Calif., and forwarded to me by Hon. Claude C. Crawford, mayor of Santa Monica, at the request of the council.

The resolution directs attention to the fact that the United States is in need of adequate defenses on land, at sea, and in the air, and petitions Congress to enact such laws as will provide adequate machinery for the protection of the American people from the activities of the borers from within—the "fifth columnists," the subversive organizations now permitted to operate with impunity—and also laws providing protection of all airports, airplane factories, harbors, and essential industries of all sorts.

Whereas peace-loving nations of the world, nations in which the ideals of democracy and of human rights are paramount, presently are the victims of the largest scale unwarranted aggressions in the history of humanity; and

Whereas all of those nations invaded and attacked have possessed resources greatly coveted by their enemies and all have been unprepared for war; and

Whereas the United States of America today stands in grave danger by reason of its great wealth in industry and natural resources, its wholly inadequate defenses on land, at sea, in the air, and against the enemy boring from within, and the inherent love of peace which is the American heritage;

Now, therefore, the city council of the city of Santa Monica resolves as follows:

That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it hereby is, respectfully requested to pass such laws and to make such appropriations as to give this Nation an army, a navy, and an air force second to none in the world.

That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, respectfully requested to enact such laws as will provide adequate machinery for the protection of the American people from the activities of the borers from within, the "fifth columnists," the subversive organizations now permitted to operate with impunity.

That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it hereby is, respectfully requested to enact laws which will make the protection of all airports, airplane factories, harbors, and essential industries of all sorts a duty of the armed forces of the United States of America, for the reason that all of these facilities rank equally with fortresses and battleships in the protection of our Nation's shores.

That the commissioner of public safety of the city of Santa Monica be, and he hereby is, instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to the Honorable LELAND M. FORD, the Representative from the Sixteenth Congressional District of the State of California, for submission of the same to the Congress of the United States.

That the commissioner of public safety, ex officio mayor of the city of Santa Monica, be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to certify to the adoption of this resolution, and the commissioner of public works of the city of Santa Monica be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to attest the same.

EDITORIAL FROM WORLD AFFAIRS FOR JUNE 1940

Mr. STEARNS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the June number of World Affairs, the organ of the American Peace Society:

[From World Affairs for June 1940]

TIME FOR INTELLIGENT ACTION

England and France entered upon this war to prevent Germany from annexing certain countries adjacent to their borders. They had been warned by Herr Hitler that these border countries could not work together; that, being democracies, they would waste their time talking while he would be doing business; and that, therefore, it would be easy for him to "get them one by one." The Fuehrer has now "got" Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxemburg. The fate of France and England is now hanging in the balance.

When such professedly free, sovereign, independent peoples are being mowed down by the mechanized forces of stark aggression, not only America's prized principles—principles including freedom in the realms of speech, politics, and religion—but the physical foundations of this country's safety are threatened. The more the destruction, the more the threat. In other words, that life and death struggle in Europe is coming more and more to make of us parties in interest.

In the light of such a serious and changing situation, what should America do? In the first place, it surely would serve no useful purpose to lead Germany and Italy to believe now that we are a timorous people torn by conflicting advice and fearful of responsibility; that we who dare still to believe in the possibilities of a warless world are stunned to silence and inaction; that we approve the part of the coward—"Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified."

This means that we cannot be justified playing the role of the priest and the Levite, passing by "on the other side." The perpetrators of "blitzkrieg" should not be allowed to destroy by mere physical force what we of the western world conceive to be fundamental human rights, rights struggled for and won in the name of freedom and democracy, we merely standing by the while. It is clear that a victory by ruthless aggression could only postpone, and that for a long time, the accomplishment of any just and lasting peace in the world.

Since the interests and ideals of America are being imperiled, since what we conceive to be right is endangered by what we believe to be wrong, world affairs must associate itself with those who believe that the United States should openly throw its economic and moral weight now on the side of the Allies. Nazi aggression should be halted. We are morally bound, therefore, to play an honorable and worthy part in that business. We have come face to face with the necessity of choosing between two evils, in which case it is our duty to choose the lesser, and to choose with an unfaltering unity and nobility of purpose.

The United States faces three immediate duties: One to itself, one to the civilian sufferers from war, and one to the Allied nations. This means that our country should spend every ounce of its energy to keep the devastations of war away from this hemisphere, which means, among other things, alas, that we as a people must turn realistically to increasing our defenses under the direction of our best minds, including our ablest masters of industry. It means also that every possible aid should be given through the American Red Cross or other accredited bodies to appropriate relief agencies abroad. Finally, again as a matter of mere morals, it means that the time has come for us to help to the utmost those directly engaged in stemming the tides of ruthlessness. Neutrality is no longer enough.

Faced with three such challenges, it is for our democracy to prove that it can be quick, resolute, and intelligent in action. It is our opportunity to express again the generous heart and spiritual substance of America, calmly but effectively.

Elimination of Poll Tax as a Voting Requirement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY CONFERENCE FOR DEMOCRATIC RIGHTS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, straw votes and unofficial polls have been gaining both in popularity and in the precision with which they reflect public sentiment. The methods used in the Gallup poll have come to be accepted as infinitely superior to the antiquated method used in, say, the Literary Digest poll of 1936. I have been watching these straw votes with considerable interest to see how different methods are devised to get an expression from ever more representative sections of the American public. Of course, the ultimate object is to get down deep enough into the less articulate strata of the people to find out what the public is going to say on the next election day.

Recently a new method of sampling has been devised and I am convinced that it has certain points of superiority over any of the methods heretofore used. By this new method sample ballots are sent out, one to each organization of every character and description—to the Elks and Masons and other lodges; to church groups, Y. W. and Y. M. C. A.'s, and the like; to C. I. O., A. F. of L., and brotherhood locals, and various such organizations. The vote is taken at a regular meeting of the local organization and the record of the vote sent in to headquarters to be tabulated. The first such poll has just been completed, reaching something over four and one-half million votes.

Needless to say, I was highly pleased that they took for the first national poll of popular sentiment a bill I have sponsored in Congress. The question asked was "Are you in favor, or are you opposed, to passage of the Geyer bill to eliminate the poll tax as a requirement for voting in Federal elections?" The results were: 4,114,673 for, 236,422 against, and 252,627 answered "Do not know." In other words, 89 percent of all those voting voted in favor of the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill. This poll was conducted by the National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert the announcement by the National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights, giving the results of this national poll of popular sentiment, together with a copy of the ballot used.

[National poll of popular sentiment, conducted by National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights, New York City. For release Monday, June 10, 1940]

WASHINGTON, June 10.—The overwhelming sentiment of the country is in favor of the passage of the Geyer bill which would make poll taxes for Federal elections illegal, the National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights announced today.

In a poll conducted by the conference more than 4,000,000 votes were cast with an 89-percent plurality in favor of the passage of the act.

Under the title of "National Poll of Popular Sentiment," ballots were sent to organizations in 35 States with a request that the question on the ballot be discussed at a meeting and that the results be tabulated on a printed form and returned.

The vote was:

For passage	4,114,673
Against	236,422
Don't know	252,627
Total	4,603,722

Much of the sentiment represented in the 7 percent which voted against the passage of the bill was evidently due to a feeling that the Geyer bill was not in itself adequate as a solution of the franchise problems of the South.

In Washington the vote in the many organizations and churches receiving the ballot was practically unanimous. In a statement accompanying the ballot, Evelyn Christman, secretary-treasurer of the National Women's Trade Union League said, "The National Women's Trade Union League opposes any tendency in this country to deprive the general public of participating in elections and the league does not believe such oppression should be encouraged in this Republic. A Government which most nearly represents the voice of all the people is the safest and best one." Among other Washington organizations participating in the vote were the School of Religion at Howard University and the First Friends Meeting.

Organizations throughout the 35 States involved in the poll included such groups as posts of the American Legion, Masons, churches, trade unions, lawyers, professional men, women's clubs, consumers' groups, Y. W. C. A., social workers, colleges, universities, and seminaries.

Participating groups were carefully chosen to reveal a truly representative opinion. Economic, social, and regional differences, as well as racial background, have been carefully balanced, and the result of the poll proves beyond doubt that the people of America are aware of the danger of keeping any group away from the polls, especially at this time, when the public must make decisions regarding the maintenance of American democratic institutions in the face of a world ablaze with war.

The southern vote, representing more than 700,000, was particularly emphatic in its approval of the Geyer bill and sharp in its condemnation of what one group called "attacks designed to keep most of the people away from the polls."

In a strongly worded statement Bishop J. C. Broomfield, of the Missouri Methodist Church, declared: "The payment of the poll tax by corrupt politicians and the securing of receipts for the distribution to those who would do as they are told is a stench in the nostrils of decent citizens."

Midwestern opinion, representing nearly 1,000,000 votes, is generally covered in the statement of Verna S. Ballard, of the First Friends Church of Indiana, who announced a unanimous vote, and by Savilla Simons, chairman of the American Association of Social Workers of Chicago, who, after the voting, said: "There is no question but that the membership is strongly opposed to poll taxes."

The El Paso, Tex., refinery workers stated in their ballot that "nearly all the members of this organization are barred from voting by the poll tax for the reason that their wages are too low to permit payment thereto."

The Poll of Popular Sentiment will survey opinion on current legislation and issues regularly, and believes it will be in a position to present the opinions of many millions of people hitherto never heard from in such sampling polls as the Gallup and Fortune magazine surveys.

Grand Coulee Dam and the Columbia Basin Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, the Grand Coulee Dam, on the Columbia River in the eastern part of the State of Washington, is without doubt a project unequaled in its magnitude by anything that man has yet undertaken. The dam itself is rapidly nearing completion. The American people are just beginning to hear of it, and they are coming by the thousands to see it. Many unusual and great things have been done by this administration, but I doubt if any will stand out through the ages as will this great project.

In addition to the physical structure itself, which is an engineering feat unequaled in the history of the world in the construction of dams, there will be developed a volume of electrical energy at this one point greater than that found anywhere else in the world. This is not all, however; the completion of the project will bring into production 1,200,000 acres of the most fertile land on the North American continent. The senior Senator from the State of Washington, the Honorable HOMER T. BONE, and I, early in 1937, procured the enactment of legislation forbidding and prohibiting speculation in the lands to be developed, and thus insured the fact that this great new agricultural domain, when it comes into being, will be occupied by actual farm owners and not by tenants, sharecroppers, or employees.

Many articles have been written descriptive of this marvelous and unusual undertaking, and there was one that appeared on June 1 of this year in the Nation entitled "Miracle in Concrete." This article paints a very clear picture of this mighty undertaking and comes from the pen of Richard L. Neuberger, of the Portland Oregonian.

This great structure, and the future development of the lands that will make homes for thousands, has all been designed by the Bureau of Reclamation and has been built and is being constructed under their capable and exceptional engineering staff. It will be an enduring tribute and monument to the Chief of that Bureau, John C. Page, his staff, and particularly that great engineer, Frank A. Banks, who has been in charge of construction since its beginning 6 years ago.

It is a pleasure to me to give to my colleagues and others who may read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the splendid description of this exceptionally valuable and great accomplishment in making this a better Nation and world in which to live, as contrasted to what is occurring across the waters just at this time.

[From the Nation for June 1940]

MIRACLE IN CONCRETE

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

GRAND COULEE, Wash., May 15.—The morning fog lifts like a curtain in the granite canyon of the Columbia River and reveals the most massive concrete escarpment in the world stretching from cliff to cliff. It is nearly a mile long and as thick as two city blocks at the base. Already it towers 30 stories above bedrock, and soon it will be higher. Its bulk is three times that of the Great Pyramid; it contains enough concrete to pave a roadway around the globe. Behind it there is filling up an enormous reservoir that will be almost as long as Lake Ontario.

This is the Grand Coulee Dam, started in 1934 and to be finished by the end of this year. To dedicate Grand Coulee is one of the President's principal ambitions. As far back as 1920, when he was a candidate for the vice-presidency, he said at Spokane, after his Pullman car had paralleled the route of Lewis and Clarke down the Columbia:

"Coming through today on the train has made me think pretty deeply. When you cross the Mountain States and that portion of the coast States that lies well back from the ocean, you are impressed by those great stretches of physical territory, just land; territory now practically unused but destined someday to contain the homes of thousands and hundreds of thousands of citizens like us; a territory to be developed by the Nation and for the Nation. As we were coming down the river today, I could not help thinking, as everyone does, of all that water running down unchecked to the sea."

Grand Coulee Dam will irrigate and reclaim 1,200,000 acres of land. This is an area equal in size to the whole State of Delaware. It is not much less than the acreage of all the farms in New Jersey. Several months ago, in an address to the White House conference on children in a democracy, the President said:

"I have read a book; it is called the Grapes of Wrath, and there are 500,000 Americans who live in the covers of that book. I would like to see the Columbia Basin devoted to the care of the 500,000 people represented in the Grapes of Wrath.

"Up in the State of Washington we are spending a great many millions to harness the Columbia River for a great dam up there which will pump the water up on to a huge area of land capable of providing a living for 500,000 people, irrigated land, today a desert, which can be made a garden with the process of modern science."

Twenty-five years ago GEORGE W. NORRIS, Senator from Nebraska, stood beside a little creek cascading to the Columbia and asked a native of a nearby village why the power was not used. The reply came with finality: "Jim Hill owns all the power sites. We don't have much to say about 'em." No railway magnate owns all the power sites now. Soon, over the brink of the Grand Coulee spillway will crash a sheet of water with five times the volume and nearly three times the height of Niagara Falls. This shattering drop in the Nation's second largest river will generate annually 10,708,000,000 kilowatt-hours of power, an amount equal to one-fourth of all the hydroelectric power produced in the United States in 1938. So much "juice" will be turned out that the twin powerhouses, each as big as a skyscraper and packing more than twice the force of Muscle Shoals, will have to be run by remote control lest the operators be electrocuted.

Ranchers and settlers on the dry mesas are wiring their houses and cabins; they will be able to buy electricity for $2.50 a hundred kilowatt-hours. New industries, desperately needed in a frontier region that imports 75 percent of its manufactured goods, are also expected to take advantage of the lowest commercial power rates in America. Already aluminum and steel factories are being built along the Columbia near Bonneville. Seattle and Portland businessmen, who regularly denounce the President, admit that his dams are saving the Northwest and will give it an industrial foundation to replace the lumber industry.

Not all Grand Coulee's fabulous supply of power will brighten farmhouses and move the wheels of factories. Five of the eighteen generators will operate a dozen stupendous pumps, one of which could pump enough water for New York City. Each pump can lift 50 tons of water a second. And here is what the pumps will do. Grand Coulee Dam will raise the level of the Columbia River approximately 355 feet. The pumps will hoist part of the river another 250 feet, through great tunnels and conduits, from which it will flow into a deep chasm a mile wide and from 25 to 30 miles in length. This chasm, with walls as precipitous as the front of a safe, is the Grand Coulee of the Columbia River. It was carved ages ago when the river was diverted from its course by the Pleistocene ice sheet. The dam and pumps will duplicate the job the ice sheet did.

From the Grand Coulee the water will be coasted on to 1,200,000 acres of land which needs only irrigation to grow peas, beans, pears, prunes, potatoes, celery, onions, alfalfa, and the other crops that mantle the green valleys of the Northwest. This land will not be monopolized by great corporate farms such as dominate agriculture in California, nor will it be scarred by the feudalism of tenant farming. It will be tilled by families working their own land. For Congress has passed a law limiting land ownership at Grand Coulee to 80 acres a family; a single man can retain only half that much. The considerable portion of the region now held by private owners and in old Northern Pacific land grants will have to be sold at the price fixed by Government appraisers. Any land held beyond the amount allowed will not be cut in on the irrigation system and will stay in its present virtually worthless condition.

The total cost of the Grand Coulee project will be $394,500,000. In this the principal elements are $99,960,000 for the spillway dam, $61,500,000 for the hydroelectric plant, $129,220,000 for the vast network of irrigation ditches and canals, $29,540,000 for the pumping system, and $11,330,000 for preparing the enormous reservoir in the prehistoric river bed. Other items on the expense side of the ledger are for preservation of the Chinook salmon runs and for transmission lines, field offices, and land surveys.

The surveys are under way now. Every foot of the 1,200,000 acres is being classified as to contour, value, ownership, soil content, and crop possibilities. It is the most extensive land survey ever undertaken. President Roosevelt has made up his mind that the Coulee area, which he considers a "Promised Land," shall not be colonized carelessly. The National Resources Committee is at work studying where schools, hospitals, sewer systems, railroad yards, and warehouses should be located. Twenty-five thousand families cultivating fertile soil can support a large urban population. The towns near Grand Coulee will expand; other towns will spring up. The Resources Committee is trying to find out the opportunities for people with special training and abilities—doctors, nurses, school teachers, printers, lawyers, ministers, electricians, mechanics. Perhaps in this modern Canaan in the Northwest some of the highly skilled refugees from Europe may get a chance to participate in American life.

Forty years ago some of the Coulee lands were homesteaded or bought from the railroad. That was before anyone realized that the rich alluvial plain left behind by the glacial sheets did not get enough rainfall. The settlers dry-farmed successfully for a few years. By that time they had used all the moisture held in the soil. Their land caked and hardened. Sagebrush encroached on the wheat. Many of the settlers moved on. Some lost their farms to banks and mortgage companies; others went to Seattle and Spokane to start over again, but still clung to their deeds and titles. These people are coming back now and forming irrigation districts which will buy water from the Federal Government. The votes creating the districts indicate that local sentiment is in favor of this program of small, owner-operated farms: at Wheeler 178 were for the district and 10 against; at Shragg 143 for and 9 against; at Drumheller 26 for and 11 against; at Pasco 228 for and 8 against.

The Grand Coulee project is one of the New Deal's principal political assets along the Pacific seaboard, and Republican approval of the undertaking now is not fooling many people. More than 20 years ago Rufus Woods of the Wenatchee World wrote an editorial proposing a mammoth dam to irrigate the arid land and develop the water power of the Columbia Basin. Three Republican Presidents gave lip-service to the idea—and did nothing. In this 1932 campaign Mr. Roosevelt said he would do something about the Columbia River region, and he kept his promise. Western voters know how to compare words with deeds. The State of Washington has not elected a Republican Governor, Senator, or Representative since Grand Coulee was begun.

The anti-New Deal San Francisco Argonaut says of Grand Coulee, "The Pacific coast may be confident that in the future it will have occasion to point with pride to a new 'land of plenty' here in its midst." Yet there are some questions, of course. What will the colossal dam do to the valuable and important salmon runs in the Columbia River? Is it logical for the Government to spend millions for this new farm area in the West while it spends other millions to restrict agricultural production elsewhere? The late Paul Y. Anderson asked the President this question in 1937 and received no conclusive answer. And what about the Dust Bowl nomads whom Roosevelt wants to settle at Grand Coulee? They are penniless. How can they get farm equipment, lumber, seeds, and other necessities?

The salmon are in jeopardy, of that there is no doubt, although all kinds of elaborate apparatus have been constructed for fish conservation. The Department of the Interior resolves the paradox of irrigation in one region and crop control in another with the statement that the most troublesome surpluses are in corn, cotton, and wheat, and that the Grand Coulee region will produce garden vegetables, fruits, and fodder. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch has observed also that probably most of the crops will be consumed in the area rather than raised for the market. And the Government will stretch its credit resources to the limit in an effort to give the neediest migrants an opportunity to settle in new farm homes. Other reclamation projects have required that each colonist possess $2,000. At Grand Coulee this sum can be made up from F. S. A. loans, old equipment, automobiles, and furniture.

Despite all doubts and reservations, men of many faiths have stood on the granite crags above the huge dam and said, "This makes sense." The Pacific Northwest is the final frontier, the last refuge for people now living on exhausted soil in the Middle West, for men and women crowded in the tenements of the Atlantic coast. Maj. Roy Bessey, of the Northwest Regional Planning Commission, says that "with a reasonable development program, from 1,000,000 to 2,500,000 additional people could readily be absorbed in the region within a generation Migration toward the region during recent years seems to indicate that the population increase may approach the higher figure." Of no other part of continental United States may this be said, and Grand Coulee is the principal feature of "the reasonable development program." The Columbia has three times as much potential hydroelectric power as any other river in America. Above its swift reaches is a great sweep of land that needs only water to replace sagebrush with orchards. The river twists through the Cascade Range and into the core of the inland empire. With dams and locks it could become a navigable waterway instead of a rapid-studded chute. Why not develop all these resources for men and women who must find a place to go?

The late William E. Borah, for many years the most illustrious figure of the Columbia Basin, once said, "The Northwest cannot pay the freight both ways and continue to live and prosper." A colonial empire for the East, it ships out its raw materials and buys back finished products. Perhaps the biggest chunk of power in the world will help develop mills and factories so that the Northwest's raw materials can be processed there instead of being shipped across the country.

Dusk settles on the Columbia like a curtain dropping back. The tumbledown farmhouses which the settlers abandoned long ago lose shape in the twilight. But at the great dam 10,000 lights are turned on. Work goes forward night and day. This is a defense of democracy, too—as important as new destroyers and bombing planes. Perhaps this frowning wall of concrete will be the most enduring monument to Franklin Roosevelt's administration. That jackhammer man down in the chasm, wiping his forehead in the glare of the searchlights as he drills a tunnel through the cliffs for the water that will make a million acres bloom—perhaps he is doing more to protect America from foreign ideologies than the man who rivets a dreadnought's mast or prepares a torpedo for the open sea.

Roosevelt Goes to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal entitled "President Goes to War." With total disregard of Congress and the American people the President commits this country to a policy of extending its material resources to certain European belligerents. Roosevelt, the dictator, tells the world what we will do.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of June 11, 1940]

PRESIDENT GOES TO WAR

Listening to their President on the most solemn day in our national life since 1917, the American people heard him come down to the point they were waiting for with this:

"We will pursue two obvious and simultaneous courses: We will extend to the opponents of force (France and Britain) the material resources of this Nation and, at the same time, we will harness and speed up the use of those resources in order that we ourselves in the Americas may have equipment and training equal to the task of any emergency and every defense."

That is a declaration of war, as war has been known for centuries—probably the strangest speech ever made to a class graduating from an American university. We shall use all the material force we possess to aid the war against Germany and Italy. We shall speed up our processes to increase that aid and, almost incidentally, provide for our own defense.

Getting down to what we think about it as we talk it over together, our judgment is that a majority of Americans will agree with what Mr. Roosevelt announces the country will do. And for two reasons: Most of us feel that the cause of the western nations against dictatorships, which have constantly attacked democracies and preached hatred of them, is our side. In the second place, many Americans, probably a majority, believe that by extending the utmost material help now we may keep out of this war ourselves—that is, not have to send our sons and brothers.

Many hearts echoed the emotional outburst of Mr. Roosevelt when, departing from his prepared speech, he said of Italy's joining the war: "The hand that held the dagger has struck it into the back of its neighbor."

Two speeches were made Monday which are alike in many ways—Benito Mussolini's and Franklin Roosevelt's. Mr. Roosevelt said we would do everything possible against Germany and Italy. Earlier Mussolini had said: "It is the conflict of poor numerous peoples who labor against starvers who ferociously cling to a monopoly of all riches and all gold on earth."

Listeners heard a Roman audience go into a frenzy of applause; listeners heard great applause at the University of Virginia.

Here is what makes us stop and think: Mussolini and Roosevelt talked alike. The longest established dictator in Europe saying what his nation would do; the head of a democracy saying what the United States would do. There is supposed to be a difference, but no difference appeared.

Mr. Roosevelt did not say: "This is what I shall set before Congress," but "This is what we will do."

Is the United States to save democracy by abandoning democracy without even an appeal to its elected representatives? President Roosevelt defied Germany and Italy. He announced a policy which, at any earlier time in American history, would have meant a declaration of war. But he did not say to the American people that it meant this. What he ought to have asked Congress to approve, he told the public we would do.

Any man or woman who sits down and thinks this over will see that we cannot go so far without committing ourselves to all the rest. If Mr. Roosevelt's pledge of the material resources of this Nation is not enough, we shall send the Navy, and if that is not enough, we shall send man power. The President promises all we are and have, to be spent by the Berles and Hopkinses and Perkinses, by the Army and Navy heads, by his own account, have been sound asleep on defense.

There is a check on this. Congress still has control when billions are asked. And it is time for Congress to wake up.

The emotional response to pledging the Nation to what many Americans—most Americans—see as the side of decency and liberty is not the calm, considered judgment of a people on whether they are ready on this June day to commit themselves to war. The President did not say "war," but every word he said implied war.

Applause was long and loud. Senate and House will meet in the atmosphere of hysteria. Presently they must go back to people who have been thinking about war, too, but have been working in field and shop and factory. They will answer then to the question:

"Did you commit your country to everything a dictator might ask, including the lives of our children?"

How fearful must be the boys who do the fighting and dying. How sad the mothers whose sons will be called to war. Why has hysteria gripped America?

DEMOCRATS BECOME THE WAR PARTY

Roosevelt's action has certainly stamped the Democrats as the war party. Added to his behavior is that of certain Oklahoma Democrats who shouted in favor of war, according to the following newspaper article:

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel of June 11, 1940]

ROOSEVELT, ALLIES BACKED—OKLAHOMA DEMOCRATS PLEDGE AID

OKLAHOMA CITY, June 10.—The State Democratic convention, nearing its scheduled harmonious close today, was jerked to attention by a resolution favoring aid to the Allies. A speaker demanded:

"We might just as well declare war; are you in favor of doing that?"

He was answered with cries of "Yes." The resolution was adopted by a 160–41 vote.

ARTICLE FROM THE PHILADELPHIA PUBLIC LEDGER

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the interest over the definition of the Western Hemisphere and the implications of the Monroe Doctrine insofar as Greenland is concerned, the following article from the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, Monday morning, September 11, 1916, may be of considerable interest to those who are following the entire subject:

DOES AMERICA ACT WISELY IN GIVING UP GREENLAND?—INSTEAD OF YIELDING OUR RIGHTS TO DENMARK, WE SHOULD HAVE BARGAINED TO TAKE OVER GREAT NORTHERN ISLAND

(By Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary)

In a sledge journey of some 600 miles from Etah, Admiral—then Commander—Peary determined the northern limit of Greenland at Cape Morris K. Jesup, the most northern known land in the world, in May 1900. He had twice previously crossed the northern part of Greenland in journeys of about 500 miles each way. Commander Peary determined the insularity of Greenland, and his various Greenland sledge journeys total between 3,000 and 4,000 miles. What the great Greenland explorer and finder of the North Pole has to say about the cession to Denmark of American rights of discovery in Greenland is of peculiar interest, in view of the action of the United States Senate last week.—Editor, Public Ledger.

TO THE EDITOR OF PUBLIC LEDGER:

SIR: I have been surprised at the extent of interest that has been shown in our rights in Greenland in connection with the proposed transfer of these rights as a part of the consideration for the Danish West Indies.

When the news of the proposed treaty was first made public the editorial comment of the press of the country referred to these rights as "extremely vague," "more or less visionary," and so on.

Later a different point of view has appeared in the great papers of the country, and letters to the papers and personal letters which I have indicate a strong sentimental feeling in the matter.

There appear to be two quite general impressions in regard to the treaty: First, that $25,000,000 is a large price for the islands, and, second, that our rights in Greenland may be too valuable to be thrown into the bargain as a make-weight.

That we want the islands and should have them if possible goes without saying.

As regards the price, I have not yet seen it noted that in 1867 Denmark asked $15,000,000 for these islands, and that a treaty was finally ratified on the basis of $7,500,000 for the two islands, St. Thomas and St. John.

As to "throwing in" our rights in Greenland, are our rights in Greenland too valuable for this?

Greenland is the largest island in the world. Its total length from Cape Farewell, its southern extremity in 60 degrees north latitude, to Cape Morris K. Jesup, its northern extremity in 83½ degrees north latitude, is in round numbers 1,500 miles, almost exactly the same as the length of the United States on the ninety-seventh meridian, from the mouth of the Rio Grande to where our northern boundary crosses the Red River of the north.

The greatest width of Greenland is about the same as the distance from New York to St. Louis.

In regard to its area, the figures of various authorities vary widely. It may be sufficient to say that as regards area, it can be grouped in size with the United States east of the Mississippi; Alaska, Mexico, Colombia, Persia, Portuguese West Africa, Turkey in Asia.

Its interior is covered with a great sheet of ice, rising to elevations of probably 10,000 feet in places, and several thousand feet in thickness.

The available ice-free land is a strip of varying width, along the coast, intersected by numerous deep fjords.

When one turns the pages of American Arctic exploration, Greenland is found more or less intimately associated during more than 60 years with all American expeditions except the Jeannette expedition.

Americans have lifted nearly all of its northwestern and northern coasts out of the Arctic night and fog and have twice crossed its northern part. American names stud its coasts, and the name of an American marks its northern extremity, the most northern known land in the world.

The following, from the records of the State Department, may be of interest:

WASHINGTON CITY, April 24, 1868.

SIR: When you did me the honor last summer to call my attention to the treaty negotiated by you with Denmark by which we acquired the important islands of St. Thomas and St. John, I ventured to suggest to you the propriety of obtaining from the same power Greenland, and probably Iceland, also. You thought the suggestion worthy of serious consideration, and requested me to communicate to you in writing my views and the facts on the subject, that they might be on the files of the Department and ready for use whenever the question might be considered hereafter by the Government.

* * * * * * *

The shores of Greenland, much more than those of any other country, are indented with deep bays, inlets, estuaries, and fjords, some of them possibly extending from the western to the eastern coast, presenting an immense shore line and furnishing most extensive and protected fishing grounds. These inlets are bordered by meadowlands, beech and willow, whence the name of Greenland. The population, neglected by Denmark, lives mainly by hunting, including furs and the fisheries.

Greenland has in vast quantities whale, walrus, seal and shark, cod, ivory cod, salmon, salmon trout, and herring, foxes, wolf, reindeer, bear, hare, myriads of birds, including the king duck, eider-duck, dorskin, petrel, gull, brent, burgomaster, geese, killiwoke, lolard, sea swallow, etc. Good coal is found on the western coast at various points, extending far north, most cheaply mined and close to good harbors.

* * * * * * *

The whale fisheries of Greenland, in 1864, were of the value of $400,000. The climate of South Greenland is one of "unusual healthfulness and clear atmosphere." The limits of summer are from May to September. All the shores and inlets of Greenland abound with animal life, such as fish, birds, etc. The rocks and geology of Greenland, as before stated, besides the valuable coal discovered, indicate vast mineral wealth. Kryolite, a most important mineral and of very rapidly increasing use and value, is found only in Greenland. One of the mines is 80 feet thick. This mineral is mined in large quantities, its rapid development being due in great part to American enterprise. It is used in the manufacture of soap, soda, and soda salts, and yields a residue which has a great value as a flux in the treatment of difficult metallic ores. It also makes a fine glass, and has been employed in the manufacture of aluminum and its alloys, a most valuable metal, being very brilliant, one-third the weight of zinc, and one-fourth that of silver. The mines appear to be inexhaustible, and are of great and rapidly increasing value. Geologists all look for new and immense mineral developments in Greenland.

* * * * * * *

I have heretofore expressed the opinion that we should purchase Iceland and Greenland, but especially the latter. The reasons are political and commercial.

* * * * * * *

I have the honor to be your obedient servant.

R. J. WALKER.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

Accompanying this letter are communications from Benjamin Pierce, superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, and Benjamin M. Pierce, mining engineer, containing interesting and some curious information in regard to Greenland and Iceland.

The following appears in the current number of the National Geographic Magazine in regard to the Seward treaty of 1867, it may be of interest:

"The first proposal to buy the Danish West Indies was made by Secretary of State Seward at Washington in January 1865. July 17, 1866, the United States offered $5,000,000 for the islands. In 1867 Denmark declined to sell them for that amount, but offered St. Thomas and St. John for $10,000,000, or $15,000,000 for the three. Mr. Seward replied by offering $7,500,000 for the group. Denmark made a counteroffer of St. Thomas and St. John for that price. Finally Secretary Seward accepted the proposal.

* * * * * * *

"Denmark ratified the treaty, but Senator Sumner, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, held the bill unreported for more than 2 years. When he did report it, it was adversely."

Would some of the objections voiced in regard to the present treaty for the purchase of the Danish West Indies have been met if the treaty provisions as to Greenland had been reversed and the bargain should have taken the form of Denmark transferring to us her rights in Greenland and giving us the Danish West Indies and Greenland for $25,000,000?

Geographically Greenland belongs to North America and the Western Hemisphere, over which we have formally claimed a sphere of influence by our Monroe Doctrine.

Its possession by us would be in line with the Monroe Doctrine and would have eliminated one more possible source of future complications for us from European possession of territory in the Western Hemisphere.

Will turning Greenland over to Denmark now mean our repurchase of it later, or would obtaining it now have meant closing the incident and placing Greenland where it must ultimately belong?

Greenland is comparatively near to us. For years American ships have conveyed cryolite from the Ivigtut mines to Philadelphia. There is coal and cryolite, probably graphite and mica, possibly gold, in its rocks. Danish capital has apparently not been sufficient to exploit the country's resources.

With our unlimited means it may, like Alaska, prove a sound and most valuable business investment.

The abundance of native coal and the numerous glacial streams which come tumbling into the southern fjords from the great interior ice sheet represent enormous potential energy which might be translated into nitrate and electrical energy to make Greenland a powerhouse for the United States.

Greenland represents ice, coal, and power in inexhaustible quantities.

And stranger things have happened than that Greenland in our hands might furnish an important North Atlantic naval and aeronautical base.

A North Pacific naval base for the United States in the Aleutian Archipelago is a recognized possibility. Why not a similar base in the North Atlantic? Cape Farewell, in Greenland, is only little north of Sitka. It is in the same latitude as St. Petersburg, Christiana, Great Britain's naval base in the Orkneys, and the northern entrance to the North Sea, which Great Britain has patrolled with her warships incessantly now, summer and winter, for 2 years.

There are fjords in southern Greenland which would hold the entire Navy, with narrow, deep water, impregnable entrances.

Thirty hours' steaming due south from Cape Farewell by 35-knot warcraft would put them in the trans-Atlantic routes midway between New York and the British Channel.

With the rapid shrinking of distances in this age of speed and invention, Greenland may be of crucial importance to us in the future.

The present war has shown most strikingly how far flung may be the regions have a bearing on the struggle. Great Britain's coaling stations in the Falklands spelled destruction for Germany's squadron of commerce destroyers.

Russia's Arctic port of Archangel has been an invaluable gateway for her.

Greenland in our hands might be a valuable piece of our defensive armor. In the hands of hostile interests it would be a serious menace.

Great Britain's cession of Heligoland to Germany is a striking example of failure to see clearly into the future.

Spitzbergen, "no-man's land" for many years, has been found to be of rich mineralogical value, and previous to the war was a bone of contention among representatives of several nations.

Can we afford to turn down any possible opportunities even if we do not at present grasp their full value?

PEARY.

Democratic State Convention in Oklahoma City, Okla.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JED JOHNSON
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 12, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ELMER THOMAS, OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, on Monday of this week the Democrats of Oklahoma held their annual State convention in Oklahoma City. The senior Senator from Oklahoma, my personal friend for many years, was the keynote speaker of that convention. That his address met with approval of an overwhelming majority of the Democrats in convention assembled is evidence of the fact that the resolutions adopted were very much in line with the splendid clear-cut progressive views expressed by the able and brilliant senior Senator from Oklahoma.

Feeling sure that the message of Senator THOMAS will be of unusual interest to the citizens not only of the State of Oklahoma but of the entire Nation I have secured permission to have same printed in whole in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I feel that this keynote address offers many practical suggestions that will be of assistance to the Democratic leaders of this country in preparing the platform of our party at the national convention in Chicago next month. The address delivered by Senator THOMAS follows:

I thank our efficient State chairman, France Paris, and the members of the State executive committee for permitting me to serve as the temporary chairman of this convention.

I congratulate and compliment our State Democratic organization, our several county organizations, and our many precinct organizations, present and past, for the great work they have done in keeping Oklahoma a Democratic State.

We rejoice that we have a Democratic State administration and that the line of Democratic Governors has not been broken since statehood.

Gov. Leon C. Phillips is giving the State a safe and economical administration, and for his success all Oklahomans are justly proud.

In the past our people have responded to the appeals of our Democratic leaders, and our Democratic officials have acted in what they thought was the best interests of the people.

To the extent that government has been managed and administered in the interest of the masses, democracy has thrived, prospered, and flourished. So long as the Democratic Party takes care of the people, just that long will the people take care of the Democratic Party.

I have just returned from the Nation's Capitol.

I bring greetings from the Democratic administration at Washington to the Democratic legion of Oklahoma.

The Members of our congressional delegation send their greetings, and ask to be remembered.

I am authorized to advise that, in the event their duties will permit, your Congressmen will be calling on you soon.

I bring you a message from the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and the message is as follows: I quote—

"I am happy to extend, through the courtesy of Senator THOMAS, my sincere good wishes to the Democrats of Oklahoma assembled in State convention.

"In the two preceding Presidential campaigns I appealed for your support and cooperation in bringing victory to the cause of Democratic principles and policies. Your response on both occasions was generous, whole-hearted, and effective. By this display of loyalty and devotion you have earned the gratitude of the Roosevelt administration and of the Democratic National Committee.

"We approach another Presidential election in a changed and disordered world. Eight years ago the issues and problems were primarily domestic. Now we face the ugly reality of a foreign war that may have serious repercussions on the vital interests of America.

"There is one fact of significant importance which stands out as a result of these onrushing events. The leaders of the opposition party have lagged behind in their understanding of modern political problems. When last in power, the Republican leaders failed to foresee the gathering economic storm, failed to grasp its force and intensity, and then had nothing to offer in the way of constructive remedies. In recent months they have been equally wrong in gaging the course of developments abroad.

"The Democratic Party, entrusted with responsibility, has handled the affairs of the United States with vigor, foresight, and statesmanship. The Roosevelt administration has kept the peace, avoided the incidents which might lead to war, and made the Nation alert and awake to possible dangers. The economic structure has been strengthened and stabilized.

"This is the record on which we propose to go before the voters. Once again we are relying upon your loyal support. I am confident of the outcome. We must press our case with the honest conviction that another Democratic victory is the sure and safe course for America.

"JAMES A. FARLEY,
"Chairman, Democratic National Committee."

On my way to the airport on Friday last I called on the President of the United States. He authorized me to convey a message to this convention and to the people of Oklahoma:

First, that the Government is expanding and strengthening its Military Establishments—its Army, its Navy, and its Air Corps—not for probable war but for possible war.

Second, that the best way to prevent war is to be prepared for war.

And third, that during the present emergency, however long and whatever the outcome, so long as he is President, he proposes to protect the people—producers and consumers—from profiteers and from unreasonable price fluctuations.

Upon reaching this city I found the following letter awaiting me:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 4, 1940.

Honorable ELMER THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: When you address the Democratic State convention in Oklahoma City, please extend to all of the members my hearty felicitations and warmest personal greetings. Tell them for me that the paramount domestic issue this year is the retention of popular government. It is, therefore, up to the people everywhere to decide whether they want to return to 1929, when the United States went speculation mad with all of its attendant dislocations, or to continue to have their Government handled through the processes of democracy.

I trust that the convention will face this paramount issue squarely and that its deliberations will be fruitful of wise counsel and constructive action in the best interests of the party and the Nation.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

This great Democratic convention is the official opening of the 1940 campaign.

The temporary chairman of a political convention is presumed to state the issue or issues to be considered and acted upon, first, by the convention and then later decided, if not finally settled, by the people themselves.

Later on this day this convention will set forth in resolution form its recommendations and demands and then will select delegates to represent the democracy of Oklahoma at the national convention where the party platform will be shaped and where our standard bearer will be nominated.

In this coming contest, in addition to county and State officials, the voters of Oklahoma will elect their representatives in the Seventy-seventh Congress and will assist in the election of a President of the United States.

Among Democrats there may be differences of opinion relative to party and governmental policies. There may be differences of opinion as to who shall fill our local, State, and congressional offices, but throughout the land there is little disagreement about who shall serve as the next President of the United States.

Our candidate needs no eulogy at my hands. He is known to one and all. He is loved, supported, and followed by the masses of the people in this and other lands.

He has defended, protected, and preserved our people and our institutions through the greatest depression in history.

In the great world contest of this hour—a contest of force against reason, a contest of war against peace, and a contest of dictators against democracy—our candidate stands foursquare for reason, peace, and democracy; and his name is Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Delegates to this convention: A heavy responsibility rests upon you along with the other leaders of our country.

Today democracy, as a form of government, is challenged in many lands; hence, it remains for us here in the United States to do whatever may be necessary to insure that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Today while the nations and peoples of the Eastern Hemisphere are at war, let us pause to rejoice that the United States and the nations and peoples of the Western World, under the leadership of President Roosevelt and the Democratic Party, are at peace.

The record shows that during the Roosevelt administration our country has not only been at peace with all the world, but we have continuously sponsored movements in behalf of peace.

In some sections we have been criticized for not having the strongest navy, the strongest army, and the strongest air force in the world.

Because of this criticism and because the question of preparedness will be one, if not the major issue of the campaign, let me call your attention to the following facts:

When we entered the World War in 1917 our people were led to believe that it was a war to end war.

We were advised that we were fighting to make the world safe for democracy.

When the war was over our people had reasons to believe that they could continue to be free to think, to speak, and to act, and that war, as a means of settling international disputes, was at an end.

At that time President Wilson, leader of the Democratic Party, proposed and suggested the League of Nations as a tribunal for the adjustment of international disputes.

Our people were against war, and believing that we were through with war, we refused to join the League of Nations.

Had the United States entered the League the present world conflict might have been avoided.

As further evidence that our people are against war, I remind you that during the Harding administration a disarmament conference was called and held in Washington.

This conference had for its purpose the stopping of all preparations for war.

Later, during the Coolidge administration, our people again initiated a world movement for peace and the result was the Kellogg Peace Pact wherein war as an element of national policy was renounced.

As further evidence that the American people have had enough of war, the appropriations for support of our Military Establishment decreased constantly from the end of the World War until a few years ago.

Recent developments show that while we were promoting peace other nations were secretly developing and building up vast war machines.

When we learned that Germany, Russia, Japan, and Italy were building armies and navies, we were forced to enter into the competition.

In 1935 our appropriations for support of our Military Establishment were less than $300,000,000.

The appropriations for the past year were about $1,000,000,000, while the appropriations already made for the coming year will amount to well over three and a half billion dollars.

Again we are criticized for having expended vast sums for military preparedness and now have little to show for such expenditures.

Let me assure you, my fellow Democrats, that this criticism is not well-founded.

The following are the facts:

While other nations conscript their youth and pay them practically nothing, we pay our soldiers the best salaries in the world.

We furnish our soldiers with the best clothing, the best housing, and the best subsistence possible to be procured. The high standard set for our soldiers is responsible for the heavy cost of our Military Establishment.

It is true that the Congress is the policy-making branch of our Government.

Likewise it is true that the Congress seeks to reflect and to enact into law the crystallized public sentiment of our people.

Because of the status of public sentiment, until recently the Congress would not have considered any substantial expansion of either our Army or our Navy. Until recently our people did not want a big army.

No doubt but you have heard it said that if nations would not prepare for war and instead would will for peace, then governments and peoples would be spared the expense of military preparedness, and at the same time would be immune from war.

The recent invasion, attack, and destruction of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Finland, Norway, Belgium, and Holland has destroyed this philosophy.

Heretofore, our people have felt secure in the belief that thousands of miles of water on our eastern and western coasts have afforded us a safe protection.

Now, when we consider the development of modern war machines we are forced to realize the possibility of attack and danger unless we are adequately prepared.

For years we have heard it said that planes could never become important factors in war, yet today we know that such statements are without foundation.

Now we know that the only limit to the speed of planes and the amount of weight that may be carried is the limitation of power.

Today in the European war vast planes with leakless gas containers, with pilots protected by armor, and equipped with cannon, dart through the air and flying fortresses carrying gigantic bombs are able to reach cities, industrial establishments, military and food supplies located many hundreds of miles away in the country of the enemy.

On the ground veritable battleships, called tanks, travel over almost any kind of land at the rate of 10 to 40 miles per hour.

Vast squadrons of planes are able to transport thousands of soldiers, fully armed and equipped, at speeds up to 250 miles per hour.

Heretofore our peace-loving people have felt themselves safe and secure, but now, with Germany and Italy on the east, and Russia and Japan on the west, our viewpoint has been changed.

The question may be asked, Why should America be attacked? Replying, I might ask, Why was Poland attacked? Why was Finland attacked? Why were Norway, Holland, and Belgium attacked? Why the wars now raging in Europe and the eastern world?

Let me remind you that America is the richest nation on the globe.

Our Treasury now holds almost twenty billions of gold. Likewise, our Treasury holds some three billions of silver.

During the centuries gold and silver have furnished the metallic base for the financial systems of the world; hence, our accumulated gold and silver present a sufficient prize for any nation or group of nations to make an attempt at capture.

I do not suggest that our country is either in immediate danger or that we are unprepared to meet possible emergencies.

While we do not have a military machine comparable to that of Germany, yet we are not wholly unprepared for war.

We now have 227,000 men in our Regular Army, and this number has just been increased to 280,000.

We now have 145,000 men in the Navy and this number has just been increased to 170,000.

We now have 25,000 marines and this number has just been increased to 34,000.

We now have 250,000 in the National Guard and this number has just been increased to 320,000.

In addition to the regulars, the Navy, and the guardsmen, we have over 100,000 Reserve Army officers and over 75,000 Reserve Navy officers and men.

We have over 150,000 reserves in the R. O. T. C. and over 35,000 reserves in the C. M. T. C., thus making a grand total of over 1,000,000 men who are now in the service or who may be called at a moment's notice.

For equipment we have over two and one-half million Enfield and Springfield rifles and over 40,000 of the new Garand semiautomatic rifles with an ample supply of ammunition.

We have on hand equipment to supply an Army of 1,000,000 men.

In addition to our Army we have, next to Great Britain, admittedly the strongest navy in the world.

Our Air Corps is being expanded as rapidly as is humanly possible, hence, all elements considered: First, our distance removed from Europe; second, our thousands of miles of shore line; and, third, the condition the belligerents will be in when the present war is over, I feel that our people, our property, and our national honor are as well protected as is possible under the processes necessary in a democracy.

Before passing from the question of war, possible war, and the necessity for preparedness, let me remind you that throughout all history wars have occurred with an amazing regularity.

At different periods of the past war lords have sought to conquer and to rule the world.

Only in a few instances have such efforts been even temporarily successful.

Over 2,000 years ago Alexander the Great, at the age of 33, conquered the world, and for the want of other worlds to conquer died an inglorious death—a slave to debauchery.

A few hundred years later Hannibal lived by the sword, destroyed peoples and nations, and then, in exile, died from self-inflicted poison.

Then came Caesar to conquer and to control with unlimited power the empire of the world.

Caesar was assassinated by Brutus.

Still later the world had to reckon with Napoleon.

During his life of 52 years he destroyed nations and conquered millions until he had the world at his feet. Later he was forced to abdicate, and in exile died on the lonely isle of St. Helena.

Thus it has always been with dictators.

History has no record where any dictator ever left a successor.

While the clouds are now black and low, they will clear away. I cannot believe that civilization will either commit suicide or be shackled into bondage.

The paramount issue in every campaign is the problem uppermost in the people's minds.

In this campaign the issues will be, first, military preparedness, and, second, the record of the party now in power.

Although we are approaching the national-convention dates, no one can now foretell the exact conditions which will confront our people in November.

Should the issues shift from the problems of today to the record of our party, then we are prepared to meet the enemy on any battlefield it may select.

Were it not for the wars abroad and the possible threat of war at home, the paramount issues would be, first, the elimination of unemployment, and, second, the regulation and control of monopolies.

Should the opposition decide to attack our record, we shall ask them if they are opposed to taking care of the unemployed until such time as those in distress may find jobs in private industry?

We shall ask them if they are against the old-age pension system, inaugurated for the first time under a Democratic administration?

We shall ask them if they are opposed to the National Youth program?

We shall ask them if they are opposed to the Civilian Conservation camps?

We shall ask them if they are opposed to our policies relating to the agricultural interests of the Nation.

We shall ask them if they are opposed to our policies regarding labor.

We shall ask them if they are opposed to our liberal treatment of the ex-service men.

We shall ask them if they are opposed to our policy of guaranteeing bank deposits; of rural electrification; of public works; of public housing; and of flood control.

To the critics of our record, we shall ask them if they are opposed to the masses of the people having a voice in government and if they favor the return of public affairs to the special, privileged, and monopolistic interests of the Nation.

The voters of Oklahoma and the Nation will answer these questions at the polls in November.

We do not enter this campaign upon the assumption that we have made no mistakes.

As evidence that our party has made mistakes, I recall the fact that in the election of 4 years ago we lost two States, the States of Maine and Vermont.

We expect to do better in this campaign.

It is obvious that all our national problems have not been solved; likewise, it is obvious that some of our suggested and tried solutions have not been perfect.

The greater our population, the more complicated our civilization, and the longer our State and Nation live, the more problems we will have to meet and solve.

In the place of developing a perfect system of government, no doubt our descendants will discover that where we had few problems to meet and solve, they will have hundreds if not thousands of problems for solution.

In conclusion, we should rejoice and give constant thanks that our people are at peace.

Today we hear no roar of cannon.

We hear no sirens advising of air attack.

We hear no swishing of shells and bombs.

We hear no wails of frightened and injured women and children, and we feel secure from attack.

I bring you assurance that the Democratic administration at Washington, above all things, desires to remain at peace with all the world.

At this moment the issue is Roosevelt, preparedness, and peace.

Who among the 130,000,000 of our people is best fitted and prepared to lead and guide us through these troubled times?

The States, east and west, north and south, have already given the answer, and the answer is, with one acclaim, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Flag Day in 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, at this time in the world's history the symbols of nationalism are flaunted in defiance of peace and international good will. We in America, however, enjoy the blessings of life and liberty under the protection of a flag which symbolizes the highest achievement in democratic government.

SENSES ARE QUICKENED

Flag Day this year arouses our sense of patriotism and strengthens the bonds of unity for which our national emblem stands.

With the grave realization that the moral and human values which our flag represents are crumbling in other lands, we are more deeply determined that those values shall be preserved here.

Representing, as it does, the Thirteen Colonies grown into a Nation composed of 48 united States, we honor our flag—not as an empty symbol—but as a vital reality which heralds to the world our conviction and determination to preserve the democratic way of living, now being extinguished abroad.

WE REDEDICATE OURSELVES

With the loyalty of patriots we should mark this Flag Day above all others as a day of rededication to the principles for which it stands.

To our resolve that the protection of this banner of liberty shall not pass from our own land, we hopefully add the fervent prayer that the justice and freedom for which it stands shall not be blotted out in the other countries of the earth.

Is There No Constitutional Way?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, why must we in this body, made up largely of well-trained lawyers, be forced to vote for or against bills which are plainly unconstitutional, yet introduced in the name of a good and patriotic cause? Every Member of this body has sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States. Is there no way that we can solve the serious problems facing us without flouting the supreme law of the land, or ignoring it and hypocritically throwing the responsibility into the lap of someone else? Twice recently my conscience and my oath of office have required me to vote against measures apparently wanted by many of my constituents. Perhaps those constituents had only the general idea of each bill, wishing the general purpose accomplished, without any way of knowing the actual wording or implication of either bill when put to a final vote.

The bill we have just passed, providing deportation of Harry Bridges, is one of the cases referred to. He may be an undesirable alien. I do know that he has caused great loss to my constituents by tying up shipping on the Pacific coast. For that reason alone many citizens of my State would be pleased to have him out of this country. Then, again, in these dangerous days of "enemies within the gates," of "boring from within," and of "fifth column" fears, it behooves us to protect our very national security. I detest and wish to avoid labor troubles which cause great loss to laborers, to employers, and to the public generally. I abhor and wish to safeguard against that treachery which plots against the security of our people while enjoying our hospitality. Can we not accomplish the necessary and desirable thing without applying a remedy more dangerous than the ailment?

The bill we passed here today is not the bill which was presented to the House by voting the rule. I voted for the rule to make consideration of this proposal possible. I hoped for some amendment which would make it possible for me to vote for final passage of the bill. The original bill was bad enough, being plainly unconstitutional, but the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and adopted was worse, being doubly unconstitutional. The substitute bill was the one that was passed, and it denies the use of the writ of habeas corpus.

The writ of habeas corpus shall never be denied except in case of war or of invasion.

Are we in war, or has this country been invaded?

For many years I attempted to teach constitutional government. How very many times students have heard these words:

No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Or—

The writ of habeas corpus shall never be denied except in case of war or invasion.

The bill the House passed here today, in my solemn judgment, violates the Constitution of the United States in all three of these respects.

The situation in the world at large is very dark now. Must we get hysterical and reenact the frenzy of the first World War? We have, from the legislative angle, just about completed an enormous program of self-defense for the Nation. Have we not turned the alien problem over to the Department of Justice where it can be more logically handled than by the Department of Labor? Have we not greatly increased the appropriations and personnel of the Federal Bureau of Investigation? Can we not safely look to our courts to follow the law? If our present laws under the Constitution are not adequate, then we had better make them more nearly adequate—but under the Constitution.

Deportation of Bridges Would Be Blow to Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW A. DUNN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, my reason for not supporting H. R. 9766, a bill to authorize the deportation of Harry Renton Bridges, is because, in my opinion, the measure is unfair, unjust, and undemocratic. Mr. Bridges had been accused of subversive activities; however, he was exonerated by the Department of Labor. There is no reason, therefore, why Congress should pass a law to deport him from this country. It is my opinion that if this bill is enacted into law it will be a severe blow to labor.

Keep War Out of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 14 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSH LEE, OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, last night I delivered an address to the graduates of National University. I ask leave to have it printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chancellor and graduates of National University, you have finished a course of study which is based upon the theory that man has an inherent right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as a matter of justice, but this theory of government is being challenged today by the barbaric theory that "might makes right." At this very hour, democracy is at death grips with despotism.

The invaded countries of Europe did not elect to get into war but they were not strong enough to repel invasion and war came to them.

Some people seem to think of the war today as a placid lake which we can get into or stay out of at will but it is much more like a raging fire that spreads and grows in fury as it spreads, coming closer to America every hour.

President Roosevelt realized at least 3 years ago that the United States should begin strengthening her national defenses. But there were certain self-styled champions of peace in this country who started shouting, "He is going to get us into war." This is the battle cry of the "fifth column" in the United States today. This is their slogan, and with it they have delayed America's national-defense program 3 years.

The war in Europe is not a static thing but it is a spreading conflagration.

What did Poland do to get into war? What did Norway do to get itself invaded? Did the Queen of Holland lead her country into war? Did King Leopold get Belgium into war?

The answer to these questions is obvious. The choice of getting into war or not getting into war was not left to these countries, nor will it be left to the United States.

Hitler decided only one question before he started his "blitzkrieg" rumbling toward Warsaw, and that question was whether or not he was able to take that country.

Today great danger threatens the United States. Weakness invites attack, and our defenses are not adequate.

Suppose the dictators should win a quick victory over the Allies, as they plan to. Even if we should be able to prevent the invasion of the United States, which is doubtful, we still would be at a great disadvantage in trying to maintain the Monroe Doctrine. Our Navy is not large enough to guard both the Pacific and the Atlantic.

The dictators have already penetrated Mexico and South America by means of the "fifth column." Brazil and Uruguay are honeycombed with their agents.

The State Department has been so concerned about Nazi activities in Uruguay that two United States warships have been ordered to South American waters. The news of a complete Nazi victory over the Allies would be the signal for a great uprising in these Latin-American countries. The dictators could move in immediately and establish their military bases in the Western Hemisphere.

In fact, they have already sent military supplies to South America, according to John G. Norris, who says, in an article in the Washington Post of June 6—I quote:

"* * * These sources revealed that Berlin is making deliveries of field guns, machine guns, and other military equipment to Brazil, despite the great demands of her own army."

Now couple this with the statement made yesterday by the President of Brazil which statement was interpreted as preliminary to the establishment of a totalitarian government for Brazil.

Then couple this with Hitler's plans, as reported by Herman Rauschning, who was a member of the Reichstag and a friend of Hitler, wherein he tells how in 1933 Hitler at his mountain hideout planned the conquest of South America by means of the infiltration of Nazi agents and quoted Hitler as saying, "We will make them a present of our philosophy."

Couple this with Mussolini's statements in his declaration-of-war speech, in which he said that the war was against those who—I quote: "Cling to monopoly of all riches and all gold on earth."

It is well known that the United States has over three-fifths of the gold supply of the entire world buried in Kentucky. These two gangster robbers who dream of world domination look with lustful eyes upon the resources and wealth of the Americas.

If the dictators are able to destroy the Allies this summer, how could the United States prevent them from establishing military bases in the countries to the south? Do you think that Hitler has not thought of that? If so, then you underestimate the master mind who planned and executed successfully the greatest and most diabolical schemes in military history.

There are those who rely upon the statement of Winston Churchill that the British will never surrender their navy, but when total war comes to England and Hitler tells the British Government that unless they surrender the navy he will annihilate the British people, who could blame the Britons then if they purchased immunity from that fate by the surrender of the navy?

The Nazis have superiority in the air; they have superiority on the land, but they smart under the fact that they do not have superiority on the sea. Therefore, they will stop at nothing in order to gain the British fleet.

Then again, some have said that the Nazis would be too exhausted after the war with the Allies to immediately move upon the Western Hemisphere. But why would the conquerers be exhausted? They would have under their power all the resources and men of western Europe. They would have all of the captured war equipment of 12 nations, besides their own.

Therefore, the totalitarian powers, flushed with victory and strengthened by acquisition, would not likely wait long enough to give the United States a chance to arm.

No, my young friends, I will not deceive you. Great danger threatens the United States today. The "fifth column" propagandists would lull the people of the United States to sleep with a sense of false security. The time has come to look with suspicion upon the patriotism of those who would discount the danger that threatens America.

When Paul Revere flashed through the countryside shouting "To arms! to arms! danger is coming," I am sure the "fifth columnists" of that day were quick to say, "There is no danger. That madcap has war hysteria. If he doesn't quiet down he is going to get us into war." But would he have been a patriot if he had not sounded the danger signal?

When the sexton flashed the gleam from the tower of the Old North Church, he flashed a gleam of warning to the people that danger was coming. No doubt there were those who said then, "Why, there's no danger. That old man's got war hysteria. Everybody go back to sleep."

The people who are now ridiculing the idea of invasion of America by the totalitarian powers are the very same ones who said only a year ago, "There isn't going to be any war." But can we rely upon the assurances of these false prophets?

You may be sure that if the Allies are destroyed before we get armed the dictators will be on American soil and bring with them total war.

There is only one chance for America to escape that fate, and that is for the dictators to be stopped in Europe or else be delayed long enough for America to arm.

Therefore, by furnishing materials to the Allies we can strengthen our own defense and give ourselves more time to prepare. We should send everything except men to help the Allies. We do not have enough tanks and planes and guns to fight the Natzis by ourselves, but what we have, added to what the Allies have, might turn the tide of battle now and save America from a baptism of blood.

If France and England are destroyed, then for the first time in our history the United States will stand alone without one single first-rate power as a friend, and surrounded by totalitarian powers, the mortal enemies of democracy.

Therefore we should redouble every effort to send the Allies materials.

The greatest battle of all history is now raging in France. It is a battle for humanity between democracy and despotism. Every time a gallant eagle of Britain falls with a broken wing there is one less champion of liberty in the world. Every time a French 75 is silenced there is one less gun to speak for democracy. Every time a gallant French soldier goes down in battle there is one soldier less between the Nazi "blitzkrieg" and the youth of America.

Every time Hitler's engines of war advance another mile they draw a mile closer to America.

It is heartbreaking to read of the gallant soldiers of France and England fighting without ammunition, surrounded on three sides, bombed from above, and courageously attacking mechanized monsters with nothing but bayonets.

If not in the interest of humanity, if not in the cause of democracy, then, in the name of self-interest, we must speed supplies to them.

The War Minister of France announced before the battle for Paris that 500 American planes would make sure that not a German would pass. But those American planes did not arrive and the Germans did pass.

If it is not already too late, we must try to make up for lost time. President Roosevelt, the skipper of our old ship of state, has placed his mouth to the speaking tube and called to the United States crew, "Full steam ahead!"

Young people, this is the greatest task which confronts you today. Its solution means the difference between war and peace for our country.

The blood of American youth is so much more precious than the material wealth of the United States that we should use all of that wealth, if necessary, to keep war out of America.

I thank you.

Housing and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 14 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] at the meeting of the executive representatives of the United States Housing Authority and over the Mutual Broadcasting System Thursday evening, June 13, 1940, at the Hotel Washington, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

These are truly times that try men's souls.

A few thousand miles away men are dying in battle. Giant mechanical monsters are mowing down human beings like blades of grass. Death rains from the air. There used to be a saying that every time you take a breath somewhere in the world there is someone who is dying. Tonight, I am afraid, there are hundreds who are dying even as I speak these words.

Here in the Americas we are all agreed that there is only one thing to do—build our defenses. Without adequate defense we are helpless. Unless we buckle down to the task of building a mighty air force, a powerful mechanized army, and an invincible navy, we are inviting disaster.

But how many of us realize what a real defense program means? Are there not too many who still think of a defense program as something that can be brought into existence merely by voting more funds for the armed forces?

The Governments of Great Britain and France, I believe, made this mistake. From recent developments it seems that they very definitely failed to coordinate all the factors involved in defense, to muster up all the resources at their command. Germany, however, knew better. The might of the German war machine is based upon years of detailed planning, of careful—almost diabolical—coordination.

We Americans must learn the lesson of recent events. We must make full utilization of our national resources—our manpower, our machines, our wealth.

It is for this reason that I welcomed the opportunity to address this gathering of housing officials. I believe that adequate housing in the areas where defense industries are expanding or are soon to expand is essential to the success of our defense program.

Suppose we should have certain industries work overtime supplying machinery essential to the airplane industry. Suppose, then, that the men who work with these machines should grow careless, should misuse them, should fail to lubricate them properly, should overlook keeping them clean. The result would be a sad falling off in efficiency. It would mean less output per hour worked and more expenditure per airplane produced.

Now, I have no fears whatsoever about the proper maintenance of the machinery necessary to our defense program. People understand the importance of machinery. Both labor and management will be on the alert to insure good maintenance.

But how about the maintenance of the men who work these machines?

I have fears on this point. Our Nation does not yet fully understand the importance of maintaining men in as good condition as machinery. There is a serious danger that we will not be quick enough to guarantee decent housing for the men who flock to the expanding defense industries.

But we cannot avoid understanding this fact sometime. If we wait, if we dilly-dally at this moment, it will be brought home to us later when we find workers in key-defense industries sharing beds on a three-men-a-day basis—as happened in many towns during the last war period. It will be brought home to us when we are able to look back after a year's effort and see how many skilled workers have given up their jobs in the defense industries because there was no place in town where they could get decent homes for their wives and children. It will be brought home to us when we have already wasted both time and money.

During the last war I had occasion to study the haphazard, unstudied methods used in facing the acute housing emergency. There was little appreciation beforehand of how critical the housing shortage would become. There was no experience upon which to rely. The result was row after row of cheap, flimsy barracks that were hardly worth a fraction of the money put into them. They didn't fully serve the purpose at the time. When the war was over, they soon deteriorated beyond all hope of decent use.

Today we are more fortunate. We already have the technique and the personnel needed to help us plan and put into effect a housing program to meet the needs of all the localities with expanding defense industries. We have the United States Housing Authority; we have the some 470 local housing authorities that have been set up throughout the Nation.

To those members of the local housing authorities who are here tonight I would like to say this: You are practical men. You have your fingers on the pulse of your local communities. You know how to get things done quickly, economically. It is you, therefore, who must shoulder the responsibility of coordinating housing with defense, of analyzing the needs of the defense workers in your community, and of preparing to meet their needs promptly with housing that will be more than temporary shacks.

To those citizens who, in following the progress of our national-defense program, tend to think in terms of planes and guns only, I would like to say this: Adequate defense means a mobilization of all our industrial forces. It means dozens of other things besides armaments. And high on the list of these other things are decent homes for Americans, homes worth fighting for, homes in which the defense industry worker or the sailor at his naval base can live a normal, healthy life.

Our country needs well-trained men and women. In response to that need our Government should make it possible that these men and women be decently housed.

Aids "Short of War"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 14 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY BAINBRIDGE COLBY

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, today's Washington, D. C., Evening Star carries an article headed "Aids 'Short of War' may involve us, says Bainbridge Colby. Our conduct can readily be construed as acts of belligerency, he holds."

Why tie us up to a tottering empire? Why imperil our very national existence by stripping America of all its defenses to aid a national already beaten?

GREAT BRITAIN AND FRANCE DECLARED WAR ON GERMANY

Great Britain and France declared war on Germany. Let them find their way out. There is no obligation on our part to save them from a peril which they themselves invited by a declaration of war on a nation with which they were at peace.

I ask unanimous consent that the article by Bainbridge Colby be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of June 14, 1940]

AIDS "SHORT OF WAR" MAY INVOLVE US, SAYS BAINBRIDGE COLBY—OUR CONDUCT CAN READILY BE CONSTRUED AS ACT OF BELLIGERENCY, HE HOLDS

President Roosevelt's declaration to use "methods short of war" in aiding the cause of democracy and his proposal to turn back surplus warplanes, guns, and ammunition to their manufacturers for resale to the Allies are here discussed by Bainbridge Colby, prominent lawyer and statesman, who served as Secretary of State in President Wilson's Cabinet.

(By Bainbridge Colby)

The question is asked me, How is our neutrality in the European conflict affected by the administration's decision to turn back to their manufacturers warplanes now in the use and possession of the Government for resale to the Allies?

We are told these planes are to be taken from various Naval Aviation Reserve squadrons; that they are in excess of our immediate requirements; that their loss to our armed strength will be made up by replacements soon to be ready.

Turning the planes back to the companies which made them, we are assured from Washington, will "technically avoid the implications of a government-to-government sale." We will thus avoid the consequences of selling planes direct to the Allied Governments, which might be regarded as an act of war, and can therefore persist in our pretension of neutrality, which but for this "subterfuge" might be gravely compromised.

The least said about neutrality in the light of this development, it seems to me, the better. American neutrality has become little more than a forgotten flag on a deserted fort.

AID NEEDED LONG AGO

The aid which it is proposed to rush to the Allies may be demanded by a sound view of our national interest. I do not dispute it. It should have been extended long ago. A large measure of earnest and enthusiastic popular support is behind it. It is impossible to ignore what has befallen the peoples of Europe who staked their national existence upon a strict maintenance of neutrality.

But this sleight of hand with Government property is not neutrality, whatever else it may be.

A neutral state "is bound not to supply armed forces to a belligerent, not to grant passage over its territory to such forces and not to sell them ships or munitions of war even when the sale takes place in the ordinary course of getting rid of superfluous or obsolete equipment." (John Bassett Moore's Digest of International Law (ed. 1906), vol. VII, p. 863.)

GRAVE OFFENSE

"It is a grave offense against the law of nations for a neutral government to sell a man-of-war to a belligerent," said Secretary of State Day in a communication to John Hay, then Ambassador to England, under date of June 25, 1898. In war as it is conducted today there is no distinction between a warship and a fighting or pursuit plane insofar as the duties of neutral nations are concerned. Nor will fraud and stratagem avail, as a United States court has held, to give to conduct which is essentially unneutral in purpose and intent the garb of neutrality.

There is no such thing as unneutral neutrality. Neutrality consists in abstinence from participation in any war to which the neutral nation is not a party, and an impartiality of conduct toward the belligerents without favoring either as against the other. The old distinctions between perfect, qualified, benevolent, or armed neutrality no longer possess legal significance or practical importance. The reciprocal rights and duties existing between the belligerents and neutrals as set forth in the Hague Regulations (1907) and in the Declaration of London (1909) constitute the accepted code of international law on the subject of neutrality. States are either belligerent or neutral. There is no middle ground—not even nonbelligerence.

MEASURES SHORT OF WAR

President Roosevelt contributed much to the prevalent loose thinking and confusion on the subject of our duties as a neutral by his unfortunate expression "measures short of war." Such measures have no place in a policy of neutrality. Measures short of war may easily carry us to war—bring or provoke a declaration of war by an angered or an aggrieved belligerent.

As a matter of fact, measures short of war have a definite and restricted meaning in international law. They include:

1. The laying of an embargo or the sequestration of the ships or goods of the offending nation.
2. Taking forcible possession of the thing in question.
3. The exercise of the right of retaliation.
4. Reprisals upon the possessions of the offending nation until satisfactory reparation for the injuries is made.

To use the expression, as the President does, to include any action, however hostile or hurtful, short of sending a military or naval expedition to the scene of conflict, is well calculated to involve us in war with all the consequences of belligerency.

The matter of the war planes and the specious method proposed for their transfer to the service of the Allies is a striking illustration of this danger. It is certainly not neutral conduct and might readily be construed as an act of war and treated as such.

If it happily proves to be a "measure short of war" as the President employs the phrase, it will be solely because present German policy does not elect to treat it as an abandonment of our neutral status.

Participation in War and Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, June 14 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RESOLUTIONS OF VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD sundry resolutions passed by the last national encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars on the subject of keeping us out of war and national preparedness.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPPOSING FOREIGN ENTANGLEMENTS AS CAUSE OF WAR

Whereas we, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, are fully aware that this year has been one of peril and despair for many nations and of threatened war and disaster for most nations; and

Whereas we, as citizens of the United States of America, in this the one hundred and sixty-third year of our independence, do realize and appreciate that our faith in liberty and justice are the principles and virtues for which our flag stands; and

Whereas we, as members of a patriotic veteran organization, are deeply grateful for the blessings of peace and freedom which we all enjoy in this great Nation of ours: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we go on record as being opposed to any foreign entanglements; and in case there are at present any such secret treaties or agreements now in effect, or later adopted, that the American people be immediately informed, and that we may maintain our present assurance and satisfaction of being a peaceful, free people in a secure democratic country under a just Government.

SUPPORTING NATIONAL-DEFENSE PROGRAM

Be it resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we give unanimous endorsement to a strong national-defense program for the United States and one that will be capable of meeting on equal terms the armed forces of any other nation or combination of nations that may ever threaten the security of our shores or the principles of the Monroe Doctrine; and be it further

Resolved, That we favor such expenditures as may be necessary for the upbuilding of our national-defense system, including air forces and naval strength, to sufficient proportions to give the United States the balance of power in any dispute that may arise between our country and any other country that may be inclined to question America's position in the Western Hemisphere.

A PROGRAM OF NATIONAL DEFENSE AND SECURITY

Whereas the world is in a political and economic turmoil, with powerful nations prepared to take by force what they may want, in a world in which war has been present almost continuously during the 20 years since the World War, and when treaties and solemn compacts no longer bind their signatories; and

Whereas we view with approval the efforts of this Nation in the last year—

1. To maintain its peace and safety in a troubled world.
2. To build its Navy to a strength sufficient to protect our shores and our outlying bases against every possible aggressor.
3. To increase its strength in the air of the Navy and Army to a size to combat successfully the air fleets that could be brought against us.
4. To increase the Regular Army and the National Guard to provide an initial protective force of 400,000 to provide for our national protection without delay, and to equip those forces with the best and latest arms, transportation, and equipment.
5. To provide for the training of the Organized Reserves, the R. O. T. C., and the C. M. T. C., so as to produce a civilian army of maximum strength to support the initial force when necessary, and to plan for the manufacture and delivery of modern supplies when needed.

Whereas we as veterans oppose war here and elsewhere now and forever, but as veterans we recognize that preparedness for emergency is the only remaining means to maintain peace for our prosperous and glorious Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Fortieth National Encampment, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, approves and supports a program for national security adequate to preserve and defend the Republic of the United States of America from all enemies whomsoever.

ACTUAL NEUTRALITY FOR THE UNITED STATES

Whereas "power politics" have long been the most potent factor in the policies of the more powerful nations of Europe and Asia; and

Whereas recent developments in Europe have definitely established that economic prestige and power considerations are of much greater importance to, and a much greater motivating force in, the various countries in Europe and Asia than are any differences in their respective ideologies of government; and

Whereas the World War did not end all wars, did not advance the ideals of democracy, and did not restrain the spread of autocratic, dictatorial, and totalitarian forms of government, as per the hopes held out in the slogans used by American citizens during the period of the World War, as justification for our participation therein; and

Whereas our participation in the World War has so far cost the Nation more than $50,000,000,000, the lives of more than 130,000 of the youth of our Nation, more than 193,000 wounded, and service-connected disabilities for perhaps more than 500,000, of whom 340,000 are now receiving compensation, in addition to unmeasured misery for the surviving widows and orphans and parents of deceased World War veterans; and

Whereas our Nation's participation in any possible future world war would prove to be infinitely more devastating and costly, economically, financially, and in the lives and health of the youth and citizens of our Nation, than was so as to the last World War, with no resulting advantages for our country or for civilization generally which would justify such sacrifices on our part; and

Whereas it is believed that it would be infinitely better for the cause of civilization generally, and for the cause of our country and its people in particular, that the United States keep out of war: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we do hereby advocate the adoption and application of the following policies, designed to keep America out of war:

1. Adequate mechanized, motorized matériel and trained men for national defense.
2. Renounce war as an instrument of international policy.
3. Recognize the existence of war regardless of its formal declaration by any belligerent.
4. Advocate compliance with the provisions of the Kellogg Treaty.
5. Proclamation by the United States that it will not engage in any war of aggression.
6. Proclamation by the United States that it will support and defend the Monroe Doctrine.
7. Withdraw armed protection to American citizens, after a period of warning, during their continued travel or residence in any country at war or in any war danger zone.
8. Disclaim responsibility for the safety of American citizens in any country which is at war or in any war danger zone.
9. Continue compliance with the provisions of the so-called Johnson Act.
10. Prohibit the extension of credit or loans by the United States, or any of its citizens, to any country, or its citizens, which is engaged in war.
11. Permit sale of supplies to any nation at war only if paid for, and only if ownership thereof is transferred at our shore lines, without any protection or responsibility whatsoever by the United States Government as to same.
12. Prohibit any American merchant vessels from becoming armed.
13. Provide for the clear identification of all American merchant vessels during time of war between other nations.
14. Disclaim any responsibility for the protection of any American merchant vessels which carry any merchandise to any country at war or into any danger zone, but permit clearance of American vessels only if adequate private insurance is carried on such vessels and members of their crews, which travel into any danger zones.
15. Take the profits out of any possible future war by steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes.
16. Enact legislation to provide adequately for all disabled veterans, and the dependents of all deceased veterans, of all wars, past and future.
17. Conduct an educational program to show the costs of war.
18. Encourage peaceful international negotiations to adjust most irritating deficiencies, differences, and inequities among nations.

MOBILIZATION OF MONEY AND CREDIT DURING TIME OF WAR

Be it resolved, by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we do hereby reaffirm our support of proposed legislation to provide for the mobilization and drafting of money and credit during time of war, by the issuance, as soon as feasible after the beginning of any war in which the United States might unfortunately become engaged, of non-tax-exempt, low-rate, interest-bearing, nonnegotiable, short-term Government bonds, to be purchased by all residents of the country in proportion to their respective wealth, on a graduated basis, as determined by valuation boards, with the specific provision that such bonds shall be redeemed by the Government as soon as possible out of the income derived from steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes to be imposed on a pay-as-you-go basis, as provided in part in S. 1650, introduced by Senator JOSH LEE, of Oklahoma, and favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

MOBILIZE INDUSTRY DURING TIME OF WAR

Be it resolved, by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That the national defense committee and the national legislative committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars are hereby directed to make a careful study as to the need for additional legislation to provide for the effective and speedy mobilization of manpower, capital, transportation, communication, and matériel resources, in the event of war, and that upon the conclusion of such study, the national legislative committee is hereby authorized and directed to sponsor, support, and cooperate with others in securing the enactment of proposed legislation to provide for such objectives, to the end that the prospects for war might thereby be discouraged, and further, to the end that, if war should come, the United States would be the better prepared to terminate such war successfully as soon as possible.

TAX THE PROFITS OUT OF WAR

Whereas the Veterans of Foreign Wars has consistently advocated that the most effective measures designed to keep America out of war are by: (1) an adequate national defense, (2) an actual neutrality, (3) government control of munitions, and (4) taxing the profits out of war; and

Whereas the only honest and effective means to take the profit out of war is to tax the profits out of war, by steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes; and,

Whereas other proposed wartime controls of prices, priorities, finance expansion, industry, labor and man-power could not be fully effective, even during time of war, without complete regimentation—whether it be called state socialism, communism, or fascism—which it might be impossible to discontinue after the termination of war, and which, if discontinued, would certainly be followed by demands for damages, with interest and profits for the use of conscripted property, thus guaranteeing war profits to all government contractors, and thus failing to take the profit out of war and out of war's aftermath; and

Whereas factual evidence has been presented definitely establishing that the prospects of huge war profits is an incentive to develop enthusiasm and fervor for war, and thereby furnishes a motive toward war, without adequate forethought as to the resulting sacrifices of the lives and limbs of the patriotic youth of our Nation who respond to the Nation's emergency call; and

Whereas the adoption of a law during time of peace which will tax the profits out of war by the imposition of steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes would make all American citizens desirous of avoiding war and, at the same time, by its implied promise that the profits of war would be made to pay for the burdens of war, would thereby help to increase the enthusiasm of all American citizens more effectively to cooperate in bringing about the termination of any war in which the Nation might become engaged just as speedily and as successfully as possible; and

Whereas on the basis of its previous advocacy of an effective law to tax the profits out of war, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States was responsible for, and sponsored, the introduction jointly by 50 United States Senators of S. 1885 on March 21, 1939, and also sponsored 12 identical bills by as many Members of the House of Representatives: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we do hereby emphatically reaffirm our advocacy of proposed legislation to tax the profits out of war by steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes, as proposed in S. 1885, now before the United States Senate of the Seventy-sixth Congress, and in several identical bills in the House of Representatives.

AN ADEQUATE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Whereas the Veterans of Foreign Wars has during the past several years been vigorously advocating specific increases in trained men and modernized, mechanized, motorized matériel for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States and for the National Guard, the C. M. T. C., and the R. O. T. C., and the various Reserve Corps, by liberalized authorizations and appropriations to that end, with the conviction that effective preparedness for war is the best preparedness against war; and

Whereas the authorizations and appropriations for national-defense purposes have each year since 1933 substantially liberalized and added to, responsive to the specific suggestions of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, so that appropriations for the United States armed forces for the current fiscal year are about four times as much as was appropriated for the year 1933 and greater than for any fiscal year during time of peace, for which the President and the Congress of the United States are deserving of the sincere gratitude of the American people; and

Whereas lack of adequate military training was the reason for the useless sacrifice of the lives of many of the youth of America during our Nation's participation in the World War: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we do hereby reaffirm our advocacy of an expanded Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, as well as an expanded National Guard, with C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., and Reserve Corps, with scientifically developed and modernized, mechanized, motorized matériel and equipment, arms and ammunition, ships and airplanes, and other material, as may be considered desirable and feasible by our national committees on national defense and legislation.

TO INCREASE OUR NATIONAL SAFETY

Whereas the unsettled conditions and the constant threat of war throughout the world menace the safety of our country; and

Whereas it is our belief that the United States would be able to make more adequate provision for its national defense if it were in possession of certain strategic and important bases in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans; and

Whereas Senate Joint Resolutions, Nos. 119, 120, 170, 171, 172, 173, and 174, presented to the Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, by United States Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, present a logical plan of securing such bases by providing for negotiations by the President of the United States with a view of acquiring them by purchase: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That the above-listed Senate joint resolutions be supported by our organization, and the national legislative committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars be instructed to act accordingly.

STATEMENT BY MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM C. RIVERS, RETIRED

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, retired, as carried by the United Press Association under a New York date line of May 20, 1940. This article relates to national defense, our foreign policy, and allied subjects.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The United Press Association sent the following telegram to the press of the country. I was requested by their representative to give my convictions—following 47 years in the uniform at West Point and in the Army. My service included some of the later red Indian campaigns in the West, Santiago in Cuba, the Philippines, and France, where I had a line-of-battle command in all our major battles. I gave the following statement to the press representative, with permission to publish it if he felt it was couched in temperate language:

President Roosevelt's excellent address to Congress set forth our rearmament needs clearly.

I would also apply what Col. Charles A. Lindbergh said Sunday night in his recent remarks on the radio. Colonel Lindbergh thinks we should determine some matters of our foreign policy—to tell what is our policy and what we propose to defend before we can rearm. That is wise.

Among decisions on foreign policy which I think sound is that we should reacclaim that the people who live in the two American continents shall settle the future of the two Americas—the Monroe Doctrine.

I am convinced it is inevitable that the people who live in Europe will settle the future of Europe and that the people who live in northeastern Asia are going to settle the future of northeastern Asia.

Colonel Lindbergh emphasizes the great advantage of our insular and detached position and the advantage this gives us. I feel we should recognize that the war in Europe is Europe's war; that we should keep out of Europe's war and keep out of eastern Asia's war.

No nation can attack us by air without first setting up a great air base in North or South America. We should control from the mid-Atlantic westward to the mid-Pacific—one-half of the circumference of the earth. I favor continuing the fortification of Johnson, Palmyra, and the Aleutian Islands—all in the eastern part of the Pacific.

After many years' residence in the Far East, I am convinced that Guam is indefensible, even if the colossal sum of $250,000,000 were spent on it. Guam is 3,000 miles west of our base at Hawaii and located in the midst of many Japanese islands. The claim is made that Guam aids our defense against Japan. How can this be when Guam is 1,500 miles farther from our west coast than Japan is?

If our fleet is kept alert watching the far-off Philippines and indefensible Guam, it cannot aid any South American nation if such a nation should be attacked. Admiral William D. Leahy gave the Naval Committee of the House last year a good defense line when he said that our normal defense line runs from the Aleutian Islands to the Hawaiian Islands to Samoa and to the Canal at Panama. The admiral said that our fleet is wholly inadequate to take a naval expedition to the Philippines; that it would be doubtful whether this could be done even with a three times increase in the fleet.

We have had a new war scare in the last few weeks—that is, a proposal by some that we should send our fleet out to the Netherland East Indies. This is a far-fetched proposal, indeed. The Netherland East Indies islands are 2,700 miles farther from us than is Japan. They are 2,700 miles out beyond Japan.

We get about 49 percent of our rubber from the Netherland East Indies and about the same percentage of our tin. The tin we buy from people in Europe and in England, where there are smelters for making tin. The rubber we get from agents who import it from the Netherland East Indies.

However, these agents, if they had to send out to Java for these necessary products, could easily send by way of the Atlantic Ocean. There is no need of sending across the Pacific by way of Japan.

Three important matters stand out as lessons from Britain's reverses in Norway and the fighting in the Low Countries and France. One is the increase in power of the air bomber to aid attacks on land. Its mobility and speed enable it to take the place of artillery in some battles.

Another lesson is the greater power of the air bombers over warships, especially in narrow seas.

The third, and most important, lesson for Britain is her need for a cabinet minister of defense. Such a cabinet officer would spend his whole time in studying and making personal inspections of defense matters.

Nineteen of the principal countries have a cabinet minister of defense. Such a minister would control, not merely coordinate, the army, navy, and air forces. A crucial need for our own defense is to have such a cabinet minister in charge of all three of the armed branches.

There seems to be some confusion of thought in this country and in Congress about several important defense matters. A cabinet minister of defense would be of great value in that he could give an impersonal and objective view of these problems.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 14 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EXCERPT FROM ARTICLE BY LEONARD LYONS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD one paragraph entitled "Employment Department" from a column written by Mr. Leonard Lyons under the caption of "The New Yorker."

This paragraph was taken from the column of Mr. Lyons published in the Washington Post, issue of Tuesday, June 11, 1940. I call particular attention to the fact that Mr. Menken was not able to carry on his work abroad, due to the fact that he was unable to secure a labor permit from the French and British Governments.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMPLOYMENT DEPARTMENT

The best news reels of the war were obtained for Paramount by Arthur Menken, son of S. Stanwood Menken. He photographed the evacuation of Norway, and that film now has become a historic document of warfare. Menken's work also was outstanding in Spain and in China, where he photographed the bombing of the Panay. But he no longer is working for Paramount because he was unable to secure a labor permit from the French and British Governments.

Trumbull Families of Connecticut and the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 14 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM CONNECTICUT CIRCLE

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting article on the distinguished and famous and patriotic Trumbull families of Connecticut and the United States.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Connecticut Circle for June 1940]

TRUMBULL FAMILIES OF CONNECTICUT AND THE UNITED STATES

(Compiled by Marjorie E. Case under the direction of James Brewster, librarian, Connecticut State Library.)

Perhaps no other family has contributed so much to Connecticut's official, military, and artistic life as the famous Trumbull family of Lebanon. The greatest member of that family was undoubtedly "Brother Jonathan," Governor from 1769 to 1784. The only Governor who was loyal to the American cause during the crucial Revolutionary period, he was much esteemed by George Washington. His store in Lebanon, once the headquarters for a large mercantile business, became the war office, the scene of many important conferences with revolutionary leaders, and is now the property of the Connecticut Society of Sons of the American Revolution.

The title of "His Excellency" was conferred upon Governor Jonathan by the general assembly in May 1777. It is said that between 1775 and 1785 he received only £300 for expenses—small wonder, then, that his formerly large estate was insolvent when he died. As evidence of his popular esteem, there were named for him during his lifetime at least two ships, and later a Connecticut town, a highway, and streets in several towns.

The Governor had four sons, each of whom became famous in his own right; Joseph (1737–78) was a member of the Continental Congress and was first commissary general of the Continental Army, 1775–77.

Jonathan (1740–1809) was an aide to Washington, a United States Senator, and Governor from 1797 to 1809. Trumbull County in Ohio, once part of Connecticut's western reserve, was named for him.

David (1752–1822) was his father's first assistant in business and at the war office. His son, Joseph (1782–1861), was the third Trumbull Governor of Connecticut, and also a Member of Congress.

John (1756–1843), the unexcelled painter of revolutionary scenes and personages, was the youngest son of Governor Jonathan.

No complete genealogy of the Trumbull family has ever been compiled, but a wealth of interesting data can be found in biographies and biographical sketches, official documents, and private papers, both published and unpublished. As far as can be determined from various sources, the immigrant progenitor of the Lebanon branch was one John Trumble, a copper, from Newcastle-on-Tyne in England, who was in Roxbury, Mass., 1639. His son, Joseph, removed to Suffield. The latter's son, Joseph, left Suffield for Lebanon, where his famous son, Jonathan, was born in 1710.

Other well-known descendents of the same John Trumble include: John (1750–1831), judge, poet, author of M'Fingal; Rev. Benjamin (1735–1820), historian, clergyman; the latter's grandson, Lyman (1813–96), United States Senator from Illinois, 1855–73. The fathers of this John and of Benjamin were first cousins of Governor Jonathan.

There is another Trumbull family whose members have contributed much to Connecticut. Another immigrant John Trumble, a mariner, came over from England and was at Cambridge in 1636, removing to Charlestown in 1655. A descendant, also named John, came to Norwich, Conn., more than a century later. His son, Gurdon, had three sons of more than usual intelligence:

James Hammond (1821–97) was a historian, bibliographer, and philologist of note; our first State librarian, 1854–55; secretary of state, 1861–66; librarian of the Watkinson Library, 1866–90. He edited the first three volumes of published colonial records of Connecticut. His daughter, Annie Eliot, of Hartford, is a writer.

Henry Clay (1830–1903) was a Civil War chaplain, author and editor. His son, Charles Gallaudet, is also an editor, residing in Philadelphia.

Gurdon (1841–1903) was an artist, his specialty being game fish.

Our recent Governor, John H. Trumbull, of Plainville, is descended from neither of the foregoing families, his own father, Hugh, having come from Ireland, although of Scotch ancestry. Ex-Governor Trumbull, known widely as the flying Governor, is founder and president of the Trumbull Electric Manufacturing Co., at Plainville.

It would be interesting to be able to show that all these Trumbull families were related, but this seems to be impossible. Perhaps they were all descended from the Scotch border clan of Turnbull (pronounced Trumbull), of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries.

MARJORIE E. CASE.

Misconduct in the Administration of the National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY N. ROUTZOHN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, in the course of these debates before the House on the proposed amendments to the National Labor Relations Act presented by the Smith committee, it is unanimously conceded by all the majority members of the special committee that the present National Labor Relations Board should be abolished and a new Board substituted. Because of this unanimity no great effort has been made by any of the majority to point out, all and singular, the activities of the members of the Board that justify their removal. In order to remove any doubt as to the justification for this unanimity of opinion as to the desirability of eliminating the present Board, I think it proper at this time to point out some of the deeds of active misconduct, not only on the part of the Board but also on the part of a great number of the Board employees, which demand the creation of a new Board.

There can be no doubt as to the unfitness of the members of the present Board for their positions of trust. Their activities have been such as to shock the sensibilities of all fair-minded men. A brief statement of some of their more vicious practices is enough to convince any unbiased person that the total disregard for the democratic principles displayed by the members of the Board cannot longer be tolerated.

The Chairman of the Board, J. Warren Madden, engaged in one of the most despicable and reprehensible activities in the annals of governmental agencies. He sought to withhold the benefit of Government contracts and Government loans from certain companies alleged to be violators of the National Labor Relations Act, by attempting to blacklist those companies with the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department and with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, both Government agencies. Chairman Madden's blacklist was not limited to companies adjudged guilty by the Board or the courts of violating the National Labor Relations Act; it also included companies merely charged with such violations. Nowhere in our system of jurisprudence can be found a principle that mere accusation is sufficient for the imposition of drastic penalties; yet the Board, through Chairman Madden, attempted to do just this thing.

Chairman Madden admitted that there was no statutory authority for this blacklist; it was a voluntary effort on his part to impose extra-statutory penalties on companies presumed violators of the act in order to exert pressure on these and other companies to maintain the labor relations with their employees that the Board thought desirable. It is a well-known principle of statutory construction that Statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed, that is, where statutes depart from the principles of common law all penalties and rights under those statutes are to be confined to those expressly set out in the statutes. Nothing appears in the National Labor Relations Act that would give the Board, or any of its members, any power to blacklist companies with governmental agencies as a means of correcting alleged unfair labor practices. As a matter of fact, attempts have been made on several occasions to write into the act a provision that violations of the act are to be considered by other governmental agencies in the awarding of Government contracts; on each such occasion Congress rejected the proposal by an overwhelming majority.

It is worthy of note that the Board's attempts to blacklist met with very little success; for instance, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War both flatly refused to cooperate with the Board with respect to these activities. They both stated that no provision of the National Labor Relations Act authorized such a penalty against employers, and since the powers of the Board are confined to the language of the act they would have no part in such unwarranted extra legal procedure. This strong repudiation in no way deterred the Board, however, from continuing its blacklisting efforts; it was not until the Comptroller General of the United States handed down an opinion stating that Government contracts could not be withheld from companies even though the Board's finding of guilt was affirmed by the courts that the Board desisted from this practice, and even as late as August of 1939 the Board entered into an understanding with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation whereby the Board would furnish information to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that would be used by it in its loan policies. The Board's determination to use extra legal means to enforce its policies appears unbounded.

One Board member, Edwin S. Smith, whose unsavory connections with Communists and radical labor leaders were vividly described to the Members of the House by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], so far forgot all the tenets of judicial conduct as to attempt to promote a boycott against a company whose wage policies did not meet with Mr. Smith's approval. Mr. Smith at first attempted to interject himself into the controversy between the company and its employees as a mediator, which, of course, is in direct violation of section 4 of the act. When he was informed that his services were not wanted in that capacity, Mr. Smith transferred his activities to another phase of the union campaign against the company—that of assisting the union in the promotion of a Nation-wide boycott against the company.

This boycott promotion was done by means of a letter to a friend and former employee of Mr. Smith who held an executive position with one of the large department stores of the United States. This letter contained language that directly invited this executive to use the buying power of that department store to influence the company to reach a settlement with its workers. Moreover, with this letter Mr. Smith enclosed a letter he had received from a union official, in which it was stated that the union planned to fight the company in every large city in the United States, and that it would appreciate any cooperation possible from large purchasers of the company's goods. Not only did Mr. Smith write such a letter, but on request from the department-store executive he served as an intermediary in the transmission of certain literature from the union to that executive. Included in this literature was a strong appeal to boycott that company's products.

It is significant that throughout these intermeddlings of Mr. Smith no charges of unfair labor practices had been brought against the company, and thus Mr. Smith was acting in a purely voluntary capacity without even a semblance of official authority. As a matter of fact, some 2 months after these activities, the union admitted to a Board employee that it had no basis for any charges of violations against the company. Subsequently, however, charges were filed with the Board, a hearing was held, the case transferred to the Board without any report of the trial examiner being rendered, and a decision issued by the Board finding the company guilty as charged. In spite of his previous activities on behalf of the union, Mr. Smith participated in the decision finding the company guilty, and apparently saw no impropriety in so doing. This man was entrusted by Congress with the duty of being a fair and impartial judge in the cases coming before him as a member of the Board; his actions in this case clearly show his disqualification for any such position.

All of the members of the Board and the Board's executive staff, including a special staff of some 8 or 10 attorneys, engaged in a campaign, at Government expense, to prevent a threatened reduction in the Board's proposed appropriation and to oppose amendments to the act sponsored by the American Federation of Labor. The campaign was especially directed toward securing the opposition of member locals of the A. F. of L. to the policies of the Federation's executive council. The scope of this campaign was Nation-wide; the regional directors and field agents of the Board maintained a close contact with the various union leaders in their vicinity in order to secure the desired opposition, especially to amendments.

Pressure activities on the part of governmental agencies involving the expenditure of Government funds have been expressly forbidden by an act of Congress and constitute a violation of the United States Criminal Code. Aside from the clear illegality of these activities, the morality of soliciting prospective and, in some instances, current litigants to assist in such campaigns may well be questioned. The obligation implied in such solicitation is obvious; the Board would be compelled to return a quid pro quo in the way of favorable decisions to those unions assisting it. Whenever a judicial tribunal becomes obligated to a litigant in such a manner the efficacy of that tribunal is destroyed; other litigants are placed in the position where their cases are influenced not by the merits of the cause but by the obligations of the Board to those assisting it in its congressional campaigns. Thus, in order to destroy this emasculation of justice, it is necessary to replace these men with new judicial officers who are under no such self-imposed obligations.

The basic act under which the Board functions contains no provision allowing the Board itself to initiate unfair labor practice charges. These charges must be filed by the injured party before the machinery of the act is set in motion. The Board's own rules require the charges to be filed in writing.

Nevertheless, the Board has, on occasion, seen fit to stimulate litigation under circumstances amounting to entrapment in order to establish new doctrines by means of test cases.

Not only has the Board solicited such litigation, but, in at least one case, an important Board official, acting under the direct orders and with the approval of the full Board, conspired with high officials of the C. I. O., including its general counsel, as to the manner of presentation of a test case. This Board official suggested a plan of attack by which the company would be entrapped into an inadvertent violation of the Board's concept of the requirements of collective bargaining, inadvertent because prior to the conspiracy the Board had laid down no principle respecting collective bargaining that the company had not complied with. To further this plan, unusual steps were taken by Board employees prior to the filing of any charges by the union, such as the appointment of the trial examiner to hear the case and the preparation of the complaint. Note especially the preparation of the complaint, which theoretically is based upon the written charges; this shows clearly the active cooperation between the Board and the C. I. O. in this conspiracy.

As soon as the charges were filed, the Board acted with inordinate promptitude in expediting the machinery by which the case could be brought before itself for final determination. It went so far as to dispense with the formality of the trial examiner's intermediate report. Naturally, a finding of guilt by the Board was inevitable, and in this instance a mere formality. Fortunately, however, the Board over-reached itself in its selection of a trial examiner who it was sure would favor its cause, as that trial examiner became so enthusiastic to establish the case against the company that the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit found that his conduct was so prejudicial that it set aside a petition of the Board to enforce its order. Had it not been for the unbounded enthusiasm of the trial examiner, though, the Board might have succeeded in its nefarious purpose. American labor and industry cannot afford to have its rights in the hands of unprincipled men who would stoop to soliciting a test case in order to impose its concepts of labor philosophy on labor and industry; such actions are not to be tolerated and such men must be replaced with men of balanced judgment if our free government is to endure.

One other practice indulged in by the entire Board cannot be passed by without a reference being made to it. That practice is the inventing of remedies to meet situations not covered by the National Labor Relations Act. While pretending to pay homage to the will of Congress in its interpretation of the act, the Board has never been seriously handicapped, in its own estimation, in meeting situations that arose where no statutory authority could be found. Probably the most outstanding example of this practice is the case where the Board ordered the reinstatement with back pay of men who had never been employed by the respondent company. The act provides for the reinstatement with back pay of men discriminatorily discharged through unfair labor practices, but nowhere does it provide that the Board may order the original employment of men and grant them back pay from the time they were refused such employment.

The word "reinstatement" is explicit in the statute, yet Board Chairman Madden stated that the little prefix "re" could be disregarded in order to effectuate the Board's concept of the purposes of the act. In other words, according to Mr. Madden's view, any language in the act that disagreed with the Board's policy could be disregarded in order to allow the substitution of the Board's labor philosophy for that of the Congress. Inasmuch as the National Labor Relations Board is a creature of Congress, owing its existence and its support to Congress, for the Board to take the view expressed by Mr. Madden is tantamount to a repudiation of congressional control. So long as we believe that our Government is a government of laws and not of men, we cannot tolerate such an attitude. Those persons seeking to force such a concept upon us must of sheer necessity be removed from office.

It is true, of course, that the split in the labor movement has rendered doubly difficult the work of the National Labor Relations Board, and made extremely difficult the administration of the act in a field so utterly controversial that only the highest degree of judicial impartiality could have reasonably satisfied the contending factions. Not only did the Board fail to exercise the high degree of impartiality thus made essential, but in its decisions, policies, and interpretations of the act it went out of its way to favor one contending faction over another. For example, by manipulation of the "appropriate bargaining unit" in a manner calculated to ruin labor organizations by depriving them and their members of personal liberty and property rights, the Board has quite naturally aroused the bitterest criticism and evoked vociferous protests from the helpless victims of this unscrupulous form of gerrymandering. In other cases, too, the Board has tended to favor the industrial form of union organization over all others. Thus, instead of adopting the role of an impartial administrator of the act, the Board has sought to impose upon the labor movement its conception of the proper type of unionization. Is it any wonder, then, that the victims of the Board's philosophy have been unanimous in demanding the removal of the men responsible?

In the selection and direction of personnel, the Board has been guilty of extremes of indiscretion and inefficiency. Not only has the Board failed to establish satisfactory policies to govern the selection and supervision of its own employees, but internal dissension has been a striking characteristic of the Board itself. This dissension is not confined to matters of judgment and policy; it goes to the very root of administrative management and to the basic conception of fair play and judicial impartiality.

There can be no doubt that the storm center of the Board, so far as internal dissention and mismanagement is concerned, is the secretary's office. This office performs the functions of a clearing house for the Board. It has its finger in every situation that is in any way connected with the Board, from the appointment of personnel to the formulation of Board policy. The present secretary, Nathan Witt, has been severely criticized by the newest Board member, Dr. William M. Leiserson, for his irregularities in procedure, his incompetency, his bias and partiality, and his failure to seek instructions from the Board on important matters. The criticisms made by this new Board member culminated in a formal motion being made on two occasions at meetings of the Board calling for the dismissal of the secretary and his satellites. Due to the favor in which the secretary finds himself with Board members Madden and Smith—or, perhaps, his domination of them—the motions for his dismissal were not carried. However, the fact that one of the Board members feels that the present secretary and his assistants should be dismissed forthwith is an indictment of the secretary's office in and of itself.

In addition to the secretary and his executive staff, special investigators under the control of the secretary have been the subject of severe criticisms. Their normal functions are the control and supervision of the Board's regional offices. These functions have been executed in such a manner as to arouse the ire and resentment of all those Board employees who have been exposed to their methods of operation. One regional director was so aroused that she sent a lengthy telegram to the Board Chairman, in which she charged that these investigators had acted in a manner similar to the Russian Ogpu. Another regional director told a sorry tale of the orders that he had received from a special investigator to place petitions of independent unions "in the ice box" and to make employers fear him. With this system of espionage prevalent, it is no wonder that the morale of the field employees has been subjected to severe stress and strain.

Exercising probably the most important judicial function of the National Labor Relations Board is the trial examiner's division. When cases pending before the Board reach the stage of public hearings on the merits, they are held, as a general rule, before one of these trial examiners, who acts as a judicial official of the Board. The trial examiner is charged with the duty of building up the record, ruling on motions, and, in general, being responsible for fair conduct of the hearing. This division has rendered itself, under the present Board and with its present personnel, especially vulnerable to criticism by its disregard of the functional separation of powers, which is the root and basis of our democratic system of judicial procedure. Frequently the concept of fair hearing developed by the judiciary and under the Constitution—presumably an essential even in quasi-judicial proceedings—has been ruthlessly cast aside and ignored. Trial examiners have conferred and consulted with regional directors of the Board, with Board attorneys engaged in prosecuting charges before them, and with the home office in order to obtain advice concerning rulings to be made and trial tactics to be followed in the presentation of the Board's cases.

The Chief Trial Examiner, while a regional director of the Board, accepted the appellation of "judge, jury, and prosecutor." Since assuming the office of Chief Trial Examiner, in a lecture to his subordinates he made the statement that the respondent employer has "two strikes" on him in every case before the Board.

Trial examiners, in writing their intermediate reports after hearings, have been known to go outside the record and to incorporate such off-the-record material in their reports. They have been assisted by attorneys from the so-called review division of the Board in the preparation of these intermediate reports. They have been known to change their reports in vital particulars on the advice of other trial examiners or at the instance or the chief trial examiner and his assistant. A number of these trial examiners have been severely castigated by the courts and Board decisions have been reversed as a result of their prejudiced, overbearing, and arrogant methods of operation. Certain of these trial examiners, during the course of hearings, have communicated with their superior in Washington and with great glee have announced that "the case is in the bag" or "this respondent is going to get the 'business' or the 'works,'" or "It is a nice question that can be decided, I think, in favor of the C. I. O. union," or "no examiner has an impartial mind." These are the agents of the Board before whom respondents and their counsel have appeared with the naive expectation that they will receive fair and impartial treatment. Is it any wonder that in their disillusionment organizations and individuals—employers and employees—have cried aloud for a change in the system that permits such evils?

Much has been said on the floor of this House concerning the Board's division of economic research and its evil genius, David J. Saposs; therefore, it is unnecessary for me to dwell at any great length upon them. Suffice it to say that this division, headed by the radical Saposs, not only reflects the extreme of the Board's class consciousness, but is actually beyond the scope of the Board's delegated authority. Not only has this division failed to justify its existence, legally or practically, but its activities and its radical personnel are entirely incompatible with the fundamental legal philosophy which forms the basis for our political structure. The "crusading" spirit of Saposs, who regards the relationship between employer and employee as a sanguinary war between capital and labor and as a bitter class conflict—doctrines which have found wide acceptance throughout the National Labor Relations Board—has no part in the American scheme of national existence.

A great deal has been said at various times, in the press, on the radio, and even on the floor of the House, concerning the Board's review division. The professsed justification for the existence of this division is the necessity of preparing cases for presentation to the members of the Board who would otherwise find it extremely difficult to obtain an understanding of the facts in the many and varied cases presented to them. After this presentation, which occurs through the medium of an interview with the members of the Board, the Board reaches its decision and the review attorney is directed to draft it. When the decision is approved by the Board members, it is issued as the Board's own ruling and decision.

The outstanding fault in this system lies in the youth and inexperience of the attorneys employed for this purpose. I might say parenthetically that according to testimony in the record, attorneys have been recommended and, obviously, accepted because they possess "the right viewpoint," "a strong social consciousness," and "a liberal viewpoint—I should say turned left."

These review attorneys have been guilty of many indiscretions and downright misconduct. They have had material in their possession to assist them in the preparation of the cases which was expressly prohibited to them even by order of the Board. These attorneys often used off-the-record material in preparing their cases, which material was procured without any notice of any kind being given to the parties in the case. A review attorney disregarded the instructions of the Board as to the manner of drafting the Board's decision and drafted it according to her own view as to how the case should be decided.

Many more instances of misconduct could be cited, such as the juggling of challenged ballots in an election case, the failure to use the entire formal record of a case, and the expression of opinions as to the credibility and materiality of evidence presented in the record. As an example of the last, one review attorney, in the notes that he used in reporting to the Board, characterized certain testimony favorable to the employer and to an independent union as "nuts" and "baloney."

I believe I have said enough, in view of other material on the review division that has been presented from time to time, to show that this "appellate court" of the Board has not functioned in the best interests of justice and fair play. The danger, as it appears to me, of these and other examples of misconduct on the part of Board employees is not only the fact of their commission, which shows an attitude that should not be found in a governmental agency but also the fact that even when these examples came to the attention of the proper officials no attempt was made to correct the abuses disclosed, nor was any attempt made to reprimand the guilty parties. This indicates a callousness on the part of the Board to the fundamental principles of our judicial system which cannot be disregarded.

A special investigator of the Board, in concert with a regional director, actively participated in the organization of the workers in the steel industry by the C. I. O. Closed conferences and intimate discussions concerning union policy in this organization drive were reported directly to the Board.

This employee also acted as a conduit between the Board and John L. Lewis for the transmission of information relative to Board cases and C. I. O. policies. Nothing could be more clear than the fact that this man's activities cemented the bond between the Board and the C. I. O., the bond which has been one of the main causes of industrial unrest.

To close my discussion of the Board's subordinate personnel, I should like to point out certain outstanding examples of bias, inefficiency, and incompetency which the Board has either made no attempt to correct or which attempt was made so belatedly that it was rendered nugatory. As an example, the Board was notified by its then secretary as early as 1937 of the pro-C. I. O. union and antiemployer attitude of one of its field examiners. Instead of dismissing this examiner forthwith, the Board transferred him to another regional office and gave him a raise in pay. It was not until the newest Board member, Dr. Leiserson, demanded a thorough investigation of the scandalous conditions in the Los Angeles regional office that this employee was dismissed. His dismissal did not occur until September of 1939.

Another example of Board mismanagement of personnel is the employment as a trial examiner of a man who, to the knowledge of Board Members Madden and Smith, had written a book on the C. I. O. This man had stated in a letter to the Board that a position "either with you or the C. I. O. would be equally desirable." Later the contents of the book, which was violently anti-A. F. L. and pro-C. I. O., came to the attention of Chairman Madden, and the trial examiner was reluctantly dismissed. However, in the interim he had sat as a judicial officer in some half-dozen cases.

A third example is that of a man who was employed as a per diem trial examiner even though the then secretary of the Board knew that the man had been attempting to obtain a position with the C. I. O. "at any price." Material found in the Board's personnel file on this man discloses a series of communications between John L. Lewis, head of the C. I. O., and this man, in which the latter begged Lewis to employ him "in any capacity." This man was finally dismissed, but only when the Board changed its policy of employing per diem trial examiners.

One of the outstanding examples of Board mismanagement of its personnel is the case of the regional director of the Cincinnati office, Philip G. Phillips. This regional director had communicated with the chief trial examiner and with the secretary concerning the setting of "phony" hearing dates in order to harass employers. He had threatened an employer with dire consequences because the employer had failed to agree with him, saying, "I tell you, Greenfield, I'll get you." This same regional director boasted to the Board's secretary of his friendship with certain newspapermen in Cincinnati, and how these newspapermen had killed news stories derogatory to the Board.

As a climax to the career of this man, I would like to say a brief word about one case in which he meddled so viciously that the Board was later forced to set aside its own decision. In the case the regional director had instructed the trial examiner how to rule on certain evidence presented as to the communistic background of an employee allegedly discharged for union activities. These instructions were the result of conferences with the chief trial examiner and with the secretary, and were given to the trial examiner sub rosa. As a result of these activities, the Board set aside its own decision but did not in any way discipline this regional director, although he himself testified that he deserved at least a reprimand.

A final example of Board mismanagement is that of a field examiner of the Board who, in investigating a case, had told witnesses, "Of course, you know that I am working for the C. I. O., and the C. I. O. will benefit you by back pay"; and, when an employee refused to swear a plant shut-down was a lockout, he had said, "By God, you swear it, and I'll prove it."

These statements and activities on the part of this employee were brought directly to Board Chairman Madden's attention, but nothing was done to this man except to transfer him to another regional office and to delay promotion for approximately a year. Subsequent to this incident, this same field examiner appeared in a case where the employees had sought to withdraw their charges and attempted to persuade them not to do so, saying that the Board could order reinstatement with back pay if the complaint could be established against the company.

These examples to which I have referred are by no means isolated ones, but are sufficient to point out the failure of the Board to adopt a proper personnel policy and to reprimand and discharge those employees who flagrantly violated all the canons of proper conduct. As the Board is charged with the responsibility of supervising its employees, the more so where their misconduct has been actively brought to its attention, the failure of the Board to act in these cases is conclusive proof of its unfitness to continue in office.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the most casual scrutiny of the Board's activities reveals capricious and arbitrary abuse of power by an administrative agency entrusted with a grave public function—the adjustment of industrial strife—so inherently essential to the welfare, both social and economic, of the entire body politic. These conditions can no longer be tolerated—this Board must be removed, and a body of fair-minded, conscientious, judicious men appointed in their stead.

Explanation of Amendments to National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Labor I believe it to be my responsibility to clarify the amendments adopted by the House to the National Labor Relations Act. I shall attempt to do so and hope my analysis will prove that the chairman of the committee and the Members who voted against the Smith amendments have kept faith with the working men and women of America regardless of whether or not they are members of the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., or any other labor organization.

There are important reasons why the Smith amendments to the National Labor Relations Act should not become law. Those amendments are not conducive to industrial peace; they are a backward step in legislation dealing with labor relations; they are not desired by the workers of the Nation. The searching and unanswerable criticism of the amendments by the minority of the special committee of the House, composed of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY] and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], is sound. The Smith amendments were also considered and rejected by the Labor Committee of the House, of which I have the honor to be chairman. That committee held long hearings on various proposals for amending the Wagner Act. We heard and appraised criticisms of the act and its administration. While we found that one or two of the Smith amendments were no more than restatements of the law or existing practice of the Board, we found that others were seriously detrimental to the principles of the act and to its effective administration. An amendment which but states the existing law is the one requiring that the findings of fact of the Board must be supported by substantial evidence in order to obtain the approval of the reviewing courts. This is law now.

The provisions in the Smith amendments for employer petitions for elections cover the same subject as a Board regulation long since promulgated. As this regulation does not have the force of statutory law, the Labor Committee proposed an amendment covering employer petitions. There was also the problem of greater stabilization of contractual relations entered into between an employer and the certified representatives of his employees. While we found the actual practice of the Board to be not to disturb such relations for a year notwithstanding a claim of change of representatives, this was but a wise exercise of discretion on the part of the Board. My committee proposed an amendment to give this practice the force of law. There was also the admittedly troublesome problem of the appropriate bargaining unit, one which even Solomon in all his wisdom could not now solve to please all conflicting interests. The Labor Committee went so far, however, as to propose an amendment designed to insure the right of the members of craft unions to determine for themselves in all cases whether they desire the craft unit. This would relieve the Board of all discretion in the matter. The Labor Committee also proposed to enlarge the Board by increasing its membership from three to five, in order to bring to bear upon the problems connected with the administration and enforcement of the act two additional minds, while at the same time the Board would have the continuing benefit of the experience of the members who have with honor and ability engaged in the arduous labors of the past years.

The amendments of the Labor Committee would preserve the act. They were adopted by my committee with a sympathetic and studious approach to the requirements of intelligent labor legislation. We engaged in no vendetta against labor, labor's magna carta, or the Labor Board. The Smith amendments, however, still "as a whole strike in a destructive way at vital fundamental principles of the Labor Relations Act," as the president of the American Federation of Labor described them in the unabridged form in which they were originally introduced.

Unable to assail the good that has been done by the act, those who support the Smith amendments give no reasoned justification for them. They even say, for example, that the act is so framed that it is impossible to secure industrial peace, when industrial peace is here in greater measure than could have been expected in so short a time. They say we must provide for court review of Board orders, when Board orders are being reviewed every day by the courts. They are determined to strike a blow at this law and through it at the laboring man.

It is estimated that there are approximately 330,000 employers engaged in industries which would be subject to the National Labor Relations Act. But the statistics of the Board's operations show that in the fall of 1935, when the Board began to function, until the end of the last fiscal year, the Board has issued complaints against employers in only 1,150 of these cases. That is only three-tenths of 1 percent of the employers subject to the act. Only 667 of these cases had resulted in Board orders. The remainder of the thousands of cases closed by the Board were either settled, dismissed by the Board, or withdrawn. It is only a small group of employers, therefore, who have so acted as to necessitate formal orders of the Board. The Smith amendments, however, will deprive thousands of employees of all protection and critically weaken the safeguards afforded all other employees under the act. Let me demonstrate this statement.

One of the amendments redefines the term "agricultural labor" so as to exclude from the act workers engaged in the advance stages of processing and preparing for market agricultural commodities. The report of the majority of the Smith committee favoring this amendment frankly stated that it intended to reverse the Board's ruling in the North Whittier Heights Citrus Association case, which was approved by the courts for the simple reason that the company was not engaged in agriculture. It was engaged in industry. This company was a huge corporation, made up of some 200 citrus-fruit growers. There is no cogent reason why such workers should be denied the beneficent protection of the act. The circuit court of appeals stated in the decision referred to:

> In this status of this industry there would seem to be as much need for the remedial provisions of the Wagner Act, upon principle, as for any other industrial activity. (North Whittier Heights Citrus Association v. National Labor Relations Board, 109 F. (2d) 76.)

The men involved in this case were members of the A. F. of L. They came to the Board and the courts for protection under the law. They received it. It is to be taken from them now. Can the American Federation of Labor support this amendment? The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 6, 1940, contains an interview with its president, in which he said, in part:

> Of course, there are some of the Smith amendments which the Federation of Labor does not approve. One is a provision that exempts agricultural workers from the terms of the National Labor Relations Act. * * * He said the Smith amendment on that score is too broad as it now stands.

The second Smith amendment I wish to discuss also shows the same determination to restrict the benefits of the Wagner Act to as few workers as possible. It precludes reinstatement of employees found to have engaged in "willful violence" in connection with labor disputes. What is the true significance of this proposal? Mr. Smith says that all he means to do by this amendment is to incorporate the language of the Fansteel case, as decided by the Supreme Court. I have already pointed out he desires in the so-called agricultural amendment to repeal a decision in order to narrow the area of the protection of the act. Here, however, he desires to incorporate a court decision, but this, too, would narrow the benefits of the act far beyond the terms of the Court decision. I support the view expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY] and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK]. They point out in their minority report on the special committee investigation that this amendment goes far beyond the Fansteel decision as that decision has been construed by the courts themselves. This amendment would visit economic death upon every worker who during a strike engaged in any "willful violence," no matter how trivial, regardless of the circumstances, and notwithstanding he was unlawfully discharged. The employer would suffer no comparable penalty for his own lawlessness. The courts have already repudiated such injustices. (Republic Steel Corporation v. Board, 107 F. (2d) 472, certiorari denied April 8, 1940; Board v. Stackpole Carbon Co., 105 F. (2d) 167, certiorari denied 308 U. S. 605). We should follow the courts in this respect and leave the question of reinstatement of employees to the exercise of a sound judgment based on the facts of each case.

I turn to the so-called free-speech amendment, which adds to the existing prohibition against interference, restraint, and coercion the following nullifying language:

> Nothing in this section or this act shall be construed or interpreted to prohibit any expressions of opinion with respect to any matter which may be of interest to employees or the general public, provided that such expressions of opinion are not accompanied by acts of coercion, intimidation, discrimination, or threats thereof.

The proponents of this amendment state that all they mean to do is to make the act consistent with the constitutional guarantee of free speech. If that were all they would not so strongly advocate it, because they know the Constitution is the supreme law of the land and cannot be overturned by Congress or the Board. There should also be some evidence that the Board has interfered with the right of free speech. There is none, notwithstanding Board orders have been reviewed by the courts more than a hundred times. The purpose and the necessary effect of this amendment is to encourage employers to interfere with the worker's exercise of the rights protected by the act. Coercion may exist though unaccompanied by "acts." The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals stated the following concerning "expressions of opinion" by employers:

> Surely, he (the employer) has the right to his views. And yet, the voice of authority may, by tone inflection, as well as by the substance of the words uttered, provoke fear and awe quite as readily as it may bespeak fatherly advice (National Labor Relations Board v. Falk Corporation, 102 F. (2d) 383).

Since the employer is protected by the Constitution itself in his right to freedom of speech it is obvious this amendment also is sought merely to restrict the freedom of employees now guaranteed by the act. It is contrary to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act and every previous statement of Federal policy on this subject. It would again open the door to company-dominated unions.

The Smith amendments further curtail the rights of labor by a 6 months' statute of limitations upon the filing of charges. In a recent case before the Board the intermediate report of the trial examiner shows that the officials of the company in 1937 engaged a "strong-arm squad" to slug, blackjack, tar and feather, and otherwise manhandle all union sympathizers who appeared on the scene. The connection of the company with these deeds was not brought to light until 1939, when certain of the hired thugs, disgruntled by their discharge by the company, told the full story of their activities. The Board has rendered a public service in bringing the facts to light. Under the Smith amendment the Board would have been powerless to expose these vicious labor practices. One of the leading victims of the strong-arm squad was an A. F. of L. organizer. This is but one illustration of the problem involved. There is no respectable precedent for a statute of limitations which kills important rights within 6 months. Other property rights are not extinguished in so short a time. No reason can be advanced for setting up a special rigid rule of this sort for labor.

Another proposal would restrict most unreasonably the benefits of the act by prohibiting back pay for a period longer than 1 year. The proponents of this amendment say it is to spur on the Board to greater speed in disposing of its cases. No one has as yet accused the Board of failing to work diligently in bringing its work up to date. It is succeeding in doing so. But after Board decision an employer can consume months and years in dilatory tactics in the courts. He is now discouraged from deterring the progress of a case any more than is necessary to a fair determination of the issues. If this amendment goes through, there will be no incentive to avoid stalling. There will be every incentive to take all cases into court and subject them to every known delaying device. Even if the courts finally decide that the worker was unlawfully discharged, he, the victim, will be compelled to bear the burden of his losses. This burden, in all reason and justice, must be borne by the one who causes it. Here again we see a definite blow at the workers. I predict great resentment among the rank and file of American labor if this unfair and unjust amendment becomes law.

Another amendment deals with the appropriate bargaining unit. Briefly, it provides that whenever it is proposed to include any craft in a larger bargaining unit, or any plant in a unit of several plants, or employees of one employer in a bargaining unit of several employers, an election must be held among the smaller group, which may only be included in the larger unit if a majority vote is to be included. This amendment is somewhat similar to the amendment proposed by the Labor Committee, which provided that whenever a majority of a craft group desired to be a separate bargaining unit it should have that privilege. There is one very important difference between these two proposals, however. Under the amendment as passed by the House, a separate election must be held, regardless of whether there is any showing of sentiment among the men in the smaller group favoring such a separate election. In other words, even though all the employees in a plant were perfectly satisfied to have an industrial unit, and even though there was no craft organization seeking to organize the craft employees in the plant, the Board would be required to hold separate elections among the crafts before the larger unit could be certified. It seems to me that this would be a serious waste of time in that sort of case. In addition, this amendment would require that the Board, without any craft representative claiming a specified group of employees, decide in the abstract the exact number of "crafts" in the plant and the precise boundaries of each craft. This is a problem that has vexed labor experts, and, indeed, the A. F. of L. itself, for years. It is placing an impossible burden on the Board to require it to answer these tremendously difficult jurisdictional questions in cases where the craft unions themselves are not interested in asserting their claims.

The amendments which I have discussed thus far all affect substantial rights. Except for the unit amendment, each of the amendments is demonstrably of a repressive and restrictive character. We find the same spirit and the same effect running through another series of the Smith amendments, those relating to procedural matters. These include a proposal that the courts, on reviewing Board findings of fact, may set them aside not only if unsupported by substantial evidence—the correct and traditional criterion—but also if clearly erroneous. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], an able lawyer, advocated this language but he admitted, "I do not know whether anyone is absolutely sure just what 'clearly erroneous' means." Little more need be said by me. Nevertheless, I call attention to the fact that this language has been taken out of the Walter-Logan bill by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. These new friends of labor in the House, however, insist upon restricting and confusing the fair terms of the present statute governing court review. They insist upon encouraging litigation over words of uncertain meaning; they insist upon gambling upon the result without knowing what they themselves mean by the amendment. They also propose that the proceedings of the Board be conducted "so far as practicable in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the district courts of the United States." Though a laywoman and not a lawyer, I must say that if Congress desires to impose upon this agency technical rules of evidence, a step which I am advised is contrary to the whole modern trend even among the courts, and is inconsistent with the requirements of our laws and the decisions of the courts governing all other quasi-judicial agencies, then Congress should do so, and not leave the matter confused by the vague criterion, "so far as practicable." How this phrase is to be interpreted is another gamble. Here indeed would be a fertile field for lawyers, for conflicting court decisions, for delays and uncertainties, while the decisions of the Board and the rights and obligations involved therein awaited the result of the unending controversies over the question in each case whether the rules of evidence had been followed "so far as practicable." We must not do this thing. We have no reason to invite these troubles. There is no evil to remedy by going to evils we know not of. The Supreme Court has clearly held that the words of the act as now phrased:

> Free administrative boards from the compulsion of technical rules so that the mere admission of matter which would be deemed incompetent in judicial proceedings would not invalidate the administrative order. * * * But this assurance of a desirable flexibility in administrative procedure does not go so far as to justify orders without a basis in evidence having ration probative force (Consolidated Edison Co. et al. v. Board, et al., 305 U. S. 197).

This is clearly a sufficient answer to this proposal. We must not write into law another field day for lawyers at the expense of labor and the public policy of the act. I question the wisdom also of throwing all Board decisions in representation cases, which involve no order against anyone, open to judicial review, permitting parties to these election cases to tie them up and thus delay interminably the collective-bargaining process. We deliberately rejected this proposal when the act was passed in 1935 because of the unfortunate experience encountered in the administration of Joint Resolution 44 by the predecessor Board. Is it wise, is it in the interest of labor, to rush into those evils now?

I add here also my protest against the punitive expedition against the Economics Division of the Board contained in the amendment which would prohibit the Board from employing individuals for statistical work. If the Board has found need for statistical or research work I know of no reason why Congress should refuse to permit that need to be supplied, unless it be for the reason which animates the Smith amendments as a whole, namely, to restrict and hamper the Board in every way possible short of frank repeal.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to the amendments which would divide the functions of the Board between an administrator and the Board, and by thus dividing and confusing destroy completely the administrative process as it has been heretofore developed by the Congress and approved by the courts with respect to a host of statutes. On the one hand, charged with sole responsibility for initiation of proceedings in unfair-practice cases would be a political appointee without a fixed term. This is a run-around for labor. On the other hand, there would be the Board with the power in such cases solely of deciding the case, but with its decisions still ineffective without court review and approval, although its staff had no part in its initiation or prosecution. Add to this that the Board would continue to handle representation or election cases. Our friends apparently require one Nation-wide organization, under the Board, in representation cases, and another such organization, under the administrator, for the initiation and prosecution of complaint cases. There is no logic or reason in this confusion and duplication. My strongest objection, however, is to the whole break-down of the structure of the Board, without precedent in our legislation governing the other great agencies. Notwithstanding a few instances of alleged improprieties recited by the Smith committee, a careful reading of the minority report of that committee will convince you, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is wholly unjustified. Mr. Green told the Smith committee January 25, 1940, when asked whether the A. F. of L. advocated a separation of functions of this sort,

> We have no recommendations along that line * * * because we think that will mean further delay and perhaps encourage more confusion.

Mr. Padway, counsel of the A. F. of L., before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, May 2, 1939, said,

> We do not subscribe to a plan, measure, or principle separating the judicial from the administrative functions of the Board.

It is in the interest of labor, and in the end it is in the interest of all, that the development and enforcement of the law of collective bargaining be continued with one agency responsible therefor, together with the courts' review of its decisions as now required. Congress must not destroy the great progress made by the Board and the courts in the development of the law of collective bargaining within the terms of the present statute by adding now new sources of confusion, delays, and uncertainties inherent in a division of responsibilities and counsels. The division of responsibility now existing between the Board and the courts is the exactly proper and traditional division. If it suffices for the safeguarding of other public and private rights, it should not be further subdivided with respect to the rights of labor.

Finally, there is the amendment to abolish the present Board. When we analyze all these amendments, as I have tried very briefly to do, it becomes very clear that the unseemly drive to abolish the Board falls into its place as but another part of the whole plan to undermine the act and the principles for which it stands. I cannot, in the brief space left to me, review the great accomplishments of the past 5 years—the successful defense of the act in all its parts against all legal attacks, the establishment of a new organization in a new field, the handling and disposition of many thousands of cases, mostly without even the initiation of formal adversary proceeding, the very superior record of the Board in the courts where the work has been more closely and impartially reviewed than by any other persons or groups, the fair and honest conduct of thousands of elections involving more than a million votes, the righting and remedying of injustices to employees in hundreds of cases involving thousands of employees, the amicable adjustment of thousands of cases, the great strides made in union membership and in stabilizing labor relations through collective trade agreements, the great reduction in industrial strife, both in numbers of strikes and their duration, the elimination of fear and the concurrent growth in freedom of self-organization. The task that was to be done was heavy. The obstacles were numerous and trying. All this must be conceded. The record of the Board cannot be challenged. It cannot be challenged by generalized criticisms emanating from a divided labor leadership contesting for advantage; nor by organized employer opposition that is but a continuation of the original opposition to the act itself; nor by occasional human errors among a developing staff working at times in an atmosphere of severe opposition and in a field heretofore too highly charged with emotion. This Board should not be abolished. As Dean Garrison told the Smith committee, the Board deserves public gratitude.

The important thing overlooked in criticism of the Board is the fact that it was writing labor law to set precedents. It was necessary therefore, to conform to strict interpretation of the act.

As I have said before, in presenting the committee bill to the House, there undoubtedly were mistakes of judgment on the part of overzealous investigators but those mistakes are usual in administering a new act. As I have also said many times, rather than adopt amendments which would destroy the act, there should be no amendments unless they are of a constructive nature. That was my reason for opposing the rule that was adopted substituting the Smith bill, which makes drastic changes in the fundamental principles of the act, for the bill reported by the Labor Committee. I believe that if the amendments proposed by the Committee on Labor had been adopted, all the criticism against the act would have been eliminated.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that in its wisdom the Senate Committee on Labor will carefully examine the provisions of the Smith bill, and that as a result of such examination the bill may be sent to conference, after due consideration by the Senate, where the friends of labor may amend the act if and where it is necessary.

Conservation—National Parks and National Forests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert the article entitled "How Much Conservation?" by Richard L. Neuberger, which is being published in the Saturday Evening Post in its issue of June 15, 1940.

The article is as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, June 15, 1940]

The American conservation movement is breached today by the angriest hostilities since the row between Gifford Pinchot and Secretary Richard A. Ballinger nearly tore apart the Department of the Interior 30 years ago. How far ought conservation to be carried? At what point does conservation stop and the arbitrary bottling up of land and resources begin?

A gray-bearded pioneer, John Heulsdonk, symbolized the dilemma as he faced Gov. Clarence D. Martin across a desk on the first day of this spring in the Washington State Capitol at Olympia, and demanded that the militia be called out to prevent the Federal Government from sweeping his backwoods farm into the new Olympic National Park. The frontier had to be guarded against waste and exploitation, John agreed, but what would happen to the people who depended upon the frontier for a living?

Scattered throughout the far West are eight or nine upland and mountain fastnesses as vast as whole New England States. These are our final wilderness strongholds. Should they be barricaded behind national-park boundaries and thus forever protected from the ax, the plow, the miner's drill, and the jackhammers and dynamite of the dam builders?

This question, at first glance so free of controversy, has precipitated wrathful demonstrations in the countryside and caustic words at Cabinet meetings. Conservationists themselves are sharply divided. Some ask a corollary question: What will become of the John Heulsdonks—the men who cultivate stump ranches, graze cattle, fell America's trees, and dig in the hills for gold and silver and copper and manganese? The problem has been debated with vehemence by both Houses of Congress. It has plunged the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture into total war on each other. Over it old friendships have been sundered and strange alliances improvised. And it has stirred thousands of people and is an issue in this year's elections in the four largest Pacific-slope States—California, Washington, Oregon, and Idaho.

Conservation has always been a vital reason for the establishment of national parks. Yet a greater factor has been the desire to set aside unique natural wonders. In this class have been the Yellowstone, the Sequoia trees, Crater Lake, Yosemite, the Grand Canyon, and many other marvels. Now the emphasis has shifted. Alarmed lumber and livestock communities maintain that parks are being promoted in their localities not so much because of rare or breathtaking landscapes, as to take rich accumulations of natural resources out of production. A lot of the park promoters admit the charge and defend it vigorously.

NATIONAL-PARK BATTLEFIELDS

As far as new national parks are concerned, conservation has developed into an end in itself rather than a means to protect scenic phenomena. Citizens in the timbered Pacific Northwest, for example, gloomily predict this fencing off of raw materials may extend to every forest vista in the region. What then, they ask, will keep the sawmills going?

Here is Secretary of the Interior Ickes telling a congressional committee why 898,000 acres of woodland along the western shore of Puget Sound should be stockaded back of the borders of the Olympic National Park: "If the exploiters are permitted to have their way with this Olympic Peninsula area, all that will be left will be the outraged squeal of future generations over the loss of another natural treasure." Listen as Willard G. Van Name, of the American Museum of Natural History, describes what will happen unless the recommendations of Mr. Ickes are accepted: "In this timber, if there is a stream through it, it may be made a reservoir. Everything can be changed and its natural beauty destroyed, and that is a fact that should be evident to almost anybody who travels around the country. These wonderful forests must be preserved."

But the Washington State Planning Council, itself composed of conservationists, sees dangerous consequences to the State in any preservation which "would lock up forever some 17,000,000,000 board-feet of standing timber, with all of its huge potentialities to labor, to support existing communities, and to furnish forest products demanded by the Nation." These forebodings have been reduced to statistics by Peter E. Terzick, a spokesman for the Oregon-Washington Council of Lumber and Sawmill Workers: "There are at the present time 11,629 woodworkers depending upon timber from the Olympic Peninsula for their livelihood. They operate 49 sawmills, 43 shingle mills, 6 pulp mills, 4 plywood plants, 14 woodworking plants, and 95 logging camps. To lock up nearly a million acres of virgin timber on the peninsula would mean replacing the axes and saws which are the badge of these men with W. P. A. shovels within the next few years."

And so the issue is squarely joined. Should the American wilderness be sequestered in national parks or should it be open to development—and to possible looting? At stake are sprawling hinterlands totaling in size considerably more than the area of England. The intensity of the dispute matches the dimensions of the prize. When, several months ago, President Roosevelt signed the act creating the John Muir-Kings Canyon National Park in the high Sierras, he did so at the request of 152 organizations and many leading newspapers in California, and over the objection of 109 organizations and both branches of the California Legislature.

It was never in doubt that the Kings Canyon controversy centered exclusively on the raw materials in the region. "There are still some," maintained Congressman BERTRAND W. GEARHART as he introduced the bill for the park, "who say we should not lock up these mountain resources, that we should reserve them for commercial exploitation. I say the thought is abhorrent." The Legislature of California answered him with the protest that the park encompassed natural resources of soil, water, forests, minerals, forage, game animals, birds, and fish vital to the permanence and future growth and prosperity of the basic industries of the State.

All over the West this wrangle cuts across customary political and economic lines. The usual guideposts are of no value. GEARHART is a Republican and so are his adversaries in the California Legislature. Secretary Ickes, generalissimo of the third-term forces, stumped the State for the Kings Canyon Park and was zealously supported by the Los Angeles Times, the San Francisco Examiner, and other papers which claim one term was too many. The Santa Barbara County Chamber of Commerce lined up for the park and the Madera County Chamber of Commerce against it, the Central Grange for and the Poplar Grange against, the Lions Club of Riverdale for and the Lions Club of Lone Pine against, the Northwest Conservation League for and the Los Angeles Conservation Association against, the Native Daughters of the Golden West for and the Daughters of the American Revolution against.

As a general rule, enthusiasm for corralling frontier domain in new national parks is directly proportionate to the distance from the area involved. Thus, although the Portland Central Labor Council approved a park on the Olympic Peninsula, the Central Labor Council of Grays Harbor, at the edge of the peninsula's forests, looked on the proposition with dismay. Garden clubs in Seattle want a national park at Hells Canyon, where the Snake River has trenched more than a mile into the mountains separating Oregon and Idaho, but the men who graze sheep and cattle above the chasm are yelping a loud "No!"

The late Robert Marshall, of the American Wilderness Society, who was a 50-mile-a-day man in the woods, once summarized the attitude of the people who view this situation from a detached perspective. He conceded that fortifying 17,000,000,000 board feet of timber in the Olympic Park might knock 5,000 lumber workers out of their jobs. This he deplored, but wondered if it was vastly important compared to the total number of unemployed in the Nation. "The invention of one new machine," he insisted, "frequently does far more than this in bringing about unemployment." And he pointed out that the great trees on the Olympic Peninsula belong to the whole United States and not just the dwellers in that locality. Cut down by the logger's ax, their grandeur would be gone forever. They would merely be planks and kindling wood.

"The real issue," said Marshall, emphasizing an issue which exists in every Western State where some of the wilderness still survives, "seems to be whether the local objection to locking up commercial values outweighs the national gain of preserving this magnificent forest purely for its beauty."

Local objection on the Olympic Peninsula has been both vociferous and aggressive. John Heulsdonk went to the State capital carrying a sign which said, "Stalin took Finland. Hitler took Poland. Don't let Ickes take our homes away from us." John had lived in his home a long time—long enough to be the hero of the peninsula's most famous story.

When the Pacific Northwest was a new land, John had trudged up one of the narrow trails of the Hoh River Gorge. On his back was strapped a squat, unwieldly kitchen range. A trapper he met on the path looked at him and marveled.

"Say, stranger," he inquired, "ain't that stove kinda heavy to carry on your shoulders?"

"Oh, the stove ain't so bad," replied John. "Trouble is, the sack of flour I got inside the oven keeps shiftin' around."

After that John was known the length of the Olympics as "The Iron Man of the Hoh." He carved a ranch out of the wilderness, felling fir and hemlock giants that had been standing before Columbus sailed from Palos, and planting vegetables in the clearing. Friends of John settled around him and niched farms in the forest battlement too. W. B. Adams brought tobacco seedlings from his native Kentucky and made them grow. George Anderson and his brother Ted put fence posts around a chunk of meadowy bottom lands.

Now, with other ranchers from the Olympic fastnesses, they stood in the office of the Governor of Washington and asked for State troops to protect their farms. Otherwise the National Park Service would use the power of eminent domain to buy the farms at condemnation prices and send John Heulsdonk and his neighbors, like the Israelites of old, on a mass exodus in search of new homes somewhere else. An indignant school teacher on the peninsula compared their plight to that of Evangeline's people. The emergency was due to a decision by President Roosevelt to add 187,000 acres to a park already as large as Rhode Island. The homesteads of the settlers along the Hoh and Queets Rivers were included in the boundaries which had been marked out in the big, oval office at the White House, 3,000 miles away.

The Iron Man of the Hoh left the capitol building without getting the National Guard rescue detachment he had demanded. Governor Martin had also opposed the increase in the park, but he told the aged pioneer the State could do nothing about it and that, besides, "there has never been anyone more interested or more in love with the West than the President." The people of the West are now considering whether they want the President to demonstrate that affection with an assortment of enormous new national parks.

The 898,000 acres withdrawn amidst so much discord from development on the Olympic Peninsula constitute what has come to be known as a protection park. The term is now familiar along the Pacific seaboard. It refers to a park established principally to lock up an area's resources. Benjamin H. Kizer, the chairman of the Washington State Planning Council, is afraid this policy, applied to the Olympics, has created a "timber museum that will squeeze the counties of the peninsula, which have a rather precarious living at best."

RAINY-DAY RECREATION

National parks are intended primarily as recreational centers, and Kizer wonders how much recreation can take place in the heaviest rainfall in the United States, rainfall which averages 120 inches a year.

"You are lucky," he insists, pointing on the map to the long western slope of the Olympic Park, "if one time in four you can go through there without going through a terrible deluge of rain."

The year before the Olympic Park was set up only 5,880 people visited this area.

But the park in the Olympics is a fait accompli. It would require an act of Congress to constrict its boundaries. The great "rain forests" will never ride logging trains to the sawmills. John Heulsdonk and his neighbors will have to move on; condemnation suits for their land are about to be started. The question now asked in the far West is, "Where next?" Mount Olympus, the hub of the Olympic Park, is 7,954 feet in height. California, Washington, Oregon, and Idaho are studded with peaks higher and more majestic. Why not surround them with parks, too? How can the process be logically stopped as long as there is scenery outside the parks more spectacular than that within?

"If we don't watch out," the editor of a country paper in Washington has warned, "this whole State, except the city limits of Seattle, Tacoma, and Spokane, is going to be one big national park."

THE GRANDDADDY OF ALL PARKS

As if to embellish this prophecy, the grandfather of all national parks is now proposed along the Washington backbone of the Cascade Range. It would be 225 miles long and 4,760 square miles in area. These figures are respectively equal to the distance from New York to Boston and the area of the State of Connecticut. The park, occasionally alluded to as "the Polish Corridor," would practically cut Washington in half, leaving open only a narrow strip on the Columbia River. It would be almost five times as vast, for example, as the Grand Canyon of the Colorado National Park, and every highway and railroad line crossing the mountain passes which lead from the inland empire to the cities of Puget Sound would have to span its borders. It would take in Mount Baker, Mount St. Helens, Mount Adams, and the other volcanic cones of the range. Mount Rainier National Park would be assimilated by this stupendous new one.

The State planning council recently held public hearings in half a dozen Washington towns to sound out sentiment on the idea. Of 300 people who presented testimony, 2 favored the park. The council has accordingly recommended against the proposal, but is not especially sanguine about the effect of its recommendation. It recommended a 452,000-acre park in the Olympics and got a park just about twice that large. Its viewpoint was presented to the White House by Benjamin Kizer and George F. Yantis, who are not only conservationists but also new dealers, yet even this strategy failed.

No State from the Rocky Mountains westward is free of the national-park problem. It confronts all of them in one form or another, and always the fundamental issue is the penning up of raw materials. This applies to parks long established as well as those not yet authorized. Farmers in Idaho are now demanding that the headwaters of the Snake River, in the oldest park of all, Yellowstone, be diverted for irrigation. This would violate traditional national-park policy, but the farmers contend their land is drying up. They have been answered with the query that once park rules are breached for irrigation, why not for lumber and grazing and hydroelectric power?

The Idaho ranchers will not get water sluiced off the rivers and lakes in Yellowstone Park, but their plight has scared people in other parts of the West. Representative HORTON, of Wyoming, says he intends to sponsor a bill forbidding the Federal Government to create a new national park in a State except with the consent of that State's legislature. Gov. Charles A. Sprague, of Oregon, believes "the further encroachment of the Park Service" would take out of taxation and development land resources which are essential to Oregon's economic stability. And Senator WORTH CLARK, of Idaho, says it would be fine to have a national park preserve the grandeur of Hells Canyon, the deepest abyss in North America, but not if it means shutting off a long stretch of the Snake River from storage for irrigating Idaho farms.

A fourth of all the revenue taken in by national forests from the sale or leasing of timber and other resources is returned to the counties in which the forests are located. Last year Grant County in Oregon, for example, received $49,500 from this source. Representative J. W. ROBINSON, of Utah, has just introduced legislation requiring that the Park Service, too, return 25 percent of its income to the States involved. However, tourists spend money, and Frank A. Kittredge, director of the national parks in the far West, has pointed out many times that the recreational use of land "has a financial value to those living in the region."

Underlying all this is a bitter struggle between two Government departments. The struggle is epitomized by a pending suggestion to turn the snowfields and green ridges of the Mount Hood National Forest, in Oregon, into the Mount Hood National Park. National forests are in the Department of Agriculture, national parks are in the Department of the Interior. The Forest Service controls more than 100,000 square miles of wilderness in the West, and the Park Service thinks it is better qualified to administer a lot of it. Wars have been fought over less land than this, and the two Departments are locked in combat right now.

Virtually all the new national parks are areas which have been wrested from Forest Service sovereignty. The Olympic and Kings Canyon Parks were once mainly national forests. Mount Baker, Mount Adams, Hells Canyon, and the Oregon ridge of the Cascades are national forests at present. Secretary of the Interior Ickes has accused forest rangers and supervisors of being a backwoods lobby that "foments local antagonism" whenever an extension of the Park Service is under consideration. Not long ago in Seattle, he said the enlarged park on the Olympic Peninsula had been resisted by men "in the Government service whose lives are supposed to be dedicated to the principle of the highest possible use of our forests."

To the Forest Service, Ickes attributes much of the regional hostility to new parks. "Ask any Congressman, regardless of party, which is the most powerful lobby, and his instant response will be, 'the forest lobby.'

"It is a pity that any branch of the Federal Government, for any reason, should oppose the acquisition by another of an area that cries aloud, for any disinterested ear to hear, for dedication as a national park in order that its beauties and its wonders may be preserved for all time, as only they can be preserved without risk of future exploitation."

The rumpus reaches high in both Departments. The House Committee on the Public Lands, studying the bill for the Kings Canyon Park, had before it an adverse estimate of the proposal by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace. "It is difficult to see," he wrote, "how a change from national-forest to national-park status would be productive of public benefits commensurate with the increased costs of administration or economic losses due to restrictions upon the use of water and other natural resources."

National forests, so expansive the West measures them by horizons rather than acres, are operated under a policy known as "multiple use." By this the Forest Service means that trees can be used for lumber, meadows for grazing, rivers for reclamation and power, and at the same time the wilderness is open to recreation. The Agriculture Department points with satisfaction to the San Bernardino National Forest in California, where, in 1938, a million people camped and picnicked while the forest was also used for mining, livestock, and water storage. The Forest Service refuses to concede that commercial use precludes preservation.

But, in the lexicon of the Interior Department, multiple use is defined as "multiple use up." The Park Service maintains that the activities which the Forest Service permits on the frontier "are all in the nature of private and individual privilege, as opposed to the general or public use." A tree cannot be used by a sawmill and still remain a tree. An upland wilderness grazed bare or a mountain river plugged by a dam is changed for generations to come, if not forever. Commercial use and preservation, in the opinion of the Department of the Interior, are mutually exclusive terms.

"The ultimate purpose of the National Forest Service," says Ickes, subtly jabbing at Mr. Wallace's Department, "is to grow and develop trees so that they may be available for use in the lumber industry of the country. But the objective of the National Park Service is to take out of any possible commercial use these outstanding areas and keep them and appropriate them to the enjoyment of the people."

Can policies so apparently opposite ever be reconciled? Ickes would like to find out by having the Forest Service moved to the Department of the Interior, where many of its functions might be consolidated with those of the National Park Bureau. This scheme has lurked in the background of the entire Government reorganization wrangle. A year ago the President hinted such a shift might take place—at least, with respect to timbered wilderness particularly adaptable to "recreation and permanent public use and conservation."

Immediately a terrific outcry went up from western Members of Congress who visioned huge sections of their States subject to national-park regulations. Forty percent of Idaho is mantled by national forests, and Senator CLARK of Idaho shuddered to think of the consequences if this area, as large as the whole State of Indiana, was summarily jerked out of commercial and economic use. Ickes said no such thing would happen, but Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon, the Republican minority leader, has threatened fierce resistance should Mr. Roosevelt carry out his implied promise to transfer the Forest Service. National forests cover 22,000 square miles of Oregon.

"All but an insignificant minority of conservationists oppose taking the national forests out of their present location," Gifford Pinchot, the first Chief Forester, recently wrote his friend, Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS. "The Interior Department has no claim whatever upon the national forests. Ambition for power is no good reason for upsetting a lay-out that works superbly where it is. The people of the 11 Western States which include most of the national forests are overwhelmingly in favor of letting the Forest Service be."

In the face of this opposition, the President has hesitated, although he may yet transfer some or all of the forests to Ickes' jurisdiction. Each time a reorganization message from the White House is in the offing, partisans of the Park and Forest Services get ready for a show-down.

A trudge into the backwoods is sufficient to show that the wilderness folks themselves are partisans of the Forest Service. They want it to continue to administer the hinterlands. This may be partially attributable to what Ickes calls "the forest lobby," but there is something more.

The Forest Service is one of the most decentralized agencies of the Federal Government. Many of its verdicts and policies stem from the grass roots rather than from a desk in Washington.

A ranger deep in the fastnesses can consummate a small timber sale on his own hook. When Mack Chetwood, cattle rancher at Halfway, Oreg., cowhide coat on his back, carbine at his saddle, needs additional range for his herd, the problem can be worked out by him and Bob Harper, the district forest ranger, without recourse to further authority.

Forest rangers participate in community life. They attend Grange meetings and stockmen's roast-beef dinners. They can shoe a farmer's horse and bandage a hiker's lacerated knee. In a lumber town in Idaho or a grazing hamlet in California, the ranger station is as much a part of the settlement as the general store.

The Park Service, on the other hand—like most Department of the Interior bureaus, efficient though they are—is highly centralized. Its men in the field are considerably more remote from the people. There is little local latitude in reaching decisions. A vote in almost any far western mountain valley or upland plateau would result in a preference for the Forest Service. Ranchers, loggers, lumbermen, and hunters sigh in relief, now that immediate threat of a transfer to the Interior Department has passed.

But still the question of what to do with the western wilderness is not settled, nor is it likely to be by any juggling of Federal bureaus. Essentially it is a problem in economics. Can the States on the Pacific slope maintain their present living standards if large sections of land are withdrawn from commercial development? Is a national-park defense cordon around expansive chunks of wilderness a menace, either now or in the future, to the jobs and incomes of the people who dwell nearby?

Complete studies are lacking, so the problem is largely analyzed in conjecturals. It also is confused by the fact that both parties to the argument use the same set of statistics.

Only about half the timber which originally stood in Oregon and Washington, the chief lumber-producing States, is still there. The ax, fire, and termites have done for the rest. This is serious. The two States are dependent on the lumber industry for 83 percent of the tonnage of their exports. Already ghost towns have appeared as the trees have disappeared. To retire great forest strongholds from production, says the antipark group, would disrupt the basic economy of the region. As it is, none too many groves are left.

"If you are going to go ahead and make a park practically out of the whole country, what will we have to live on?" Congressman MARTIN F. SMITH sarcastically inquired of his fellow new dealers as they enacted the Olympic Park bill. SMITH'S district includes the Grays Harbor sawmills and wood-pulp plants.

"Ha-ha!" exclaim the park promoters, waving the same sheaf of figures. "Half the timber is gone. The Forest Service has not succeeded in preserving it. Unless the Park Service locks it up, not a tree will remain. The forests of the West belong to the whole Nation. The owners reside in every State. To let two States chop down those forests would be to permit a minority of the stockholders to dispose of all the assets of the corporation."

LOCKING THE LARDER

Somewhere between these extremes the truth probably lurks. The Pacific Northwest, which contains the bulk of the frontier areas, imports 80 percent of its manufactured goods. It pays for this merchandise with raw materials—lumber, minerals, beef, wheat, apples, wool, and salmon. What will happen to the Northwest's balance of trade if forests and grazing lands are locked up, mineral deposits are sealed, and dams and commercial fishing are forbidden on mountain torrents that might irrigate orchards and spawn 40-pound Chinooks? This is the primary reason that agitation for new national parks in America comes almost exclusively from outside the localities involved. It also is why a number of United States Senators have announced they will not vote to lock up any more land areas in the West without the acquiescence of the commissioners or supervisors in whose counties the land is located.

Yet, on the other side of the dispute, park zealots point out that scenic values endure forever, while resources dumped into a truck or gondola car and shipped East provide only a fleeting gain. A forest cut down has little to offer the people of the next generation. Stumps are no attraction. A forest protected and preserved will draw tourists and campers indefinitely, and they will be buying gasoline and groceries in the neighboring communities long after the money paid for the lumber would be spent.

Perhaps a compromise can be worked out. Some conservationists want the wilderness locked up in parks large enough to guard the scenery, yet not so far-flung that they choke off logging camps and starve herds of sheep and cattle. This is the real argument for placing the Park and Forest Services under one authority, whether it be Agriculture or Interior or some other Government Department altogether. The rivalry between the two Departments, a rivalry more virulent in the field than it is at Washington, now makes compromise extremely difficult.

SCENERY VERSUS RESOURCES

Many westerners have reached the conclusion that the Department of the Interior proposes "protection parks" mainly to whittle away the domain of the Forest Service, and that the Agricultural Department resists bona fide scenic parks largely to harass the advance of the Park Service. Feelings in both Bureaus run high. Insults are exchanged constantly. When Agriculture must relinquish a frontier fastness to Interior, the change of jurisdiction occurs in the same emotional atmosphere as the surrender of a conquered garrison.

How much conservation and how much commercial use? Sooner or later there must be a solution—a solution which will permit neither the gutting of the hinterlands nor the economic destruction of hinterland towns. And in some of the hinterlands men and women are looking for such a solution.

Here is Wallowa County, in Oregon, its 7,814 inhabitants scattered over a wide expanse of valleys, tablelands, and mountain ranges. One side of the county forms the western rampart of Hells Canyon. This is a stirring spectacle. For 40 twisting miles the canyon averages 5,510 feet in depth. At one point it is 7,900 feet from rim to rapids. Dark walls frown down on the Snake River in grim and gloomy magnificence. More than a century ago Capt. Benjamin Bonneville, who trudged through the West in advance of the wagon trains, stood with his buckskin-clad followers on the heights above Hells Canyon and in his journal wrote:

"The grandeur and originality of the views presented on every side beggar both the pencil and the pen. Nothing we had ever gazed upon in any other region could for a moment compare in wild majesty and impressive sternness with the series of scenes which here at every turn astonished our senses and filled us with awe."

American scenery that is no match for Hells Canyon has been set aside in national parks. The people of Wallowa County would like to have their canyon set aside, too, but—and this they emphasize—their existence is completely dependent on the land resources of the county. One third of the county is range land, and it nourishes 125,000 sheep and 50,000 cattle. Every store in Enterprise, the county seat, might have to close if livestock were no longer shipped down the bumpy branch line to the Union Pacific division point at La Grande.

Wallowa County has no industries. Livestock, lumber, and a little wheat and fruit farming, more than half of it under irrigation, keep the people off relief. The Forest Service pays the county treasury an average of $10,636 a year as its share of grazing and timber fees. This money goes directly toward schools and roads.

What would happen if a Hells Canyon National Park was established? As long as it encompassed only the canyon proper people in Wallowa County think it would be fine. But they remember how the park on the Olympic Peninsula has been expanded nearly three times beyond original local recommendations. They claim that local advice was given scant consideration in the outlining of the park borders at Kings Canyon and ask what assurance they have that Hells Canyon would be dealt with differently. Park boundaries extending into the high pastures might wipe out the whole county as a going concern.

"Sure I'll boost for a park," says Ted Howard, a young cowpuncher whistling Clementine as he rides herd on the slopes back of Hells Canyon, "but first I wanta know if that park is gonna shut these steers out of their feed."

Al Ducket, who runs a garage at Imnaha Gorge, the last jumping-off place on the narrow road to Hells Canyon, knows that the canyon is full of water-power sites. He wonders if a park will prevent the sites from ever being developed.

"Nobody, company or Government, can build a dam in a national park, I hear," says he.

A school teacher in Enterprise is worried about losing the grazing and timber fees from the Forest Service. What will support the school district then? The young, bespectacled manager of the Enterprise Hotel says that the stockmen virtually keep the hotel in operation.

Grady Miller, sharp-jawed and lean, who has been a forest ranger in the Wallowa Mountains for 29 years, takes no sides, but says the Forest Service has marked off 128,000 acres as a primitive area, and this, at least, cannot be touched.

The park enthusiast of Wallowa County is Charley (Silvertip) Seeber, mountaineer and woodsman, who once hitchhiked from Portland to San Francisco by renting a sailor suit and telling drivers he was on his way back to his ship. "The canyon and the hills," insists Charley, "belong to all the citizens of the United States and not just a handful of ranchers and stockmen. I've been tryin' to tell the folks here in this county that the tourist trade will mean more to them some day than the stock business ever did; that is, if we get a national park like we ought to."

Charley Seeber is Wallowa County's most famous inhabitant, and his words carry weight, but the owner of a little restaurant in Enterprise where the steaks are 2 inches thick says he prefers a bird in the hand to two in the bush. "Charley may be right as rain," he admits, "but the stock business is here now and I'm paying expenses, and about that tourist trade I don't know. I'm for hanging on to what we got."

Each day at noon a train clatters out of Enterprise and begins the 80-mile trip down out of the mountains to the main line. It is a combination train with five or six cattle and box cars and an old coach on the end. The coach has red plush seats, carbon arc lamps, and a wood stove that looks like a coffee grinder.

"You know," philosophizes the overall-wearing brakeman as he comes back into the coach, "this national-park ruckus seems 'bout like this: It'd be dandy to have a lot of tourists on this run. That'd turn this car into a slick, new coach and there'd be half a dozen others like it. Only thing is, though, you gotta make sure them cattle cars up ahead stay on the train, too."

LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY AND HIS REPLY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by me to the Secretary of the Navy, and his reply thereto:

MAY 20, 1940.

Hon. CHARLES EDISON,
The Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SECRETARY EDISON: I am enclosing a part of a very interesting editorial which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of May 20. I am anxious to receive official information, if possible, as follows:

(1) The number of naval vessels, types, and tonnage constructed since March 4, 1933, and commissioned.

(2) The number, type, and tonnage now under construction.

(3) The number not under construction, but authorized by law, for the construction of which appropriations have been made, and the type and tonnage of same.

(4) The size of our Navy on March 4, 1933, giving types of vessels, total tonnage of each type, and if any of these vessels are now out of commission; and, if so, the number, tonnage of each type, and the reason. I assume the main reason is old age. I refer to this as an illustration.

(5) The number of vessels, and enlisted men in the Navy on March 4, 1933, and the number at the present time.

(6) The number of naval vessels, types, and tonnage constructed and commissioned between January 1, 1925, and March 4, 1933; the number, types, and tonnage under construction on the latter date.

(7) The number, types, and tonnage of naval vessels taken out of commission between the same dates as stated in inquiry No. 6.

(8) The same inquiry in relation to No. 6 and No. 7 with the exception that the period is between January 1, 1929, and March 4, 1933.

(9) If known, and if not, the approximate number of vessels, types, and tonnage of each to be constructed: (a) Between January 1, 1925, and March 3, 1933, and (b) January 1, 1929, and March 4, 1933, by Great Britain, Japan, France, Germany, and Italy (in particular), and any other countries that have engaged in naval construction during these periods.

(10) The same information as contained in inquiry No. 9, except that the period is between March 4, 1933, and the present date.

If there exists any reason why at this time any, or all, of the information sought should not be given, I will appreciate it if such information is given as is compatible with public interest.

Respectfully yours,
JOHN W. McCORMACK.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS,
Washington, June 4, 1940.

Hon. J. W. McCORMACK,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. McCORMACK: Your letter of May 20, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, was forwarded to this office for reply.

Every effort has been made to expedite compilation of the data requested. The tables enclosed are numbered to coincide with questions noted in your letter:

(1) Questions No. 1 and No. 2 are answered on page 1.

(2) Question No. 3 may be answered by explaining that all vessels appropriated for are now under construction. The remaining vessels which have been authorized have not yet been appropriated for, with the exception of those included in the 1941 appropriation bill, not yet signed by the President.

Let Us Stay on the Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I have before me an editorial from today's Washington Daily News entitled "Congress Hearing From Home." The gist of the editorial is that President Roosevelt and administration leaders are retreating on their proposal that Congress quit and go home under the fire of an aroused populace.

I can vouch for the truth of this editorial, for during the past 24 hours I have received no less than a hundred letters and telegrams from my district urging Congress to remain in session for the duration of the war emergency. And other offices are being flooded with similar requests.

I made my position on this issue known in no uncertain terms when the suggestion for an early adjournment was first made by the President. More than 2 weeks ago I stated that we should stay on the job to make sure that no steps are taken to involve this country in the European war.

Recent developments, I believe, have made it more imperative than ever that Congress remain in session to serve as a check on the President's impulsiveness, which may yet lead us down the road to war.

I am prepared to stay in Washington all summer and fall, if necessary. For if ever there was a time when Congress should not adjourn that time is now. In fulfillment of what I construe to be my solemn obligation to the people who elected me—the people who would have to fight and die in the event of war—I intend to vote against any motion of the misguided leadership for adjournment.

[From the Washington Daily News of June 14, 1940]

CONGRESS HEARING FROM HOME

We think the country will feel relieved at the evidence that administration leaders are backing down on congressional adjournment.

Speaker BANKHEAD now says it is impossible to get gone by June 22, the dead line originally set.

The drive to put that over was slowed up considerably when Treasury Secretary Morgenthau said he was willing to stay on the job if the Congressmen were. The next day came Mr. BANKHEAD'S statement.

What is happening is that Washington has been hearing from home about the preposterous, presumptuous, and dangerous idea of the legislative branch of our Government abdicating in a time of war crisis. The here's-your-hat-what's-your-hurry attitude of President Roosevelt and his asscciates helped wake up the people to the fact that something queer was going on.

So the grass roots began to register. And that's democracy functioning.

We hope those at home aren't lulled by the partial retreat and that they continue to express themselves in a loud, large, and positive way. The Bankhead statement doesn't exude any enthusiasm. It hath a half-hearted and begrudging sound. But it's a good sign, nevertheless—though no self-starter.

Congress should stay in session for the duration. If it fails to, those who vote to go home should be made to stay there the next time they come up for election.

The Smith Amendments to the National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. FRIES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Speaker, reactionary forces, viciously opposed to labor legislation, have used every conceivable means and method known to enemies of labor in a nefarious attack—a veritable "blitzkrieg" program—against the National Labor Relations Board, with the sole purpose of scuttling the National Labor Relations Act and destroying the fundamental principles upon which the act rests.

Those who have constantly opposed the National Labor Relations Act since its inception, and its principles prior to that time, have used every ignoble means at their command to destroy not only the National Labor Relations Board but every person or group engaged at any time in fostering or attempting to preserve the National Labor Relations Act.

During this period of war hysteria the enemies of the common people find themselves, because of the hysteria and the consequent loose thinking on the part of those who are normally sound, armed in the proper atmosphere and thus encouraged, armed with adequate material and resources beneficial to their cause in opposing all humanitarian legislation.

Many Members of Congress expressed their dislike of the National Labor Relations Act in no uncertain manner but attempted in a flimsy fashion to defend their opposition to the National Labor Relations Act by stating they were friends of labor and merely desired to correct any irregularities which now existed in the National Labor Relations Act.

They would have the public believe labor is an enemy to society. In the name of patriotism and with loud shouting, they cry that labor must be chastened for the public good. Social unrest, lack of employment—undeniable creations of their own selfish and un-Christian greed—even the very war itself they lay at labor's door. They would make of labor a whipping boy for the sins of the world.

I absolutely fail to subscribe to this philosophy. Labor has always served its government in an honorable, courageous manner in every crisis since the beginning of this Government. Labor has on every occasion of national need come to the defense of even those who had denied them a few life-giving crumbs from their own rich and heavily laden tables—to the defense of those who had sweated them, beaten them, shot them, and starved them in an unceasing effort to bring them to heel for further profit for the privileged few.

The records of the last World War prove conclusively and beyond any doubt that labor and agriculture formed the backbone and guaranteed the success of our forces in the World War.

The United Mine Workers of America supplied the United States Army with 72,811 coal miners who belonged to its organization at the time of the World War, and of that group, 6,092 were killed in action.

I regret very much I am unable to furnish the United States Congress with a definite record as to the number of laboring men and farmers who served in the last World War, but I am confident that no one of the reactionary groups now mouthing patriotism and leveling the charge of traitor at organized labor can begin to show a similar number in their midst, or of their kind, who served their country in time of distress, and who will again serve their country in every time of its need.

Labor today is not asking for any special concession. It asks only fair consideration by the United States Congress of the problems in which it is so vitally concerned.

The method used by the reactionary forces to discredit the National Labor Relations Act is a disgrace to our Nation, a reflection upon the wisdom and ability of the United States Congress, and a menace to society.

At the time the National Labor Relations Act was being considered by the United States Congress, the reactionary forces of the country employed 58 lawyers of outstanding legal ability for the sole purpose of finding fault and picking sordid, pettifogging legal flaws in the National Labor Relations Act and propagandizing the country against the principles of justice involved in this meritorious piece of legislation. Their report to the people of the United States was calculated to subvert acceptance of the act and to the effect that the act was unconsitutional. Their advice to members of employer groups was to disregard the act, and they promised that employers so disregarding the act would be defended in the courts of the United States.

These efforts to discredit labor's Magna Carta were carried to the highest tribunal of the United States. But the Supreme Court on April 12, 1937—which was prior to the time the Court personnel was changed due to deaths and resignations of members of the Court and while it was still under the domination of reactionary forces—declared the National Labor Relations Act constitutional.

Immediately after the Court held the act constitutional the forces bitterly opposed to this legislation continued their slimy activities, and with the help of reactionary Members in the United States Congress threw filth after filth of their own making at the National Labor Relations Act, and finally established on the sewage heap they had created the Smith committee for the alleged purpose of investigating the activities of the National Labor Relations Board.

Anyone with ordinary reasoning power considers this behavior on the part of the United States Congress anything but friendly toward labor. The record of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HOWARD SMITH, chairman of the Smith committee to investigate the National Labor Relations Act, discloses that he has never voted for any legislation which had a scintilla of labor significance. It was readily understood by everyone in the United States that the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SMITH, could not hold hearings involving labor legislation in an unbiased manner.

The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SMITH, had an unblemished record of hostility to the common man, but to further show his contempt for labor the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SMITH, hired as his chief counsel one of the most vicious enemies of labor in the United States. Herewith I present the record of Mr. Edmund Toland, counsel, chief inquisitor and persecutor for the Smith committee:

EDMUND TOLAND

I. A. H. ARNER CO.

Toland has represented the A. H. Arner Co., which is a St. Louis labor-spy and strike-breaking detective agency, and also the Industrial Standard Service, another spy agency, in subpena matters before the La Follette committee. The A. H. Arner Co. was shown up as a detective spy agency in the Brown Shoe Co. case before the Labor Board, as having engaged in the most vicious strike-breaking activities.

II. GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER CO.

Toland has represented this company in preventing the Board from holding hearings.

The La Follette committee reports disclose the following facts regarding the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.:

(1) Assessments paid by Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. to Employers' Association at Akron for undercover and other activities (exhibit 1066, pt. 8, p. 3197):

1933	$7,376.92
1935	13,988.31
1936	17,542.00

(2) Expenditures for munitions: 1936, $15,703.49; which included gas and gas equipment, guns and ammunition.

(3) Used the Corporations Auxiliary Cos. as its spy and espionage agency (pt. 4, p. 1412).

(4) Practically one-third of one of the volumes of the La Follette hearings is given over to the antiunion activities of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. Volume 8.

Page 2949 of volume 8, it appears that in 1936 the Akron Employers' Association paid $21,000 to the Corporations Auxiliary Cos. for industrial espionage.

Page 2950 of volume 8, it appears that the Goodyear Corporation trained a flying squadron which was given an intensive training course in the use of tear gas and other ammunitions during the years 1935 and 1936.

(5) It should not be forgotten that Goodyear has one of its main plants in Gadsden, Ala., where a mob of supervisory employees of Goodyear broke into the union headquarters, beat up Dalrymple, president of the United Rubber Workers, and ran both him and his organizers out of town.

Gadsden, of course, also has the southern plant of Republic Steel Corporation.

(6) Goodyear is one of the main members of the National Association of Manufacturers and has contributed heavily to that organization.

III. WHEELING STEEL CORPORATION

Toland has represented the Wheeling Steel Corporation before the Labor Board as local counsel for Earl F. Reed who is the attorney for Ernest T. Weir.

A. The La Follette committee reports disclose the following with regard to the Wheeling Steel Corporation:

(1) Use of detective operatives for industrial espionage (pt. 1, 185 et seq.).

(2) Purchase of gas (pt. 7, pp. 2606, 2627).

(3) Use of strike guards for breaking of strikes (pt. 1, p. 270, et seq.).

(4) Paid $9,100 from 1933 to 1937 to N. A. M. as contributions and dues.

B. In the Labor Board proceeding the Wheeling Steel Corporation was charged and held to have violated the Labor Act because of unfair labor practices.

IV. H. J. HEINZ CO.

Toland has represented the H. J. Heinz Co. before the Labor Board and as local counsel with Earl F. Reed.

A. The La Follette committee reports disclose the following regarding the H. J. Heinz Co.:

(1) 1933 to 1937 company paid in dues and contributions to the N. A. M. $27,850.

(2) Its president, Howard Heinz, has contributed $5,000 to the American Liberty League and $5,876 to the Crusaders. Clifford Heinz, a director, has contributed $5,000 to the Crusaders.

(3) Howard Heinz is director of the Mellon National Bank and of the Pennsylvania Railroad, a heavy contributor to the N. A. M.

V. THE ELKLAND LEATHER CO., INC.

Toland has represented the Elkland Leather Co. in a case before the Labor Board.

A. The La Follette committee reports disclose that this company used the Burns Detective Agency for industrial espionage (pt. 8, p. 3073, La Follette reports).

B. In the Labor Board case the Board held that the company had promoted a company union in competition with the genuine union, incited citizens' action to violence, and intimidated the workers by shut-down and lock-out.

VI. AMERICAN POTASH & CHEMICAL CO.

Toland has represented the American Potash & Chemical Co.

A. The La Follette committee reports disclose that this company made contributions to the N. A. M. of $2,600.

B. The Labor Board in its case held this company to have practiced widespread unfair labor practices in having promoted a company union, restrained and coerced its workers, and discharged wholesale union employees.

VII. MATHIESON ALKALI WORKS, INC.

Toland has represented the Mathieson Alkali Works, Inc.

A. The La Follette committee reports disclose that this company paid to the N. A. M. by way of dues and contributions from 1933 to 1937 $13,500, one of the largest contributors to the N. A. M.

B. The Labor Board held in its case that the company had violated practically all of the provisions of the act. It dominated and promoted a company union, interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in complete violation of section 7 of the Labor Act, which provides for the rights of the workers to organize and bargain collectively.

Mr. Speaker, this record proves beyond any doubt that Mr. Toland's activities on behalf of groups hostile to organized labor were such they constituted a disgrace to our form of government and a menace to society.

And this man handed the knives to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] and his cohorts with which to cut the heart out of the National Labor Relations Act.

Another procedure of the Smith committee which I would like to bring to the attention of the United States Congress is the very unusual manner, to say the least, in which the Smith committee handled the printing and distribution of hearings of the investigations of the Smith committee.

The United States Code, title 44, section 111, states that—

All printing, binding, and blank-book work for Congress, the Executive Office, the judiciary, and every executive department, independent office, and establishment of the Government shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except such classes of work as shall be deemed by the Joint Committee on Printing to be urgent or necessary to have done elsewhere than in the District of Columbia for the exclusive use of any field service outside of said District (Mar. 1, 1919, c. 86, 11, 40 Stat. 1270).

Nevertheless, in spite of this specific charge from the Congress that printing the work of the United States Congress be handled by the Government Printing Office, the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SMITH, made a deal with Mr. David Lawrence, publisher of the reactionary United States News, vicious columnist, and calumniator of labor, to publish the hearings of the Smith investigating committee privately. Mr. Lawrence, through this deal, obtained the privilege of selling the daily transcripts and bound volumes of the Smith committee hearings for his own profit. A further highly unusual procedure in this unusual situation was that while Mr. Lawrence, as a matter of private enterprise, was printing and selling the hearings of the Smith committee to an interested audience, the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HOWARD SMITH, Member of Congress and chairman of the Smith committee, allowed Mr. Lawrence the use of his frank to send the daily transcripts of hearings to Members of Congress. There is a nigger in the woodpile here if, indeed, there is not something strictly and absolutely unlawful.

If there is any evil in the conduct of the National Labor Relations Board and the record does not show any, surely these amendments are not the way to correct them. This Board and the legislation which set up this Board compose an issue on which partisanship and selfish interests have led many to make statements that do not rest on facts. In some cases they are honest mistakes. More often the misstatements are part of a deliberate scheme to wreck the National Labor Relations Act, the fundamental protection of labor's rights. In the name of common justice these amendments should have been defeated. In the name of democracy these amendments should never have been brought to light. Nurtured in evil, they will bring evil with them.

It is not my desire to take into partisan consideration any person or any particular group in dealing with the problems which concern all of our people, but by the same token I deem it absolutely necessary and essential that legislation be considered on its merits for our people as a whole and not for the purpose of aiding one group at the expense of another. Too long has labor suffered at the hands of its enemies who, bitter in their opposition to labor's proper demands, were also strong in legislative halls.

Thousands of letters have come to my office from all classes of laboring groups and from manufacturers and employers of every description pleading with me that no amendments to the National Labor Relations Act be considered at this time which would in any way weaken labor's Magna Carta—the National Labor Relations Act.

It is my prophecy that those who have voted for the labor-destroying Smith amendments to the National Labor Relations Act will live to see their evil chickens come home to roost. Among those who will bitterly regret the passage in the United States House of Representatives of the vicious Smith amendments to the National Labor Relations Act will be the supposed-to-be labor leaders who, in endorsing amendments which tore the heart out of labor's magna carta, betrayed the trust which had been placed in them by a helpless and confiding people.

Laboring people seek no special concessions from Congress, employers, or anyone else; but by the same token they do demand the right to work at a living wage so they may have the God-given right, belonging to all, of enjoying the necessities of life.

Labor believes that government was created for the protection of all of its people and not for any special or privileged groups. Labor believes that if the Government will protect its people the people will protect its Government.

Adjournment of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

RESOLUTION BY THE ILLINOIS HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, evidently the whole country is becoming aroused to the idea that Congress must not adjourn at this time. The people feel that our duty is to remain in continuous session owing to present world conditions.

This morning I received a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of Illinois calling upon this Congress to refrain from adjournment at this critical time. Such action, Mr. Speaker, on the part of that great body of Illinois representatives clearly indicates how our people are thinking. It emphasizes that it is the duty of Congress to "remain on the job and do our work." We are the duly elected representatives of the people and through us they expect and hope to find expression of their own views. They want the Congress to legislate and not delegate its powers to any one individual, regardless of potential emergencies.

Only this week the President in his speech at Charlottesville, Va., all but declared war. He promised everything but the kitchen sink. He forced us right up to the brink of the European holocaust. Such actions and utterances on the part of the President indicate that our post of duty is here in Washington. There is no question where American sympathy lies, but we must not allow our sympathetic interests and involvement in war to be one and the same.

I shall vote to keep Congress in session as long as an emergency exists.

The resolution referred to follows:

Whereas the rapidity of developments in the European war and the constantly changing international picture makes it imperative that the Congress of the United States remain in session in order to meet any eventualities that may arise in which this country may be vitally concerned or affected; and

Whereas the adjournment of Congress during this period of instability and surmise would seriously impair the proper functioning of our National Government should emergencies develop requiring legislative consideration and action; and

Whereas the people of this Nation, deeply concerned over the progress of current events, both in Europe and in America, are depending upon Congress to handle with facility and efficiency the problems which have accrued by reason of present world conditions: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Sixty-first General Assembly of the State of Illinois, at the first special session thereof, That we respectfully and earnestly memorialize the present Congress of the United States to remain in session and to refrain from adjournment during this critical period for the reasons stated in the preamble hereof; and, be it further

Resolved, That suitably engrossed copies of this preamble and resolution be forwarded immediately by the secretary of state, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President of the Senate of the Congress of the United States and to each Member of said Congress from the State of Illinois.

Editorial of Herbert Hoover

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE LOS ANGELES NEWS

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Los Angeles News, embodying an editorial of Herbert Hoover previously published in Liberty magazine:

[From the Los Angeles News of June 8, 1940]

VIEWS OF THE NEWS

(By Manchester Boddy)

EDITOR'S NOTE.—For nearly 8 years this column has differed with most of the opinions expressed by former President Herbert Hoover.

With respect to finding a solution to our economic, social, and political problems, he has advocated one course, we have supported another. We continue to believe that history will attest the soundness of the school of thought to which we subscribe, and prove conclusively the utter futility of attempting to turn back the forces of progress and reroute them through the worn-out, discredited broken-down machinery of the old era Mr. Hoover has so valiantly attempted to reestablish.

Today, however, this column considers it a public duty to reprint an editorial by Herbert Hoover. In our opinion it is the most valuable contribution that has yet been made to the thought of the Nation with respect to the position of the United States in the current World War.

Mr. Hoover's editorial was first the subject of a public address named "Nine horsemen." It was later amplified for publication. It is here republished by permission of Liberty magazine (copyright 1940 by Macfadden Publications, Inc.).

Herbert Hoover is profoundly right in his conclusion. It should give purpose and direction to the mighty surge of patriotic feeling that is rapidly sweeping the Nation into the civilization-destroying inferno of war.—M. B.

The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse are on the march: War, Death, Famine, and Pestilence. Two-thirds of the people in the world are at war. But coming before these old destroyers of mankind are five new horsemen.

The new cavalry are:

Imperialism, the destroyer of the independence of nations.

Intolerance, the destroyer of minorities.

Stateism, the destroyer of personal liberty.

Atheism, the destroyer of faith.

Hate, the destroyer of the unity of mankind.

These are the horsemen of the advance, preparing the way for war and death. After war and death sweep famine and pestilence. And their camp follower is revolution.

Imperialism has already trampled down the independence of Ethiopia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Albania, and Denmark. We have witnessed attacks upon China, Finland, and Norway, unable to defend themselves. And now the invasion of Belgium and Holland. And there seems more to come.

We have seen intolerance destroy Jews, Christians, and racial minorities.

We have seen stateism, expressed by the despotisms of communism, fascism, nazi-ism, and socialism, destroy liberty in Russia, in Germany, in Italy, and in a half dozen other countries. We have seen its infiltration through the world—including the United States.

Atheism has greatly shattered religious worship in Russia and Germany and weakened beliefs in a score of others.

Hate has grown fiercely since before the first World War began, and its ravages are not alone between races but between classes and religious faiths.

And all the Nine Horsemen have new weapons of destruction. Imperialism has become more dreadful by threat of destruction from the air. Propaganda, the weapon of intolerance, of stateism, of atheism, of hate, is more potent through our rapidity of communication. It now moves through the air over all borders and seas. It comes disguised in the home tongue. Hate has increased its voltage through cruelty of attack upon civilian men, women, and children by food blockade and death by the air. War is more destructive by our chemistry and by our machines. Famine is more terrible by the growth of great cities. Pestilence strikes right and left through the close net of our communications.

Only the Western Hemisphere is free of the full violence of these Horsemen. But they affect us. Our emotions are aroused. The attacks upon helpless small nations raise the indignation of all decent men and women. Our economic life is dislocated. The shadow of war hangs over all our decisions.

And from our emotions there are Americans who sincerely believe that we ourselves should go to war. They feel we should be willing to sacrifice our youth and our future to restore liberty against aggression, to assure the recognition of law and human rights.

Reason calls to us not to send our sons into this war. Reason dictates that if we join the military operations of this war, it means the abdication of the remaining seat of liberty in the world. Reason insists the Western Hemisphere should give sanctuary for peace in her flight from all the rest of the world. Reason is final in its demands that we prepare ourselves so that we may defend the Western Hemisphere.

To those who feel that we are not doing our part if we stay out, I may suggest that we look ahead to the end of this war—examine a possibly greater service to mankind. This war will end some time, either in victory or exhaustion. And in that relation we may well explore the grim work of the horsemen, Famine, Pestilence, and Hate.

Western Europe for a hundred years, even in peacetimes, has not produced sufficient food supplies for its own population. It has bought its food by the export of manufactured goods. But on top of this peacetime shortage of supplies, war at once diminishes the food production of every combatant nation. The imports of fodder are cut off or slackened, and the herds must be diminished. The drafting of manpower instantly diminishes the production of milk and of butter and of meat. The people eat into their animals, and when war ends their brood stock is depleted. Beyond this, planting of ground crops must be skipped. The harvesting is imperfect. And, above all, the nitrate fertilizers must be diverted to explosives.

It is true that each nation at modern war rations its population in hope of reducing its food consumption. Scarcity always raises prices, and the food goes to those who have the most money. Rationing does secure more equality in distribution and control of prices. It thrusts the hunger upon the civil population. Soldiers, munition workers, and Government officials are always well fed. The hunger in the people falls hardest upon the women and children. But rationing has little effect on the total consumption. War experience has proved that armies consume about twice as much food as the same men do when they are at peace. That is partly due to the greater physical need. It is partly due to the inevitable waste and destruction of food in camp, or by invasion, and at sea.

Beyond all this, the food production of the countries free of actual war is also demoralized, for the normal markets are interfered with by blockades and difficulties of credit to war purchasers. Prices are erratic, and the farmer is uncertain. Some countries are wholly isolated. Thus production diminishes among neutrals, especially at the beginning of war.

By the necessity of directing food supplies through the whole of the last war I watched these forces unfold with their millions of tragedies.

The food situation in the present war is already more desperate than at the same stage in the World War. Then, except for Belgium, there was no rationing of civil populations until the second or third year. In the present war every combatant country was on bread and meat cards within 90 days. In 1914 Russia was full of food; for years it has been in a state of semifamine. Moreover, today every neutral country in Europe, out of fear, has already mobilized almost its full manpower. The Balkan states, Holland, Belgium, Scandinavia, and Italy, will therefore also diminish in food production. The harvest of the Balkan states this year will be reduced. Denmark, now unable to import fodder, must needs kill many of her animals. Many of these smaller nations are already on rations. And in invaded countries there is already famine. It sweeps over Poland.

Out of all these forces, if this war is long continued, there is but one implacable end. That end is the greatest famine in history. And from lowered vitality by famine comes pestilence. There was a great famine at the end of the World War. The dramatic events of peacemaking obscured it. And as the people, after the armistice, were mostly fed by American action, there was no major tragedy to attract headlines.

During the 24 months after the armistice in 1918 we sent something over 80,000,000,000 pounds of concentrated foodstuffs from America to Europe. That was more food than we have exported to Europe in the whole of the last 10 years combined. And this food went not only to our Allies but to our former enemies. And of pestilence, an army of typhus came down from Russia on a front 1,000 miles long. At its height 1,000,000 cases raged, with a death rate of a quarter of those stricken. Americans fought that battle and won.

Without all this service, famine, pestilence, and their end in communism would have engulfed Europe. There would have been no peace of any sort.

After the Thirty Years' War a peace was made, and then it is said that one-half of the population proceeded to die from famine and pestilence.

There was no America then.

The conclusion of this observation is, Who will stop the famine after the present war?

And now let us examine the destroyer Hate. He will have something to do with the American people. In his modern visage he is probably the greatest of all destroyers.

Racial hates developed to an intensity and over more people in the World War than ever before. From the miseries which followed it came another unparalleled development. That was class hate. Both of them have played a great part in this cataclysm of today.

Hate becomes completely inflamed in modern war. Nowadays fighting quickly flashes from wars between soldiers to wars against civilians. It was not so long ago that wars were fought entirely between soldiers. They had elements of chivalry and sportsmanship. When such wars were over hates did not remain long in courageous men who fought against courageous men.

But where war is made against helpless civilians an implacable hate comes. Do we need be reminded of the 70 years of hate that survived in our country from Sherman's march to the sea?

As this war goes on, the blockade of food supplies, the attacks on civilians from the air will take more toll from women and children. As action between armies becomes more violent, the long lists of dead stream back from the front into the homes. From these wrongs and sufferings imperishable hates will sink into every household.

And do not let us think we had not in some lesser degree built up hates in the United States during the last war, although our losses had been much less bitter. We cannot forget the hideous attitudes toward loyal Americans of German descent.

Well do I remember that some days after the armistice I announced that the food blockade against Germany should be removed at once. That was imperative for reasons of humanity and for the self-interest of the Allies, that bolshevism could be stopped in starving Germany, and that peace could be made. Despite these obvious reasons the reaction in every part of the allied world and the United States was one of indignant opposition and denunciation of any mercy. It took us months to secure so simple an act.

In the end from this furnace fire of hate statesmen no longer are free agents. The bitterness makes sane peace almost impossible. Those of us who observed the making of the treaty of Versailles knew that the leaders there were consciously or unconsciously dominated by the fires of hate still burning. They had to get their acts approved at home. The sufferings of their people had been too great for rational action.

And one of the consequences of those hates was a treaty which sowed the dragon's teeth of the present war.

In the present war the forces making for hate are even more violent. If this war continues long enough these hates will sit again at the peace table. Unless there be some allaying force, some entry of reason and compassion, there will be a Carthaginian peace.

The conclusion of this observation is, "What powerful nation will still retain good will and reason?"

Hate, this sixth horseman, continues to ride after so-called peace is made. Famine and pestilence, together with the aftermaths of war's destruction—malnutrition, unemployment, and poverty—furnish the fuel to class hate. It is hungry people who revolt in violence. Civilians with filled stomachs do not face machine guns. Helpless, distraught, frustrated peoples accept the leadership of hate, who mobilizes them into revolution. The end is dictatorship, and the advance horsemen start on the march again.

Now America has a role to perform. It can be a great role in our history.

There is no such thing as isolation for the United States. The Monroe Doctrine itself is denial of that. And there can be no such thing as economic or intellectual or moral or spiritual isolation.

There can be no isolation from world effort to allay misery, to save human life, to bring peace, disarmament, reconstruction, and renewed hope from this catastrophe.

There can be military isolation. When I speak of joining in these wars I mean joining in the military side—sending our sons into it.

If we join in these wars we will start with the already great exhaustion of 10 years of our depression. Then we will further exhaust our already weakened economic strength. And that exhaustion will be in a far greater degree than in the few months we participated in the last war.

And when the war is over we shall need devote our remaining resources to support our wounded, our maimed, our orphaned, and our destitute. We shall need every resource to rebuild our farmers and workers from our own misery and impoverishment. And our sympathies will be justly limited to suffering at home.

If we join in this war the last great remaining reservoir of economic strength will have been exhausted. And hope of world recuperation will have been delayed while revolution marches unimpeded over the earth.

If we join in this war we ourselves will develop all the hates that are inevitable from war. We shall have lost the voice of reason in the making of the peace.

And, though we stay out, in our indignation at wrong and aggression we must not be led into blind hates against whole peoples. The great masses of the German people and the Russian people did not wish for the wars now going on. The vast majority of both these nations are gentle, decent people who prayed for peace even as did you and I.

And ours is a doubly difficult position. In our emotions we have a different scene from Europe fighting race against race. We have the heritage of every European race. Our war hates are not alone against the enemy. They cruelly divide our own people, not alone for the war but long after.

But if we remain out of war we might, if we have the will to do so, use our unimpaired resources, our courage, our moral strength to do mankind infinite service.

By that service we could allay the destruction of war and the ravages of famine and pestilence. That service of compassion could go far to save civilization and restore hope to men. Free of hate, we could exert an insistent voice of reason in the making of peace.

And if we are again called upon for service we have to demand that reason and hope sit at the peace table. Reason and hope for the world call for the restoration of those nations who have lost their freedom.

TNT—The Monroe Doctrine Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of June 13, 1940:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 13, 1940]

TNT—THE MONROE DOCTRINE TODAY

Among Latin-American nations Brazil has long been regarded as the most friendly to the United States. Over the years her foreign policy has frequently been deliberately alined with our own. Hence the shock resulting from Tuesday's pro-Fascist speech at Rio of her Dictator-President, Getulio Vargas.

Defending "vigorous peoples," Vargas attacked the "sterile demagogy of political democracy." Since this may mean us, it again becomes necessary that we take another look at our political hand. Once more it looks as though loose talk in Washington may have gotten us into a tight spot abroad.

A few days ago a congressional resolution dramatized the Monroe Doctrine as a war issue in these words:

"The United States would not recognize any transfer and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power."

The resolution's threat, pointed at Germany, is substantially what Monroe said in different words back in 1823, when the target was France, Spain, and the Holy Alliance. "Not acquiesce in" are fighting words. Considering the amount of armament we have "on order" and the amount we have "on hand," fighting words do not appeal to us as much as preparedness actions.

Frankly, we think the whole subject of the Monroe Doctrine is loaded with political TNT; that it is a little known but widely misunderstood document that may very easily involve us in trouble more quickly than some of the more obvious threats. It is our baby. Latin America has never adopted it, seldom liked it, and has generally hated it. For us to assume that the nations south of the Rio Grande have changed their views overnight is at least naive.

There are many scars. Dollar diplomacy, 30 invasions by us into the internal affairs of nine supposedly sovereign and independent Latin American nations, the story of how we got the Panama Canal, the activities of our marines in Central America and the Carribbean—a long and often sordid tale of the build-up over a century of distrust and suspicion of "Yankee imperialism."

President Roosevelt, by his good-neighbor policy, has made a commendable effort to heal old wounds. But he was dealing with a Latin psychology and Latin suspicions. The best that has eventuated from conferences at Buenos Aires, Lima, and Panama, conferences designed to make the Monroe Doctrine a real Pan-American doctrine, has been an agreement to confer when danger threatens anywhere in this hemisphere—as would be the case in any atttempt, for instance, to transfer the Dutch West Indies from a conquered Holland to a conquering Germany.

But there is a tremendous gap between agreeing to confer and agreeing to act. Since by the congressional resolution we are committed to action, we may have assistance or we may have only conferees. As a result of talking first, Congress has saddled us with a responsibility that stretches from pole to pole, from ocean to ocean, and from hell to breakfast—without any assurance that President Vargas, or any of his fellow Latin-American dictators and presidents, includes us in his group of "vigorous peoples."

Question: Why should we be the I'll help-youse Happy Hooligan of the Americas? If the Monroe Doctrine idea—when the showdown comes—can't be turned into an iron-clad, mutually respected military alliance, then why should we stick our neck out way down south of the Equator?

Suggestion: Cut out the conversation and the resoluting. Call a conference, or page every nation in Latin America, and find how far, if at all, each of them is willing to go in a move for the joint protection of the Western Hemisphere—a move which would be the common task of all, not the self-imposed but deeply resented task of Uncle Sam?

Unnecessary To Violate Constitution in Order To Deport Harry Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, if one-half of the charges made against Harry Bridges are true, he is undoubtedly an undesirable and should by all means be deported. I do not have the least sympathy for him, nor do I feel that the communication which he wrote is a proper answer to the charges. I cannot, however, approve of the method that his deportation is to be brought about as provided for in this bill. Never before in the history of our country has legislation similar to this been before the Congress.

Let no one be deceived, this is what is termed "popular legislation." Those who support the bill will be praised, those who oppose it charged with being friends of aliens who would destroy our form of government. I am going to take the unpopular course, not for the sake of Harry Bridges, because I join all in condemning subversive activities, but because the Constitution of the United States says in article I, section 9:

No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

A legislative act which provides punishment without a judicial trial is a bill of attainder.

If we are to rely upon the decision of the Supreme Court in a case which originated in my own State, Missouri, following the Civil War, then this bill, if it ever becomes a law, will be held to be unconstitutional. Under an act passed by the Legislature of Missouri, ministers of the Gospel were denied the right to preach unless they took an oath they had not been connected with the Confederacy during the Civil War. Father Cummings, a Catholic priest, challenged the constitutionality of this law, and he was sustained by the United States Supreme Court, the Court holding it was a bill of attainder.

We have all taken an oath to support the Constitution. In my humble opinion, I would be violating that oath if I supported this legislation. We have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars investigating subversive activities. We have had sensational reports, but where is the legislation to cure the evils complained of, if it be necessary? If our laws dealing with aliens who do not like our form of government are not sufficient to deport them, why cannot general legislation be suggested in which we will find the remedy?

I am not one who has at any time attempted to use influence to keep aliens from being deported who have violated our laws, and I never will. Requests have come to me from time to time, but my answer has always been "No." It will be "No" in the future as it has in the past.

In my opinion, there is an issue here much more important than the deportation of Harry Bridges. On Wednesday, May 29, at the exercises at the unveiling of the painting depicting the signing of the Constitution of the United States, held in this Capitol, the Speaker of this House, Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, made the following remarks:

In a few moments there will be disclosed for your observation and, I feel confident, for your hearty approval and admiration, a reproduction on canvas of possibly the most significant event in the political and governmental history of our Republic.

It has often occurred to me in looking over the other great historic paintings which adorn this rotunda and this Capitol that it is a rather singular thing, if, indeed, not a grievous omission, that up until this hour no provision has been made for the perpetuation in enduring form of that scene of such transcendent importance to our people, as well as to the people of the world.

It was the concluding episode of the determined purpose of our ancestors who participated in the struggle for our independence to write into one document their conception of the structure of a righteous and enduring form of government for a free people. With the addition of the first 10 amendments, commonly known as the Bill of Rights, there was established our fundamental law, upon which there has been builded not only the oldest but likewise the most powerful democracy on the face of the earth.

Possibly after a lapse of 150 years after the signing of this Constitution, no more appropriate time than this could have been selected for the dedication of a perpetual memorial to those men of genius and high resolve and profound philosophy who made possible our great experiment in human freedom. And such observation is based upon the fact that today we are confronted with the menace of diabolical doctrines and powers which threaten to destroy the very foundations of democratic institutions everywhere on the face of the earth.

In a moment as we look upon the faces of those great men, the signers of the Constitution, let us as a united people highly resolve that no sacrifice will be too great, no hardship too burdensome upon the part of this generation, to preserve for our posterity and for the world the priceless heritage they bequeathed, in perpetuity, to their descendants.

Let us swear by the memory of the founders that if constitutional and representative government shall succumb in all other parts of the world, it shall and will be preserved inviolate in the Western Hemisphere. God give us the spirit and the strength to secure that supreme objective. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask myself, are we preserving inviolate constitutional and representative government if we pass this legislation? The answer, in my humble judgment, is "no."

As chairman of the Select Committee on Government Organization, I introduced and handled on the floor of this House recently a resolution which placed the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization in the Department of Justice. That is where it belongs, and its transfer, which I recommended 7 years ago, has too long been delayed. Let those who are charged with considering legislation providing for the enforcement of our immigration laws secure immediately from the Attorney General his views on what general legislation is necessary to deal with cases of this character. Bring in that legislation and pass it, but make it apply not only to Harry Bridges but to all aliens.

I have nothing but contempt for those who come to this country and then object to our form of government. This is no place for them, but let us in an orderly manner, in keeping with the provisions of our Constitution, for which we all say we would willingly give our lives, take care of them, not by passing a resolution such as this dealing with one case, which the Supreme Court will, if it follows precedents, pronounce unconstitutional, but by general legislation.

We are told that if we can pass bills providing for aliens who entered this country illegally to remain here we can pass bills to deport them. How many who advocate the passage of this legislation have introduced and voted for such bills? I have not, and on every roll call you will find me recorded as opposed to legislation of this character. I maintain those who entered this country illegally in violation of our immigration laws should be deported, and I insist that those who entered legally who do not like our form of government or who have violated our laws involving moral turpitude should be deported.

In the last few months we have learned something which should put us on guard against subversive activities. If our laws are not adequate, then enact laws that are, but by all means preserve our civil liberties which the Constitution extends to us.

The fifth amendment to the Constitution reads:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Even the lowest alien, provided he entered this country legally, is entitled to the same protection as a native-born citizen under this amendment to our Constitution, which we all hold so sacred, but in this bill there is a denial of due process of law.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, deport Bridges if he has violated our laws. It can be done without violating our Constitution.

Divided Loyalty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

ARTICLE BY WESTBROOK PEGLER

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I have asked permission to have printed in the RECORD the following column by Westbrook Pegler, first, because I resent as much as he does any attempt to induce Americans of whatever race or blood to give allegiance to a foreign power or dictator. Second, I think Mr. Pegler has made it plain that the vast majority of Americans of Italian descent are not only loyal citizens of the United States but are in danger of becoming the innocent victims of the operations of Fascist agents and of the resentment which they may bring upon others who have no sympathy with their purposes at all.

FAIR ENOUGH—INSIDIOUS PRESSURE

(By Westbrook Pegler)

A group of Fascist Italians in New York had the effrontery to profane the American Memorial Day rites with a rally of their own in favor of Mussolini, fascism, and Italy. The Italian consul general in New York attended, pursuant to the policy of the Italian consular service of subtly harassing and spying on Americans of Italian blood or birth and conducting or threatening to conduct boycotts against loyal American citizens and half-Americanized immigrants.

The account, which I have read in the World-Telegram, reports that Commendatore Pupino Carbonelli, described as a journalist, made an oration in which he said:

"Il Duce stands behind you, Italians of America and of the world. We must face the future united. Do not lose heart. Defend your American Constitution. Remain benevolently neutral. Be true to our idea."

Now, these remarks are typical of that insidious pressure by which true Americans of Italian blood or birth are imposed upon by outright Fascists or politically ambiguous individuals and by profiteering exploiters of the so-called Italo-American population who occupy the status of padrones in the American community.

Not forgetting that anyone who permits the Duce to stand behind him runs a grave risk of receiving a stiletto in the back, I will point out to this commendatore of Italy that Americans need no support, moral or otherwise, from Adolf Hitler's junior partner. Nobody has asked for Mussolini's help, the proffer of which by Signor Carbonelli is an affront to the loyalty of Americans. Just what Signor Carbonelli means by "Italians of America" I do not know, but he should be set straight on the fact that no Italian is an American, and vice versa. Italy is one nation and the United States is another, and it happens that during the last 4 years the Government of Italy has vilified the United States and the American people as a nation of gangsters.

Moreover, the Duce, who is so kind as to "stand behind" this element of the American community, has placed Italy in a military alliance with the nation which is now conducting a world revolution against the kind of government which is provided by the American Constitution.

Inasmuch as this Memorial Day rally was a Fascist occasion which paid only the most perfunctory and insincere respect to the Constitution, it is hard to believe that when Signor Carbonelli exhorted the meeting to "be true to our idea" he meant anything else than the Fascist idea, to which no American can be true. And the Italian consul general needs reminding, officially if he is insensitive to hints, that Americans need no advice from him and will not thank him for interference in the affairs of American citizens, whatever their breed.

The Americans of Italian birth or blood have no reason to love Italy. One reason why they have had such a hard time in the United States is that in Italy they were kept in deep ignorance and horrible poverty. They were glad to escape and, although they have been exploited in the United States, it is also true that this exploitation was conducted by native Italian padrones who came along with them and established in the new land the system of extortion and terrorism which was a native Italian peculiarity or vice as characteristic as garlic. Racketeering, formerly known as blackhanding, is not a native American trait, but was imported from Sicily and Naples, and the present Government of Italy was founded on such terrorism and is today a racket or nationalized mafia.

Signor Carbonelli, the consul general, other consular officers, and half-Americanized publishers of Italian language newspapers in the United States are not serving Americanism, or the interests of immigrants and their sons, in preaching the tie to the homeland. The homeland treated these people abominably, and the noble Romans and the supercilious Italians of the north regarded and treated as untouchables the Neapolitans, Sicilians, and other swarthy Italians of the south who constituted the American immigration. Now, suddenly, Italy has a great love for these people, and agents of the Duce are attempting to organize them into a "fifth column" of traitors to the land which gave them refuge from the darkness and squalor of the "boot."

Findings of the Interfaith Conference on Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honor to be able to include with my remarks the findings of the Interfaith Conference on Unemployment, held in Washington, June 4–6, 1940. They are as follows:

The conference submits the following findings to the Industrial Division, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America; the Social Action Department, National Catholic Welfare Conference; the Social Justice Commission, Central Conference of American Rabbis, and the Social Justice Committee, Rabbinical Assembly of America.

Unemployment is a dreadful scourge and a social sin. It is a major cause of war and poverty and an indictment of our society. Yet most of us have been indifferent and irresponsible in our attitudes toward this most critical problem.

The moral effects of the continued unemployment of 9,000,000 or more workers are evident. Enforced idleness demoralizes personality, makes it impossible for families to live normal, healthy lives, and prevents their participation in community life. These conditions must now become the common concern of the Nation. The religious bodies must supply the moral dynamic for changing them.

Unemployment must not be continually relieved—it must be abolished. It is the plain duty of the religious bodies to demand a thousand times more loudly than ever before that the necessary steps be taken to use our great resources and to work out procedures in accord with democratic principles.

Solutions cannot be found without individual and social sacrifice. The employed, the fortunate, must identify themselves with the unemployed, and be willing to make sacrifices in order to bring about the abolition of unemployment. Only high spiritual attitudes will bring justice. The moral will should be expressed effectively in terms of right social relations.

It is imperative that just social relations be attained, because economic desperation will lead many well-meaning citizens of all classes into great temptation. When people are confused and embittered, not knowing where to turn, they seek scapegoats, thus arousing race hatreds. People haunted by insecurity are most likely to become the easy prey of ruthless leaders, including would-be dictators who make large promises but take away liberties. In these times of emotional stress it is doubly necessary to emphasize democratic procedures and rights.

Whatever may be the needs of national defense, stimulation of industrial activity through the production of arms will not provide a permanent method of abolishing unemployment. This has been declared by the many speakers mentioning the subject at this conference. Indeed, some have warned that long and increasing production of armaments threatens the production of consumer's goods, and thereby lowers the general standard of living. It is clear that we must all search for sound methods that promise more constructive economic results. The religious bodies have a vital interest in what is socially constructive; in reconciliation and healing; in the arts of peace. Elimination of unemployment requires social thinking of a high order, and social collaboration to work out the plans and put them into effect.

To that end, there should be a continuing commission, composed of representatives of consumers, farmers, labor, finance, manufacturing, commerce, Government, education, religion. We hereby call upon the national organizations in these various fields to come together to form such a commission. For enforceable and coordinated action by the organized social forces of the country, governmental leadership is necessary. Government, we strongly recommend, should call these organizations together for devising cooperative, democratic measures to solve the unemployment problem.

Religious bodies dare not escape their responsibility to educate, with the aid of informed laymen, in regard to the moral and social aspects of such questions as have been here discussed, including the kind and degree of taxation; the relative emphasis upon voluntary and upon governmental leadership; the role of cooperatives for purchasing, credit, marketing; the possibility of setting up democratic economic planning; the importance of preserving religious and civil liberties; the need for new social inventions to deal with new conditions.

These questions should be taken up in religious assemblies, should be considered by the religious press and study courses. They all have religious aspects and implications, and require study in an atmosphere which religious bodies are peculiarly prepared to supply.

We recommend that these findings and a summary of the addresses and discussions of the conference be sent not only to the convening groups and their constituencies, but also to all other religious bodies of the Nation, with the request that they be given wide publicity.

We recommend that the findings and summary be also sent to the President, all Members of Congress, and to leaders of social agencies, voluntary and governmental.

H. R. 9766, As Amended—Deportation of Harry Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the special bill, H. R. 9766, for the deportation of Harry Bridges, is the first bill of its kind, we are advised, to be enacted by the House of Representatives in the 150 years of our national history. I joined with my colleagues from the State of Washington, Messrs. LEAVY, COFFEE, HILL, and MAGNUSON, in voting against it in its final form, as amended. We all voted for the rule to bring the bill before the House for consideration in the hope that it would be amended so that we could vote for it. This was not done. The nonpartisan character of the final vote is evidenced by the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON], the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER], on the Republican side, were among those who also voted against the bill on final passage.

My colleague from the State of Washington, Judge LEAVY, pointed out some of the constitutional objections to this type of legislation. I agree with his conclusions. In my opinion, in addition to establishing a dangerous precedent of a most subversive character, the bill is unconstitutional on at least three grounds: First, it is in the nature of a bill of attainder and ex post facto law and as such violates the constitutional inhibition (Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 277, 323, 18 L. Ed. 356; Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 333, 387, 18 L. Ed. 366; Drehman v. Stifle, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 595, 601, 19 L. Ed. 508; Pierce v. Carskadon, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 234, 239, 21 L. Ed. 276). Second, it violates the fifth amendment to the Constitution which provides that "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Under the bill, as amended, a hearing is expressly denied. The Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held in cases too numerous to require any citation of decision that an alien is entitled to due process under the fifth amendment. Third, the bill, as amended, even denies resort to a writ of habeas corpus and clearly violates the provision in the Constitution which provides that "The writ of habeas corpus shall never be denied except in case of war or invasion." For these reasons, under my oath as a Member of this body, to support the Constitution, I cannot vote for legislation of this type.

I am not concerned with Harry Bridges as an individual and hold no brief for him. I am, however, very much concerned with the principle and constitutional questions involved. With the world aflame, we are properly appropriating billions of dollars for national defense to maintain and preserve our democracy and protect our democratic processes against attack by totalitarian powers. The destruction of the democratic processes, which we value and prize so highly and are determined to preserve at all costs, was wrought in Germany, Italy, and Russia by such inroads upon individual and fundamental rights as is made possible by this type of legislation. If it is right for one Congress to deport by special act—something never before done in our history—a labor leader, another Congress may decide to deport a leader of employers, ad libitum ad nauseam. These is no end to the extremes to which such legislation may be carried, once the precedent is established.

Instead let Congress enact general legislation, within the guaranties of the Constitution, applying to all aliens, including Harry Bridges, if our present laws are insufficient. Let Congress provide by general legislation for the deportation of all aliens who advocate or teach the doctrines of nazi-ism, fascism, or communism.

Although We Are Unprepared, Roosevelt Would Force Us Into the Second World War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, although he cannot lawfully declare war, President Roosevelt is saying and doing many things which will make war unavoidable.

What makes his conduct the more reprehensible is that, because of the frightful waste of his administration and because of the industrial strife which his agencies and his friends and supporters have instigated and carried on during the past 3 years, we are ill prepared not only to fight a war on foreign soil but to defend ourselves here at home.

The situation is so well described in an editorial from the Chicago Tribune of June 12 that I here insert it:

[From the Chicago Tribune of June 12, 1940]

FULL SPEED TOWARD WHAT GOAL?

Mr. Roosevelt's address at the University of Virginia might have been written jointly in their day by Blum, MacDonald, Baldwin, and Chamberlain.

M. Blum sent some of his country's best planes and guns to Spain, where they were irretrievably lost. He also insisted that France's armament industries be subjected to every annoyance that a meddlesome government could invent in the name of social advancement. The result was that Germany got far ahead of France in the preparation of war materials, with consequences now apparent. Mr. Roosevelt indicated at Charlottesville that these mistakes are to be repeated by us. We also are far behind in the armament race, but we are to send much of what we have to foreign soil and all the restrictions on industrial and agricultural production which have been devised in the last 7 years are to remain in force.

Like MacDonald, Mr. Roosevelt is eloquent in denunciation, and, like, MacDonald and Baldwin, he encourages the Nation to believe that its preparation is far more complete than in fact it is. The truth is that we have no army to send to Europe, and the military supplies we might send, aside from those which are already on order for the Allies, will leave our own country naked.

Like Chamberlain, Mr. Roosevelt speaks most provocatively as the strategic position becomes less favorable to intervention. After the Germans had been permitted to rearm and fortify the Rhineland, and after Munich, Mr. Chamberlain decided upon war. He chose to fight for Poland, though it was obvious that the Allies could not reenforce the Polish army or supply it. Similarly, with Paris in the gravest danger of capture, Mr. Roosevelt announces his determination to support France. Like Mr. Chamberlain, he has chosen the worst moment. Our contribution cannot become effective for many months, during which the strategic position may well become even more unfavorable as more and more of the French ports are seized.

Almost everyone in this country shares Mr. Roosevelt's profound dislike of the dictators and his hope that they will be defeated. It is highly improbable, however, that Mr. Roosevelt advanced the welfare of this country by his denunciations. All he can have accomplished, aside from promoting his political ambitions, is to invite revenge at a time when we are ill prepared for defense. Impulsiveness is not the most serviceable characteristic of a public official.

While he is edging the country toward war, Mr. Roosevelt continues to promote factionalism at home through his political activity and his "reforms." He is obviously responding to the war whoops arising along the eastern seaboard and he is not thinking beyond tomorrow. He does not ask what the United States is to gain from its participation; he does not reckon the cost in men, money, and social and economic disorganization. His state of mind is clearly revealed in his statement: "We will not slow down or detour. Signs and signals call for speed—full speed ahead."

If Mr. Roosevelt gets his way, that means full speed toward a war we are not prepared to fight; full speed toward the slaughter of a generation of young Americans; full speed toward dictatorship in this country. It would be instructive to know what kind of a peace Mr. Roosevelt thinks would follow another victory in Europe won by American arms. Evidently he hasn't thought of that. At any rate, he didn't say anything about it.

Having failed so completely and so miserably to solve a single major problem undertaken by him, during the 7 years he has been in office, and having created a condition where it will be extremely difficult for us to properly prepare and having saddled a burden upon our people which must be met by increased taxation upon everyone, the most patriotic thing any citizen can do is to work earnestly and effectively for the complete elimination of Roosevelt and his New Deal wrecking crew.

Politics or Patriotism—Which Are We Getting?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS OF JUNE 11, 1940

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I am including an editorial published in the Detroit Free Press, Detroit, Mich., under date of June 11, 1940.

I think this editorial is especially pertinent at the present time. American citizens are vitally interested in the attitude of their Government with reference to national defense. I think that it is generally conceded that the rank and file of the American people are vitally interested in an adequate national defense in all our units: Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force, but they have a right to know that the money which is appropriated by Congress for that purpose is so applied.

Judging from my correspondence from my constituents of the Sixth District of Michigan, I would say that very few people are in favor of America's participation in the European conflict.

With 10,000,000 men and women out of work, with a national debt of $45,000,000,000, with an added guaranteed indebtedness of six to eight billion dollars, with a peacetime annual deficit of three to four billion dollars, America has all the domestic problems she can safely handle without incurring new and foreign ones.

The propagandists are already loud and vociferous in their statements that we should enter this war to "save civilization." We heard much the same argument in 1917, when we were told that the United States should declare war to "save the world for democracy." We lost thousands of fine American boys, spent billions of dollars, and then finally realized how futile our efforts were in establishing permanent peace in Europe with its ever-recurring and insistent wars.

The Detroit Free Press contained the following editorial under the caption "Politics or patriotism—which are we getting?" This editorial is sane, sensible, and thoroughly patriotic, and should be widely read. The editorial follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press of June 11, 1940]

POLITICS OR PATRIOTISM—WHICH ARE WE GETTING?

If we are not at war we ought to quit pretending we are.

If we are at war we ought to quit pretending we are not.

Let us quit pretending about anything. This is no time for pretense.

No time for smartness, for glib airiness, for conjuring rabbits out of high hats, for cleverness of any kind whatsoever.

The issue is simple and should not be clouded.

The American people want preparedness as a preventive of war, not as provocation for one.

In the hullabaloo at Washington this single fundamental fact seems rapidly being forgotten.

President Roosevelt forgot all about it in his angry address at Charlottesville last night.

The people have consented without protest to the spending of many billions in the belief that they are investing their money in an insurance policy.

They have not agreed that it shall be tossed into a gigantic gamble on the turn of the dice in Europe.

The President has declared a state of something short of war existing. But there is no clear demarcation between the line of less than war and war itself.

All this is vastly disturbing to a public mind long inured to the modern technique of waging wars without taking the trouble to declare them.

As far as the Nazi high command is concerned nothing we can now do or say will affect their belief that we are their sworn enemies.

They have no moral niceties about such matters.

Our finely spun technicalities about being into it up to our necks but "short of war" interest them not at all.

They know no law but that of might and care nothing about hair-line definitions and shades of meaning.

It is as silly for us to think otherwise as it would be for a brave but defenseless poilu to argue his metaphysical rights as he is crushed under one of their tanks.

Berlin does not listen to Philadelphia lawyers.

As far as the Nazis are concerned, in their present military position, we are already at war with them and any formal declaration would be a "mere scrap of paper."

We may fool ourselves by pretending this is not so but we are not fooling Hitler and Goering.

For, if Germany should win, victory will be theirs before we could affect the scales one way or another even if we declared ourselves officially. Our military authorities agree that it will take us at least a year before we can be prepared to help with either men or equipment of any consequence. Before that time the decision will have come. If Germany cannot win by then, she cannot win at all. So say all the experts.

Therefore, facing the situation in the harsh realism of things as they are, we have but one course before us: To get this Nation on a sound foundation for national defense. And nothing else!

The people will not be satisfied with "guess and be damned" programs that are dazzling in conception but drab in conclusion.

Mr. Roosevelt asks for over a billion dollars and the Nation applauds. Two weeks later he askes for another billion, with a casual, "Oh, by the way," approach to the asking. The people agree to that. Nor do they flinch at the added tax burden of $650,000,000.

They are not afraid of realities. They are worried only over unrealities.

The national-debt limit of forty-five billion is to be upped to forty-eight billion. The President has asked for $4,500,000,000 for the ensuing year. But from nowhere—least of all from the White House—comes a clear, concise statement of how this burden is to be financed, how much is actually needed, and what it is going to be used for.

The "on hand or on order" technique of the fireside chat seems to prevail in all the financial statements that have been issued.

Mr. Roosevelt confesses very little interest in where and how the money is to be raised. He merely says the Government has to have it. No one has questioned that; but the people do want to know where seven billion in the past 7 years has already gone for the same purpose with very little to show for it. And where this is going.

Nor will their doubts and uncertainties be cleared up by cheerful bedtime fireside chats. Rich and poor alike must be called upon to make tremendous sacrifices, and the palliatives of platitudes will not soothe them in facing a drift into a war they do not want.

If it is legal and proper and in keeping with a sound preparedness program to order the Army and Navy to turn back to manufacturers what equipment we now have on hand as obsolete, for them in turn to sell to the Allies, what is to prevent the same tricky device being used when new guns, planes, and other essentials are delivered? "Obsolescence" can be an elastic word.

And, stripped of its camouflage, this latest move is as baldly an act of war as though we were to order the American Fleet into action.

Another thing: There is a growing belief that in some phases of the Washington situation there has been more politics than there has been patriotism.

Ironically enough, the finger of suspicion this time is not pointed by Wall Street "economic royalists" or rival politicians. The charges are made by some of the stanchest defenders and advocates of the New Deal philosophy.

Space will not permit the quoting of more than three, but they are typical and their "left-wing" fidelity need not be doubted.

First, there is John T. Flynn, long a special economic adviser to the New Deal and one of its most prolific apologists. He charges that Mr. Roosevelt is using the present emergency as a smoke screen to hide the failures of his program to put men back to work and to restore prosperity.

Second, there is the New Republic, which since 1933, has been the quasi-official organ of the so-called palace janissaries, the inner circle of ardent leftists within the White House. This publication makes no bones about the administration playing politics with one of the gravest situations that ever confronted our Nation. In the current issue it says:

"On the political side, the new dealers sought to make use of the defense issue to create a coalition Cabinet, with the single-hearted purpose of rendering their conservative opponents helpless in the coming campaign.

"Among certain liberal groups it was feared that Mr. Roosevelt, in proposing a coalition, was surrendering to the Republicans, offering to make terms with them. On excellent authority it can be said that this is untrue.

"The new dealers were trying to ensnare hostages. It was a skillful plan. The Republicans could not have attacked the New Deal if the heads of their party were in Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet.

"Col. Frank Knox, the first Republican leader interviewed by Mr. Roosevelt, is supposed to have accepted the plan, and may yet enter the Cabinet. However, coalition was killed by the acerb anti-third-term statement of former Governor Landon."

Third, there is Oswald Garrison Villard, dean of American liberals, for many years editor of the other left-wing weekly, the Nation, and now its contributing editor. He writes:

"The national fright over the success of the "blitzkrieg" has pulled the President out of a bad hole. War or no war, he had to have the right to get us further into debt, since it is entirely beyond him to put our industry fully to work. * * * Hitler has given him another breathing spell. * * *

"Of course, the new taxes will not produce one-sixth of the sum—$4,500,000,000—which the President has asked. It is only a clever joke—not a serious effort * * *."

These accusations should be met.

The President himself should accept them as a challenge.

They are not isolated instances.

The fate of this Nation may well depend upon their truth or falsity.

The people have a right to know if politics is being played with human misery, if politics is jeopardizing all that we have or ever hope to have, if politics has taken the place of patriotism.

This is what the accusations mean—if they mean anything.

The issue is not one of men, money, and machines.

It is one of morals.

Calvin Coolidge once remarked that every word a President says weighs a ton. He meant that, because of the tremendous power a President possesses, he should carefully weigh his words.

The people, loving Mr. Roosevelt as their friend and crusader, have smiled indulgently in the years past at some of his free vocal efforts and Puckish byplay. All in good fun, they said, each understanding the other.

Now there are these rumors, no longer passed along only by those who might be dismissed as reactionaries or disgruntled leaders of business. And from these reports stem the element of uncertainty which steals across our land. For Mr. Roosevelt still carries on in the same breezy insouciance that captivated most of us in his inaugural address when his happy courage gave a despairing people a great new hope.

In the present sorry situation, however, that happy-warrior role seems synthetic.

The people know of the disgraceful situation that exists in the office of the Secretary of War, a sore that has festered for years: The deadly personal feud between Secretary Woodring and his first assistant, Johnson—a chaotic condition allowed to continue for the sake of political expediency.

The people know that Charles Edison was promoted to the Secretaryship of the Navy only to give him a prestige that would aid him in his campaign for Governor of New Jersey, as a Charlie McCarthy for the notorious Boss Hague of that State. His resignation is dated June 24.

The Army and Navy are our sole defense.

Yet we see these vital Departments manhandled by misfits; and, in one of them, the personnel torn with openly declared enmities.

It is little wonder, then, that the people are willing to lend attentive ear to the steadily increasing barrage of reports that all is not well in Washington.

Only out of the deep wells of unsullied sincerity can be given the answer that will cleanse from their minds the miasma of doubts and fears which now inflicts them.

There is an explanation of the public's long complacency concerning oft-repeated charges of chicanery in high office.

There has been a Nation-wide moral let-down.

There was the bitter disillusionment of the World War, the hypocrisy and lawlessness that went with prohibition; the tragedy of the Harding scandals, the pain of which in the body politic was dulled by the narcotic of the "Coolidge prosperity"—which turned out to be a rubber check; there was the stodgy ineptitude of Hoover, who told them that poverty had been wiped from the face of the earth. And now this!

A corroding cynicism, born of the constant crash of hopes, had calloused the people to accept without ringing protests of righteous indignation many conditions they knew to be wrong.

But the Free Press believes that there is an awakening at hand, a revival of our national sense of honor.

Out of our new common danger there can come a strengthening of our moral fiber, a revitalization of the old ideals once vouchsafed us by a benign and patient Providence—if He will but again grant us the power to see.

Without this there can be no true patriotism. For patriotism is an unselfish love of country that has its roots deep in the instincts of the people. It knows no party, no creed, no sectionalism. In its spiritual essence it is the living soul of the Nation.

Only through the reawakening of this spirit can there come to us the cool, clear light of understanding—when we will know, deep within ourselves, that we are living a life and not playing like actors doing their parts upon a stage.

And reason, sound understanding, freed of all theatricalism, dictates that it is our duty to keep out of other people's wars.

Sane people first look after their own children before they do those of their neighbors. God helps those who help themselves.

We can best serve mankind by keeping alive on this soil the principles of human liberty that first found root here.

To "make the world safe for democracy" in the last war we nearly lost our own. We may not be so fortunate another time.

Logic demands that we build a national defense to preserve ourselves and our principles of government.

If we do this, we will be in better position to help in the restoration of a now mad world back to its sanity.

These are the reasons the people have willingly consented to the voting of all these billions to President Roosevelt—not for the purpose of becoming involved once more in the age-old conflicts of European power politics.

So let's quit pretending.

And woe unto them who play politics in this hour of the Nation's deepest need.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. HART

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, on May 14 the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], in addressing the House, made the following statement:

Since the Hitler regime came into power, however, the Board of Trade for German-American Commerce slowly changed its policy and since the last 3 or 4 years has become an organization absolutely controlled and financed by Germany, and one playing a very important role in the United States in distributing German propaganda and supervising espionage activities. * * * The president of the Board of Trade for German-American Commerce is Dr. Robert Reiner, of the Robert Reiner, Inc., who is very sympathetic toward the present German regime.

On the Sunday following the date of the address of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], his indictment of Dr. Reiner was referred to by a noted New York columnist, and shortly thereafter, in an address delivered on the floor of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] quoted what the columnist had written.

Dr. Robert Reiner formerly lived in the congressional district which I represent. While no longer a resident of the district, he is still the president of a large concern, Robert Reiner, Inc., located in the township of Weehawken. Dr. Reiner has forwarded me a letter totally and unequivocally denying the charges leveled against him in the utterances referred to, and expressing willingness and anxiety to have these charges investigated by Government officials.

Believing that Dr. Reiner is entitled to be heard, I include in these remarks the entire letter which he has addressed to me:

ROBERT REINER, INC.,
Weehawken, N. J., June 8, 1940.

Hon. EDWARD J. HART,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In the May 14, 1940, issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (pp. 6113, etc.) there appeared certain statements concerning the undersigned. In fairness to me, I ask that you give equal publicity to the following facts:

I am the president of Robert Reiner, Inc., and have been its president continuously since its organization in 1908. This company now is, and has since its incorporation, been engaged in the business of importing and manufacturing textile machinery. More than 90 percent of the employees of Robert Reiner, Inc., are American citizens.

I have been a resident of the United States of America since 1903 and have been a citizen since 1909.

I am proud to state that I always have been a loyal citizen in my community, and I challenge anyone to prove the contrary. Allegations by somebody who makes them innuendo and under the protection of his immunity are false and untrue. I have never been engaged, directly or indirectly, in any activities which may be referred to as un-American, and I would unconditionally welcome investigation by any Government agency as to my past and present activities.

May I add a few words about my connections with the board of trade for German-American Commerce, Inc., which the gentleman in question apparently used as reason for his unpardonable remarks?

I was elected president of this American corporation on March 29, 1939, and I, naturally, have accepted this honor, in the belief that the activities of chambers of commerce in general deserve high praise and that their purposes are nowhere better understood or better supported than in this country. I can state here definitely that during my activities for this corporation I have never encountered a discussion of any problem other than such incident to the promotion of more satisfactory commercial relations between our country and Germany.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT REINER.

P. S.—I hope to see you next week.

The National Defense and the Housing Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered recently over the radio:

I would like to begin my remarks by reading a number of brief quotations that have recently come to my attention:

"The turn-over here (in Elizabeth, N. J.) is 360 percent per month—550 percent unskilled and 130 percent skilled labor; the men brought to Elizabeth have to pay such high rents. There are tenements available, but they are in such poor condition that they are practically uninhabitable. The company has built dormitories but they are overcrowded. It is taking on 100 men a day. In the next 3 months 8,000 men are needed * * * The company has stopped advertising for men because it cannot help them."

Also:

"The growing need for additional employees at this yard (the Navy Yard at Mare Island, Calif.) necessitates a solution of the housing problem in Vallejo. It is almost impossible for employees coming from other places to secure accommodations and men taken on often request their discharge as they are unable to obtain reasonably comfortable accommodations in Vallejo within their means * * *."

One more, this one dealing with the Washington Navy Yard:

"* * * unless prompt measures are taken to relieve the scarcity of housing, it will be impossible for the factory to increase or even maintain its present force, as many of the new men who have come from a distance with the expectation of bringing their families to Washington later, have been unable to find accommodations and are unwilling to remain permanently without their families."

These quotations, ladies and gentlemen, are from an official Government's report describing housing conditions during the last World War.

And they tell only part of the story. They pass over the drain upon the worker's health resulting from substandard, overcrowded shelter. They say nothing about the relative ineffieciency of the worker on the job who spends half or two-thirds of every day in a dwelling that could not possibly meet factory inspection standards. They tell you nothing about the dissatisfaction and breakdown in morale produced by bad housing and high rents.

But will it be any better during the next few years? Will we be able to avoid similar conditions?

All I can say now is that it depends. It depends upon how promptly we take steps to meet our growing housing needs. There has been too much hindsight these days. There are too many who know what is the proper thing to do after the time for doing it is past. What we need today is foresight.

A little foresight will show us that as the national defense program continues, we will be confronted with housing conditions akin to those of the last period of world conflict.

First of all, there is nothing static about the defense program. A large number of major industries will have to expand, to expand rapidly. This will mean the more intensive use of old plants in the older industrial communities. Workers from neighboring towns—often from far-away localities—will be drawn to these communities in great numbers. In many cases new plants will be opened up in localities where they had not existed before. Workers will flock to these towns in still greater proportions. In either case, they will want to bring their wives and children along with them. Man is not a solitary animal. Even though offered a steady job at good pay, he will not want to break his family ties. Moreover, there will be new naval bases, new Army posts, new airfields. Each of these will draw to them large numbers of married enlisted men and married employees. It must be granted, therefore, that the need will be great.

Second, it would be a miracle if the private building industry were to meet the need. During a period of swift armament private building—especially home building—always declines. In 1914 and 1915, for instance, residential construction was at a fairly high level. But as the country became more and more adjusted to a war-time economy, construction fell rapidly. By 1918, it had fallen fully 50 percent.

The reasons for this decline are easy to appreciate. In a war-time economy building materials are needed for other purposes. Skilled labor is drawn to other industries. Interest rates and commodity prices usually rise. Private home building becomes more difficult than before, more expensive than before.

Moreover, there is reason to believe that housing may become more of a problem during the next year or so than it was during the first World War. During the 11 years, from 1905 to 1915, inclusive, there was not one year in which less than 400,000 new homes were built. But how about the last 10 or 11 years? How large a housing supply is there for us to rely on? During the past decade the average annual construction was only a little more than 200,000 new homes. In fact it was not until 1939 that the 400,000 mark was reached. Consequently, we are already in the midst of a housing shortage. During the last war it was a question of good conditions becoming bad. Today it is a question of bad conditions becoming worse.

There is only one remedy—public housing. The United States Housing Authority should be authorized to lend construction funds to the Army and Navy and to local housing authorities. It should be authorized to build housing projects itself.

Of course, there may be landlords who will want to benefit from an acutely intensified shortage, who will want to raise rents at the first opportunity to terrifying heights and grow rich on the plunder. A national defense public housing program, naturally, would relieve the shortage and eliminate the opportunities for rent profiteering. And for this reason there may be landlords who will object to a program of public housing for national defense. If there are, I would like to give them a word of warning. The only alternative to a defense housing program is rent control. In 1917 and 1918 rent-control legislation was enacted in many States and rent-adjustment boards were set up in more than 75 cities and towns. Public housing provides the only means whereby such drastic measures can be avoided.

In conclusion, let me remind you that this is the era of total wars, of wars in which every conceivable resource is used in making an attack and in which every part of the enemy's territory and every phase of the enemy's economy is regarded as an object for attack. On our part, therefore, we must declare a policy of total defense, a policy that will be successful because it eliminates every weak spot and every bottleneck. And unless we take the proper steps now, the housing of defense industry workers and of enlisted Army and Navy men may yet become one of our sorest weak spots and one of our most troublesome bottlenecks.

The Bill of Rights—My Protection

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

PRIZE-WINNING ESSAYS

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include two prize-winning essays written by young men who reside in my district. They deal with a very timely subject—The Bill of Rights—My Protection. The essay contest is an annual affair conducted by the American Legion, Department of Ohio, as part of their Americanization program.

THE BILL OF RIGHTS—MY PROTECTION

(By David Garvin, Shaker Heights, Cleveland, Ohio)

When Thomas Jefferson received his first copy of the proposed Constitution he asked, "Where are the rights of the people?" His words were echoed by many of the ratifying conventions which submitted about 100 amendments for addition to the Constitution. Ten of these were adopted by Congress and ratified in 1791 by the State legislature. Now Jefferson could breathe easily, for here were the rights of the people.

Today I am able to write about this Bill of Rights because for 150 years this group of amendments has kept open the highway of personal freedom. I am not limited to the Bill of Rights. No; I may write or speak on any subject I choose and have no interference from my Government as long as I stay within the bounds of reason.

There are many churches in my town. The Government does not care at which I prefer to worship, nor does it impose upon me a tax to support the church it favors.

These rights retained by me are the true basis of democracy. These four—freedom of press, speech, assembly, and religion—are fundamental to unfettered individual expression. Without them we could be easily made into helpless mocking birds, echoing the beliefs of the groups in power, through the compulsion of censorship and the threat of imprisonment.

My rights of free expression are protected in two other ways. In colonial times, two practices were commonly used to curtail the opposition. First, soldiers were quartered in private homes, ostensibly to spread evenly the cost of maintaining order. In practice these soldiers served as spies, who by observing the actions of the people were able to knife any attempts to change the existing order. Even more unfair than this method was the use of writs of assistance to search a man's home in hope of finding cause for punishing him. These two dampers on my expression can never materialize here, for the founding fathers took care to forbid them in the Bill of Rights.

Legally I am as well protected. Never can I be called summarily before a court of justice—accused, tried, sentenced, and punished without chance for rebuttal. Wisely enough, I must be arraigned by a grand jury, and must (in either civil or criminal procedure) be tried by a panel of my fellow citizens. If they find the accusation of the grand jury to be true, still I have a last measure of mercy, for no punishment or fine may be imposed if it is out of keeping with my offense. I may not be imprisoned for life for stealing a loaf of bread, or shot for repeating a radio program. No, I am safe in the halls of justice. I have protectors on every hand.

Our Government is a multiple affair. Authority varying in degree and kind is delegated to different branches. One branch cannot become supreme and ride roughshod over the people, for one division is placed as a check against the others; by separation of the Federal and State powers; by reserving the undefined mandates to the people, and allowing the smaller units to maintain their own militias.

Truly, I am a fortunate person. I have the Bill of Rights for a keen sword to repel the attacks of all my foes.

THE BILL OF RIGHTS—MY PROTECTION

(By Richard Cheney, Willoughby, Ohio)

Nothing is more timely in this period of history than to consider anew the value and importance of the Bill of Rights, which is the backbone of the constitutional form of representative government that we call American democracy.

It is appropriate now, when the democratic forms of government are threatened by the dictatorships of Europe, to consider how our Nation is held together and governed by the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Our forefathers fought to make our country free from the tyrant's hands, so to insure lasting liberty and free speech. They achieved this conquest and had to set up a government of their own. The Bill of Rights was proposed as a part of the new Constitution. These inalienable rights gave each citizen of the United States certain privileges not granted by any other country. Let us examine the Bill of Rights more closely and see what human rights are safeguarded and guaranteed by this basic part of our Constitution.

Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of worship whereby each individual has the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and the freedom of assembly are granted each citizen of the United States, regardless of race, color, or creed, or whether he be rich or poor. Each citizen has the right to vote for whom he chooses, without any fear of being thrown into a concentration camp. Our homes are protected by law and cannot be searched without a Government warrant. Citizens have the privilege of holding a public or private meeting for free discussion on any problems or topic which confronts us and does not plot the overthrow of our form of government. The Bill of Rights protects all citizens from a one-man government and gives each citizen, whether rich or poor, a chance to be elected to public office. The Bill of Rights declares that all men are created equal, in the sense that each citizen has equal opportunities.

The present and future generations of citizens should try to make our Nation more wisely governed by electing the best and ablest representatives for positions of public office, whose leadership will express the basic spirit and principles of the Bill of Rights.

The best defense of American democracy is more democracy that expresses over wider areas these human rights and privileges guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. Only in this way can the United States outride the storms of dictatorship and all other conflicting forms of government, and serve the highest welfare of each and every citizen of the United States, whether he be Jew or gentile, black or white, rich or poor. This will achieve the truly great democracy Abraham Lincoln had in mind and heart as "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." This is American democracy at its best, and this best is deeply rooted in the Bill of Rights as well as in the heart of every true and loyal citizen of the United States.

Political Issues of 1940, a Democratic Point of View

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. V. SMITH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. T. V. SMITH, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I have the immodest honor to insert herewith a radio address I delivered last evening over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network.

My fellow countrymen, it's amazing in our two-party system what one party can do to the other and for the other. Whatever Republicans present at Philadelphia to be the issues of 1940, you may rest assured that these issues have been defined for them by the Democratic Party. The Republicans must follow us Democrats even if they mean to displace us as national leaders. The report of their official program committee—Dynamic America—already makes this absolutely clear. So energetically have we Democrats acted, and along a front so wide, that by no stretch of appropriateness can persons, this campaign year, usurp the attention deserved only by events and principles of government.

Let us emphasize that thought, because too much of our political talk moves even in these perilous days at the level of gossip as to whether this man or that will be the nominee of that party or this. Any politician without principles is plainly pusillanimous, regardless of his party; and men with principles, of whatever party, differ less in performance than our purely partisan pride likes to admit. We need less gossip, then, concerning persons, and more and more of the philosophy of a government adequate to meet the challenges of this hour. Indeed, the difference between gossip and philosophy is just background, according to Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. We Democrats have furnished the background. We Democrats have made government so serious a business that every leader, unless he be a pretender plainly nincompoop, must face now the logic of events rather than merely follow the graceful flow of traditional campaign oratory.

Those who say that the man, the candidate, is the all-important thing deserve to be told, in the spirit of a famous French maxim, to find the woman; and those who take that tack presently sink to a very low level of gossip, gossiping about the wife, or the husband, or the children of the candidate. My late friend, Clarence Darrow, told me of one such person who interrupted him at a public meeting early in the Roosevelt administration, muttering: "I don't like him." "Don't like whom?" "Don't like Roosevelt." "Why don't you like him?" "I just don't." "But you must have more reason than that." "Well, if I must, then I just don't care for him." "So I gather, but that's no better." "Sir, if you insist: I don't like her either."

I. A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF MAJOR ISSUES

The issues of the coming campaign transcend persons and encompass principles, and that regardless of any given "him" or "her." Let us concentrate then upon the definition of issues which Democratic action has presented—looking first as from an airplane at the background and foreground: geographically, administratively, economically, morally.

THE GEOGRAPHICAL ISSUE

We may indeed speak of our foreign problems as a geographical issue. It has now become clear to all—what has been clear enough to some of us right along—that the reason we are at peace, while other democracies fight for their lives, is chiefly an accident of geography. Now that at last we all see this, and begin also to see that geography itself is not what it used to be, the scales drop from our eyes as in a horrid dream. Through miracles of science and malevolence combined we behold Europeans and Asiatics alike as in a nightmarish mirage turned upside down and joggling our little globe with their lethal joustings until we are all groggy with anguish and sick with fear.

"This earth is not the steadfast place
We landsmen build upon;
From deep to deep she varies pace,
And while she comes is gone.
Beneath my feet I feel
Her smooth bulk heave and dip;
With velvet plunge and soft upreel
She swings and steadies to her keel
Like a gallant, gallant ship.

* * * * * * * *

"The star fleets tack and wheel and veer,
But on, but on does the old earth steer
As if her port she knew.
God, dear God! Does she know her port,
Though she goes so far about?
Or blind astray, does she make her sport
To brazen and chance it out?"

—William Vaughn Moody.

In this hideous mirage of churning events, whales and submarines are ambiguous as to each other, the buzzard soaring in the skies is equivocal as between a sailing bird and a bombing airplane, islands of our surrounding seas which yesterday belonged to fellow neutrals, today are occupied by belligerents, and tomorrow may bristle with enemies of our western way of life.

Isolation lost, however, not all is lost. Our disappearing isolation has been transformed through the wise leadership of Roosevelt and Hull into insulation with our neighbors, north, central, and south, insulation if only we have the courage and wisdom and speed to keep it so. Europe and Asia would not quarantine aggressors, as we urged them to do, until at last they could not quarantine their aggressors. Their failure leaves us under the necessity of quarantining this hemisphere against the unquarantined aggressors of Europe and Asia alike. This we now undertake without limit and with the utmost expedition. Fortunately against this hour of need, strategically for any future Armageddon, we Democrats have through patience and sagacity abolished dollar diplomacy with our neighbors, have thinned ancient animosities, have thickened cultural relations, have substantialized financial cooperation, and have arranged the machinery of consultation upon every issue as touching our continental security. With this all-American bulwark, which we shall maintain intact at any cost, our international policy now becomes this: to speak sincerely and to pack a bigger and bigger stick.

Upon the latter aspect of policy our parties are clearly united, the packing of a bigger and bigger stick for any international brigand who comes adventuring into this hemisphere. And it is doubtful whether the Republicans will maintain an issue as to our democratic policy of speaking our sympathies sincerely. We all know that Woodrow Wilson's injunction to stifle our sentiments did not keep us out of the first World War, for all the aspect of perfection which that injunction bore. We face the second World War under a more realistic leader. He has encouraged us to feel freely and to speak for ourselves, as he himself has spoken for us, the sympathies that burn in us for the conquered weak and the downtrodden just. What those sympathies are, Alfred Noyes has immortally expressed in his poem on Finland—or was it on Czechoslovakia, or on Poland, or on Norway, or on Belgium, or on the Netherlands, or on France?

"Far off between the mountains and the sea
In ancient days this word was sped:
'Tell them at home we held Thermopylae
According to their word and lie here dead.'

"Now from the north there comes a mightier cry—
'We fought and failed against titanic powers.
But ask mankind—whose is the victory
When every unchained heart on earth is ours?'"

If in the event this policy of sincerely voicing the sentiments of "unchained hearts" should fail, it will but show us that any and every policy of peace was foredoomed to failure. Meantime, however, the policy will have preserved against timid hypocrisy the integrity of our souls and have furthered a psychological preparation without which the military preparedness on which we now agree to engage would prove hollow and weak. I hope there is no issue here between the parties in 1940; for the policy of sincere speaking even to issues of life and death seems trebly due: due as final notice to the domineering, due as comfort to our cultural kinsmen stricken by ruthless might, due as honesty to ourselves for the toughening of our fibers.

So much, then, for the geographical issue. Let us turn now to problems domestic, and first to the important problem of administration.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE ISSUE

Administration is so important as a means that with its failure there fails all noble governmental ends altogether. It should not be thought strange, therefore, if we make it an issue. Emphasis upon intelligence, here and elsewhere, would not be thought strange in any other great country. But the Republicans thought our preoccupation with intelligence in government so strange when we first went into power that they actually tried to use it as an issue against us in 1936. But they had to get a "brain trust" of their own in order to use the issue intelligently. Theirs wasn't brainy enough to elect Mr. Landon; but it was trusted enough, I hope, to woo them from making a further issue of intelligence. At any rate this experience should be a warning to the Old Guard of Republicanism that if they come back to power this time, they will find Washington and the country geared above and against not only the old corruption of Harding days, but also above and beyond the old complacency of Coolidge days and the old lethargy of Hoover days. We have streamlined the Government and geared it to responsive and timely action. This National Government of ours must continue to function dynamically in a world of tempestuous action. With this conviction Dr. Frank's policy committee for the Republican National Committee seems largely to agree.

But are the Republican power boys themselves psychologically prepared to take over a government reorganized for efficiency and to operate it humanely?—they who fought as of something dire the imperative necessity of governmental reorganization? We will make that an issue before the American people. They claim to be better administrators than we Democrats. Of an old machine that all but ran itself. Perhaps. But we have had to invent administrative agency after administrative agency to take up the slack of their previous lethargy. They have laughed at our alphabets. But the necessity for these alphabetical agencies born of long Republican lethargy was no laughable matter. They laugh best who laugh last.

The Republicans are slow to discard the C. C. C., N. Y. A., S. E. C., P. W. A., A. A. A., F. D. I. C., and even the W. P. A. Indeed, they have accepted, albeit with some sweet carping, most of these agencies. To accept them and to run them are, however, two different things. The Frank committee was kind in general to our administrative agencies. But are Republican politicians sympathetic enough to man well what they were not solicitous enough to provide at all? Are they alert enough to run what they were not intelligent enough to invent? We will make that a campaign issue. The burden of proof is upon them, and their actions are against them.

Their voting in the House by a large majority for a measure calculated to hamstring all these administrative agencies—voting for the Logan-Walter bill—showed blindness for the administrative problem and equal blindness for our judicial system; for this bill proposed to entrust to the courts problems that will paralyze the courts and to deprive administrative agencies of powers which are administrative and are imperative if Government is to function promptly and humanely. Upon this point let me quote this pregnant remark from Mr. Charles Evans Hughes, once Republican candidate for the Presidency and now Chief Justice of the United States: "No more insidious assault could be made upon the independence and esteem of the judiciary than to burden it with the questions of administration—questions which lie close to the public impatience, and in regard to which the people are going to insist on having administration by officers directly accountable to them."

Further predictive of administrative blindness was their reluctance and even opposition to the Ramspeck bill which nevertheless passed the House and now awaits Senate action. This effort to extend Federal civil service to nearly all Federal employment yet outside it is the simplest test of political insight and probity, for the best political sense is to know what is politics and what is not. Administration is not politics; to make it so is reaction and to keep it so is spoils. That is an issue which a half century of civil service in our national life has dramatized; and the Republicans, when judged by their legislative actions rather than by platform promises, are offside on that issue. They say indeed that they are better administrators than are Democrats. They must prove it, and that in refutation of these three specific counts: (1) They have recently stood against the extension of civil service, the traditionally accepted administrative agency; (2) they have long shown themselves unable or unwilling to invent new administrative agencies adequate to our times; (3) they have opposed by action, even when approving by words, the free functioning of the administrative agencies which we Democrats have invented and established. If they are better administrators than we Democrats, then their ambition should be made of sterner stuff than this frustration, than this lethargy, than this contradiction.

THE ECONOMIC ISSUE

We come now to our fiscal policies, and particularly to the matter of the unbalanced Budget. By common admission that will be a major issue in 1940. It is an issue which we Democrats accept and which Republicans will press. We accept the issue, because we are proud of our record in this regard. How could we apologize for doing in peacetime for peace purposes what Republicans are now glad to do in wartime for purposes of war preparation? We can be proud of the courage we had to face the Budget in the light of the good which the debt has done. No modern man is afraid of debt as such; for modern civilization is essentially a debtor-creditor relation spelled out in a thousand different forms of human confidence. The issue, then, is not of debt as such, but of the satisfaction of the creditor, the soundness of the debtor, and, back of both, the value of the results which explain the debt.

We Democrats inherited a large debt and on top of it an unbalanced Budget. We have increased the debt for the same sound reason that the debt was contracted in the first place. It was a question under Hoover of unbalancing the Budget or of further unbalancing the Nation. Hoover wisely chose not to balance the Budget. Roosevelt wisely chose also to keep the Nation balanced through a wise budgetary tolerance. No patriot in power will balance the Budget until he can thereby balance what the Budget's about, all promises of candidates to the contrary notwithstanding. The total of our national indebtedness, private and public, is about the same as it was when the Democratic Party took over in 1933. This means that other indebtedness—private, State, county, and city—has decreased while and because Federal indebtedness has increased. This constancy of debt as a whole suggests that altogether we Americans are not more in debt than our economic structure requires.

Where the debt load should lie is primarily a question of who is best able to carry it. On this point, this all important point, there is not as much difference of opinion as the alarms of candidates tempt one to believe. The cities that could not carry their relief and other loads were and are glad to have the States that could carry the load take-over, and States as well as the cities that were at the breaking point were and are glad to have the Federal Government that could carry the load take-over. Moreover, private persons who are in debt to the Federal Government for farm and home loans, as well as the corporations who have borrowed, are singularly well pleased with the new location of their indebtedness. The reason is not far to seek. The time to pay is longer and the interest rates are lower. This matter of interest rates reflects the soundness of the lender and the security of the borrower. How great that soundness and that security together are may be guessed from the fact that the total cost of carrying the Federal debt of forty-odd billions is about the same as the cost of carrying the debt half that size when we Democrats assumed responsibility.

After those who feel alarmed have pointed with all the alarm they feel, the fact seems to be that our national debt is justified when judged from the standpoint of both the creditor and the debtor; and that double fact is so, specifically, because of the value of the expenditures for which the debt stands. The debt has been our Atlantic Ocean against domestic disaster. It stands for the conservation of our human resources and the definite improvement of our national resources. On the human side—the side of relief—the story of morale is reassuring. Through 10 years of the worst depression this Nation has known we come forth with our children better clothed, better fed, and better schooled than when we went in. We come forth with the security and comfort of our aged increased. We come forth with our large but diminishing army of unemployed better fed and housed than are the employed in half the great industrial nations of the world. We come forth with the health of our people equal to, if not better than in 1929. And best of all, because deepest of all to our American way of life, we come forth with our Bill of Rights, our freedoms of conscience and thought and speech and assembly, more fully safeguarded indeed than they were in the prosperous twenties.

I give you more substantial proof than all this, though proof that may at first strike you as curious. I only ask you to reflect upon its profound significance. At other times of depression radical movements have grown apace. The Socialist vote would heretofore under national hardships have increased by leaps and bounds, and of late years the communistic. It has not been so this time in America, and that in spite of the fact that it has been true in other comparable countries. The Communists grew so strong in France that they had to be forcibly suppressed, and it has become accepted that the Socialist Party will attain power intermittently in both France and England. But in America, during these years that try men's souls and should automatically produce radicals, the Socialist Party fell from a poll of 884,781 in 1932 to a vote of only 187,720 in 1936; and the communistic vote has been steadily negligible, reaching only 27,781 at its height in 1938. Even the Dies committee records Mr. Browder's estimate of the total membership of the Communist Party in America at only 100,000 who pay dues, and the Nazi movements, from Mr. Kuhn's statement, to have less than 20,000 actual members who pay dues.

The simple truth is that our two-party system seems more securely founded and accepted than ever before with the Communist Party never strong and the Socialist Party steadily weakening. This means that both laboring men and farmers know that in one old party, and believe that in the other, they will be allowed a fair voice with better prospects of justice than in any radical utopianism. A fiscal policy of our Government showing such psychological and substantial results as these is a movement in the deepest sense conservative, whatever the figures of the debt may be.

And speaking of figures, those that can be produced to dramatize the tangible results of Federal expenditures are more dramatic than the heavily publicized debt figures themselves. If our human resources alone had been conserved, America might well stomach its large debt and go cheerfully on indefinitely paying the modest carrying charge of about one billion a year. But by no means is that all we have to show for the debt. When one travels over America, as I do constantly, seeing the forests cleared, the streams bridged, the fields terraced, the roads extended, the schoolhouses and courthouses built, the dams constructed—when he sees all this in every State and in almost every one of our more than 3,000 counties, he cannot but know that while our human resources are being conserved, our natural resources are being improved. The staggering national debt represents an even more staggering investment in our natural and human resources, an investment which future generations will bless as they enjoy.

Let me list a few of the things we have got for our money, tangible things for which the coming generations will praise our foresight: 80,000 miles of new highways built and 265,000 miles of city streets and country roads repaired; 9,600 new educational buildings; 770 new hospitals; 1,600 new courthouses; 1,500 new sewer systems; 2,400 new water systems; 282 new city electrical systems; 3,400 new playgrounds and athletic fields; 92,954 bridges built or reconstructed; 4 T. V. A. dams; 220,000 miles of rural electric lines; 1,200 new post offices, customhouses, and quarantine stations; 27,700 new low-rent dwelling units completed and 58,000 units under construction. The planting of 1,750,000,000 trees will provide beauty for our highways and protection for our soil during the fateful years ahead.

Yes, this issue of the national debt we Democrats gladly accept for 1940. We accept it confidently—knowing that the Republicans who began it with good reason cannot impeach us who carried it on with equal reason and with astonishing honesty; knowing, too, that their promises to balance the Budget will not turn into performance save under such conditions as will see the Budget balanced under us quite as soon; and knowing, finally, that while they talk theory about the Budget we shall point in 3,000 counties, 10,000 hamlets, and 50,000,000 lives to the concrete results of a policy at once profitable and just. We shall accept this issue of the debt not only with confidence based on concrete results but with the assurance born of a political inventiveness to match the necessity of the hour. For it is we who have popularized the broad fiscal theory upon which all subsequent administrations will proceed, the theory that the Federal Government must spend more and tax less when times are hard, but tax more and spend less when times are good. Through that formula America can make hard times less hard by a previously planned cushion of relief and public works, and will make good times more likely to be lasting through the safety valve for savings furnished by taxation and equalizing distribution of public revenue.

THE MORAL ISSUE

This brings us to a final matter, the moral question, which while all important should not be discussed save in connection with all else that matters. No honest man will boast of his honesty. Honesty must be taken for granted in an industrial society which rests on confidence. No kind man should boast of his humanity. Both should be taken for granted in a civilized society. But remembering the scandals of the Ohio gang under Harding, the blind Republican complacency under Coolidge, the cold lethargy to human needs of Republicans under Hoover, and remembering under each and all of them alike the Republican poverty for policy formation, we Democrats may be allowed to remark simply that with much money to spend or steal, we have spent it with not a single major scandal or suspicion of stealing; and with nearly all power we Democrats have won, through a reputation for considerateness, the Negro vote from solid Republicanism and have called down upon our head the almost reverent blessings of practically every minority group in America save the noisy Communists, the cruel Nazi, and the flatulent Fascists. We have treated aliens like the human beings they are, and shall continue to hold men innocent until proved guilty, vigilantes to the cowardly contrary nothwithstanding. This justice to the humble, justice touched with mercy, is something of which Democrats should not boast, but something which Republicans had best not fail to remark and ponder. Such is the stuff of which public morality is made: justice to the strong, mercy to the weak, honesty to all.

II. IMPLEMENTING THE ETHICS OF DEMOCRACY

Under what Mr. Roosevelt has well called, "the integrity of the morals of democracy," let us summarize now the record of our Democratic years in office. This record is the over-all issue we present. We shall approach it by way of testing the practical fruitage of the two greatest moral maxims of our time. I refer to Grover Cleveland's famous conviction, "Public office is a public trust," and to Franklin Roosevelt's far-reaching conviction that "private office is also a public trust."

Insofar as the Republicans base their claims to national office primarily upon the illusion that they are better administrators than we Democrats, they seem to approve in theory our Democratic efforts to fulfill in practice Cleveland's fine dream, the separation of administration from politics. But in practice they tried to balk, and did at first balk, our efforts through the reorganization plan to extend civil service "upward, downward, outward." They have subsequently impeded but have not as yet been able to balk, our piecemeal achievement of that objective. The four reorganization plans of Mr. Roosevelt have been approved by Congress, and a civil-service bill, passed the House against Republican opposition now faces its prospect of passage in the Senate without their aid. This Ramspeck bill will practically complete universal acceptance through Federal employment of the merit principle. Supplementing and aiding these movements are the two Hatch bills, one already law and the other on the way, making a penal offense of the violation of public trust by political employees. It is doubtful whether a party in full power has ever before voluntarily relinquished such prima facie advantages for the sake of purer politics and sounder administration. And speaking of courage and honesty combined, when did you ever hear of any other political party than the Democratic perpetrating a heavy tax increase when it was up for reelection, as we are now doing?

But private office is also a public trust, under Roosevelt. Under the guidance of these twin moral insights of Cleveland and Roosevelt, Jimmy Walker's private bank account became of public concern to the Governor of New York, named Franklin Roosevelt, the dapper Mayor went to Europe for his health, and the Tammany tiger ceased to claw. What Richard Whitney did with "his own" in connection with the stock exchange became under national Democratic leadership, the same leadership, a matter of genuine public concern; and Whitney went to Sing Sing as the S. E. C. got going to prevent other Whitneys from sucking other suckers to death. Because the private office of the banker as well as of the broker has been made into a public trust, simple honest citizens like us can now know that our bank deposits are safe and that there is some assurance this side of the blue sky that the stocks which we may buy contain something more in them than the salesman's breath or our own romantic hope.

While this long-delayed application of public morals to private business required courage, to apply the same maxim to the farmer and the factory worker took more than courage. It required imagination of a high order and sympathy of the deepest sort. Moreover, it required statesmanship to see, as Roosevelt said in his first acceptance speech, that a balance of economic opportunity for all great producing groups at the level of parity is the minimum condition for our national health.

It is no mean achievement of the Democratic Party to have convinced the Republican Party at last, at long last, of this elementry fact—at least to have convinced the program committee under Dr. Frank's enlightened leadership. "Gross disparity of income," says that committee, "between groups equally important to the Nation's life, such as agriculture and industry, requires that Government pursue policies that will help soundly to correct such disparity."

Whatever issue Republicans may seek to make of our policy toward business, toward agriculture, or toward labor—all "groups equally important to the Nation's life"—those words of their own policy committee will come back to turn the elephant's roar into blessings for the humble Democratic donkey and into condemnation for any future Republican lethargy.

Roosevelt, finding the farmer's private office to be disregarded as a public trust, made it into a public trust. There the moral has been put to actual practice through Henry Wallace's national policy for conserving the farmer's soil, for lifting his standard of life toward parity, and for giving him the right to vote upon what is much more important than the question as to which city slicker should represent him in Congress.

Roosevelt, finding the industrial laborer's private office to be disregarded as a public trust, made it into a public trust. So the National Labor Relations Act, with the Labor Board to see to it that the act does not, like so many noble Republican principles, dissipate itself in idealistic inaction. So the right of the worker to vote upon who shall represent him in collective bargaining.

Even if our agricultural program, however, did not establish the elements of agrarian democracy, which it does; and even if the Labor Act, with its indispensable Board, did not establish the elements of industrial democracy, which it does—both programs constitute pioneer efforts to treat these indispensable services of millions of men as the public trusts which they actually are. Even if these initial efforts to extend representative government—to make democracy "democ"—were riddled with error, as, no doubt, they are touched with inadequacy, they would still furnish a brave beginning without which no perfected ending can even ensue. To have achieved national policies in these neglected fields at all, lifts labor and agriculture at last from the level of stepsons to that of genuine sons of Uncle Sam. Their common sonship makes possible their final access to rights rather than leaves to them, as of old, the mere acceptance of duties. Thus full citizenship comes of age to those who toil at their indispensable offices in field and factory. Such are some of the results of Roosevelt's maxim put to use, the maxim that "private office is a public trust."

Nor does this moral maxim stop with its benefits to agriculture and labor. It applies to motherhood, to childhood, to old age, for all these are private offices requiring consideration as public trusts for the good of the Nation. Moreover, the maxim applies to business in senses more constructive than the mere correction of commercial abuses. If private business is a public trust, as of course it is, then the buinessman, big and little alike, is entitled as an indispensable servant of the Republic to purchasers with enough buying power to give him the turn-over from which alone prosperity for him can come. To purge business of its monopolistic excesses, as well as of its criminal excrescences, is good; but to help the majority of our citizens who are laborers on farm and in factory to achieve adequate purchasing power is to treat the private office of the businessman for the public trust which it actually is. Thus does justice pay dividends by making of our vast and several segments of life a seamless web. No war millionaires under Roosevelt, either. The private office of the munition makers is now in process of becoming a public trust.

Not only have we Democrats thus established new national policies for the several great producing groups of America, but we have centered these policies, as is appropriate for those who live in the light of destiny, in the moral sense of our democracy. Public and private offices are public trusts—this is a double formula which to observe transforms the mercenary motivation of a short-sighted individualism into a genuine philosophy of the common good. There is abroad once more in our land, thanks to the Democratic replenishment of these 8 years, the faith that citizenship is also a matter of morals, of duties as well as of rights. Debts which arise as a result of this new insight will themselves be taken as public trusts until they can be discharged from the earned income and morale of a national prosperity rising on the foundations of justice. This acceptance of all private offices as touched with public interest is the new imperative that is laid upon our democracy by the inexorable march of events at home and abroad. It is the final test of this Nation's fitness and of its capacity to survive.

I labor in the thought, you see, that my party, the Democratic Party, for all its fumblings and mistakes, has in 8 years of rebuilding itself, revivified also the Republican Party by furnishing it goals more generous than those to which its vision had sunk when dimmed by the corruption of Harding, by the complacency of Coolidge, by the lethargy of Hoover, and by the inventive infecundity of all that Old Guardism stands for. The larger issue, then, of 1940 is this: Shall this Nation continue, under whatever party leadership and into whatever time of testing we go, continue the energetic, the inventive, the liberal path pointed by our Democratic practice?

If under this general issue, the Republicans can make partisan profit by flicking the fly specks off our mistakes, let them do it. If they can politically advantage themselves by pecking at our peccadilloes, let them do it. If accepting our goals, they can so conceal their record in power as to convince the American people that they are better administrators of our program than we are, let them do it. I shall then smile at the American people for all its dear foibles and bequeath to the victorious Republicans this fond farewell from the Democratic Party—farewell; that is, until we meet again in 1944:

We've been the wings to bear you on your skyward journey—
The sword to cleave your bonds and set you free!
However you may conceal our sword and pinions, we shall not care,
Knowing we gave you wider skies to wander,
And of our love made freedom—not a snare!

Legion in Service

EDITORIAL FROM THE OTTUMWA (IOWA) COURIER

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Ottumwa Daily Courier, Ottumwa, Iowa, of June 10, 1940:

[From the Ottumwa (Iowa) Courier of June 10, 1940]

LEGION IN SERVICE

The American Legion realizes that it has a chance now to serve its country more than ever before. It is the duty of all members—as Americans, in the first place—to be ever watchful of the spread of subversive elements and expose them whenever possible.

As the national commander of the Legion has said, the Nation again is calling in the twenty-first year of the Legion. It is not a call to the armed forces of the country where once Legionnaires served. Rather it is a call to develop sanity to supersede hysteria; to remove all doubt about the strength of national defenses; to have each legionnaire individually willing to bear the heavy price of defense which must be paid to assure peace for the people of this country.

The Legion believes in the protection at all hazards of the free peoples of the Western Hemisphere as the primary obligation of the United States. While ill-equipped to provide even a minimum of protection for the Monroe Doctrine, the Legion commander asserts it would be idle to consider the feasibility of intervening in the conflict abroad. With what would we intervene? How would we make our potential strength felt short of 2 or 3 years?

The safety of America transcends any political issue. Such safety should not be subjected to a fear developed through hysteria. The Legion believes it is qualified from its record of service both in time of war and in 21 years of peace to counsel soberly and rationally the men and women of America. We do, too. The Legion always has been able to call the turn; it can do it again.

Saving of United States Should Consume All Our Efforts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 14, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK ENQUIRER OF JUNE 10, 1940

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Enquirer for June 10, 1940:

[From the New York Enquirer of June 10, 1940]

SAVING OF UNITED STATES SHOULD CONSUME ALL OUR EFFORTS

Entirely too much thought and effort is being given here to the problem of saving the Anglo-French Allies and entirely too little to the infinitely more important problem of saving the United States of America.

Every American is rightfully desirous of seeing the Nazi Reich laid low, but no American can in conscience desire to see Uncle Sam laid low in the process of bringing Adolf Hitler to justice. Little will it profit America to destroy Naziland and save Britain and France if in so doing this Republic is itself destroyed.

Whether we like it or not, the truth is that this Republic is now well on the way to destruction.

Congress and all others concerned should realize that this is no time for plunging and floundering and gambling in the field of foreign relationships. We need clear and loyal thinking and clear and loyal action.

OUR COUNTRY IN PERIL FROM WITHIN

Our country is in positive peril, not from without but from within.

If we stand firm at home and do our duty to the Republic, keeping it at peace and strictly neutral, no harm can befall us. This, however, is not a course which commends itself to those whose first love is not America but the empire from which America wrung her freedom eight score years ago. They want to see Britannia succored and rejuvenated by the blood of millions of slaughtered American boys and at the cost of our national existence.

Things more than ominous have taken place in our beloved land in recent days. A Washington dispatch June 6 revealed how swiftly the Republic is being conducted to disaster. It declared:

"State Department circles said the 'lid is now off,' and that this Government was prepared to give all possible aid to the Allies short of sending an expeditionary force to France."

Who has given our Government authority to extend such aid to the Anglo-French forces? Certainly not Congress, and certainly not the American people.

STEADILY STEPPING TOWARD WAR

This step means war and nothing but war. It means that without the permission of Congress, airplanes, rifles, artillery, tanks, warships, and other indispensable implements of national defense are to be handed over to Britain and France.

It means further that millions of American youths are marked for sacrifice on foreign soil.

The British and the French merit the warmest commendation for their unceasing loyalty to their own lands in all things. Who has ever heard of a member of the French or British Parliament advocating the stripping of his own country of its means of protection in order to bolster the defenses of foreign powers? Everyone who follows the debates in Congress knows that not one but many Members of both Houses are zealously advocating this very course for Uncle Sam.

WHOM CAN WE TRUST NOW?

When George Washington discovered the plot of Major General Arnold, leader of the British "fifth column" here in the War of Independence, he uttered these words of anguish:

"Whom can we trust now!"

These words of the Father of his Country have a particular appropriateness for and can be applied with telling effect to those so-called Americans who are working night and day to plunge our country into the present tournament of blood, death, and destruction now going on in Europe.

Whom can we trust now!

Not one of those who are openly clamoring or secretly plotting for war has the remotest intention of risking his own life or possessions in the death struggle wherein war would involve the Republic. They and their belongings are entirely too precious to be interfered with. The other fellows must do the bleeding and the paying.

It cannot be too often iterated that our entering the war would instantly result in the establishment of a dictatorship here whose tyrannous powers over the lives and liberties and belongings of our people would be all-embracing, a dictatorship that would inflict upon us at the very outset the exact evil against which we would have taken up arms abroad.

Another vital factor which should not be overlooked is the utter foolishness of reposing confidence in the fidelity of Britain and France as war allies of ours.

NOTHING TO LOSE BY REMAINING AT PEACE

At this very moment London and Paris are keenly suspicious of each other.

Most people never thought that the day would come when Hitler and Stalin would be allies. Yet that day has come.

And right now both England and France, despite their grandiose public beseechings of God to bless their cause, despite their perfervid avowals that they are fighting for liberty of mind and body despite the unspeakable doings of Stalin in Poland and Finland, are trying as hard as they possibly can to consummate an alliance with the tyrant of the Kremlin.

We have nothing to lose by remaining at peace. We have everything to gain by remaining at peace. Upon public action depends whether or not the war mongers in our midst will be able to involve us in war and destroy the Republic.

Americans would be false to their principles and ideals did they fail to abhor Hitlerism. They would be equally false to their principles and ideals did they allow their loathing for Hitlerism to result in the destruction of this Republic. The most deadly blow which the American people can deal Hitlerism is to prevent their country from being involved in war and subjected to certain dictatorship and certain ruin.

The Preparedness Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENJAMIN JARRETT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 14, 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE FRANKLIN (PA.) NEWS-HERALD AND OIL CITY (PA.) BLIZZARD

Mr. JARRETT. Mr. Speaker, now that the debt limit has been increased and we are going forward with the armament program, we must be careful to see that it will be carried out for the best interests of our country. The editorials from the News-Herald, Franklin, Pa., and the Oil City Blizzard, Oil City, Pa., are timely along this line, and I ask they be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Franklin (Pa.) News-Herald of June 12, 1940]

WE MUST FINANCE PREPAREDNESS

Financial preparedness is the basis upon which military strength must be built and maintained. Without measures of financial preparedness there can be no assured national security.

The national debt has reached such proportions that it threatens the welfare of every person in the United States. It must be kept in control by rigorous reduction in Federal expenditures for every purpose that cannot be affirmatively shown to be essential at a time when the whole country is asked to make new sacrifices for national defense.

There should be no tolerance of any attempt at evasion of such economies.

No opportunity should be open to transfer unnecessary expenses to new national debt voted for meeting the costs of national defense. The proceeds of new taxes to meet the costs of an enlarged program of national defense should be definitely and unequivocally assigned to speedy retirement of this additional debt. Discretion as to the application of these revenues should be left to no one.

Every measure of preparedness, whether financial or in any other field, should have as its purpose the rebuilding of belief in individual endeavor and thrift, of confidence that savings can be protected and will bring a just return, and of ability to make certain provision for individual security.

These are the elements which, with adequate national defense, will give a national security that cannot be shaken.

[From the Oil City (Pa.) Blizzard]

UNITED FOR DEFENSE

The present program of the United States for national defense envisions the largest peacetime military expenditures in our history. Over a period of a few years, spending for defense is to be progessively increased, and the total will run far into the billions.

There can be no question of our need for the world's greatest defense system. But it will be a disastrous mistake if we adopt a hysterical, "never mind the cost" attitude. Some of the billions for defense must be secured by reducing or eliminating the appropriations for other less important Government activities.

All the energies of this great country must be directed toward making it secure from invasion. To release those energies requires rededicating this Nation to the ideals envisioned by the founding fathers.

High-sounding phrases aren't enough. Preparation against the possibility of invasion is a grim and costly business. Never in the history of our country was it so important for government to cooperate with individual enterprise or for individual enterprise to cooperate with government. Never was it so important to eliminate waste in government, in individual enterprise, and in family life in order to perpetuate liberty and opportunity.

Arming for Peace in a World at War—Congress Should Keep at Its Post

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, America faces a crisis. We cannot escape our responsibilities as one of the family of nations. We cannot isolate ourselves from the rest of the world. However, we must not overlook the fact that those of us here in the Congress have given a solemn oath that we will defend and protect our own country. Whatever we do must be done with that obligation uppermost. Unfortunately we are unprepared by reason of the dissipation of our finances and the failure to provide national defenses The Congress has very wisely, in my judgment, been given the power by the Constitution to raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to provide for organizing an army and disciplining the militia, to levy taxes, and to appropriate money, and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers. This is a constitutional function, vested in the Congress to provide for the national defense. It cannot be delegated. Under this power whatever is done to provide for the common defense of our country in this tragic hour must be done by the Congress. It cannot shirk its responsibilities. It should not desert its post of duty in a time such as this, when the very existence of our Nation may be at stake.

Fortunately the United States has a good Navy. However, in the event of war involving continental United States, or our outlying possessions, or the Monroe Doctrine, the Navy, excellent as it is, would face a heavy burden. Admiral Stark, speaking of the Navy, said that if the ships which we have under contemplation were completed within the next few years, taking into consideration the building programs of other nations, we probably could defend the Hawaiian Islands and Alaska, and the Canal and the coasts of the United States, the Gulf and the Caribbean, but that it would not be a tight defense.

The Washington Post, in an editorial today, gave a timely warning, saying:

OUR BIG JOB

Senator Wheeler's warning that he would break with the Democratic Party if it is "going to be a war party" came in the midst of a debate in which the President was severely criticized for provocative statements deemed likely to involve this country in war.

Certain extreme assertions made on the floor of the Senate should be discounted as intended for political effect. But no such charge can be brought against Senator WHEELER, who but recently indicated his belief that President Roosevelt would be renominated and would accept the nomination.

Senator TYDINGS certainly has no personal axe to grind in warning the country that before we begin to talk about war, we should be equipped to go to war. "Our big job," he rightly says, "is to get ready for national defense." That is a simple statement of our major objective which some people seem in danger of forgetting.

Warnings from outstanding Democrats of the caliber of Messrs. WHEELER and TYDINGS cannot be lightly dismissed. To urge restraint in utterance at this time does not imply lack of sympathy with the nations fighting for preservation of their democratic institutions. Nor does it brand the critic of indiscreet utterances or acts as a short-sighted isolationist.

It merely shows an understanding of the dangerous folly of a type of loud speaking that provides an excuse for hostility toward us without in the least benefiting those whom we wish to aid.

I call attention to an editorial appearing in the Washington News of June 12, 1940, discussing the adjournment issue. The editorial follows:

IF THEY VOTE TO GO HOME, VOTE TO KEEP THEM THERE

Within a few days Congress may be called upon to cast the most important vote of 20 years.

That will happen if administration leaders persist in their effort to force an adjournment.

Any Congressman who does vote to adjourn and go home should be commanded by his constituents to remain at home.

Any elected representative of the people who is so insensible of his constitutional obligations that he would voluntarily abandon his post at a time like this is, we believe, unfit for the responsibility of service in Congress.

The terrible conflict in Europe goes rapidly from bad to worse. Any day may bring the need for fateful decisions involving our Nation's peace and security. Borrowed billions have been laid on the line for rearmament. But to turn dollars into weapons in the quantities needed, old industries will have to be invigorated and new ones created. Only Congress can do what is necessary to mobilize idle capital and manpower for this supreme task.

Overnight it may become not a matter for academic debate but an imperative necessity to order compulsory military training and conscript men for defense duty. Congress alone has that power and responsibility.

Our Government has operated in the red through 11 years of apparent peace and security. Confronted now with need for gigantic new defense expenditures, nothing substantial has been done to weed out old wastes, and the only tax proposal yet made won't even balance the nonmilitary outgo. Congress is the Nation's fiscal guardian.

Yet it is suggested that Congress pack up and go home. It is suggested that if an "emergency" should arise the President will summon Congress back to a special session—a procedure which requires several days in a period where there may be no day to spare. Incidentally, an adjournment and a special session summons would mean that the lawmakers would be legally entitled to collect travel allowance, at 20 cents a mile, to their homes and back to Washington. No such allowances are legal if Congress merely recesses a few days at a time through the summer. We would accuse no Congressman of wanting to be a mileage patrioteer.

But we repeat that any who votes to go home at a time like this ought to be made to stay there—and very probably will be.

The Christian Science Monitor, in its issue of June 12, had the following to say with respect to the duty of Congress in this emergency. The editorial reads:

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY

A President of the United States usually finds it more comfortable to work without having Congress around. Hence, the view expressed by Mr. Roosevelt that the legislative Houses could suitably finish up their work within the next 2 weeks and adjourn represents a natural wish on his part.

Yet there are other and more compelling reasons why Congress ought to stay in session. The war emergency, it is true, calls for a great deal of freedom of Executive action—the Senate's 80-to-0 passage of the Army expansion bill indicates a disposition to grant this. But this same critical situation calls, too, for quick marshaling and formulation of public opinion on questions that may arise suddenly, as has the issue of immediate aid to the Allies. For this purpose and as a matter of maintaining national unity, Congress is a useful sounding board.

It may be admitted that some of the sound so generated will be of a partisan nature. A portion even of the demand for continuance in session may be discounted as opposition strategy. But after such allowances are made, it is to be remembered that several major pieces of legislation are yet in the course of passage, some of which require a good deal of discussion, and that since this is the second year of the Seventy-sixth Congress, these bills would expire and have to start all over from the beginning in the Congress which is to be elected this year.

Among such measures, the Ramspeck civil-service extension bill, the amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, and the Logan-Walter bill on administrative law have passed the House of Representatives but not the Senate. On its part the Senate has passed the extension of the Hatch Act against pernicious politics, the equalization of tax payments by T. V. A., and the proposal to end purchases of foreign silver, but these await action by the House. In conference is the bill laboriously worked out to improve the situation of the railroads. While it may be assumed that the new tax bill, increase of the debt limit, and military, naval, and relief appropriations will be enacted, there is yet a body of domestic legislation deserving attention.

Members of the House and Senate are thinking partly, of course, of the exigencies of campaign year and of the importance of getting reelected. These considerations cannot wholly be brushed aside, but to their clamor there are two replies. One is that a great deal of time yet remains for campaigning, and would be available in recesses even if Congress should stay convened well into the summer. The other is that voters must appreciate the loyalty of a Congressman who stuck usefully to his post and would surely reward him as against a rival for his job.

Rather than seek a hasty adjournment for political convenience. Congress will do well to stay in session and to give the Nation the reassurance of its presence in Washington for any emergency.

Mr. Speaker, the unpreparedness of America today to face a military conflict is appalling. Fortunately, the Congress almost unanimously has realized this predicament and has authorized all expenditures recommended by the Chiefs of Staff of our Army, Navy, and Air Corps to remedy this defect. However, it will take much time to put such a program into effect. Our colleague from Mississippi, the Honorable Ross COLLINS, recently on the floor of the House called attention to our unpreparedness, saying:

Goodness knows what we can do with World War left-overs in a war like the one now going on in Europe. The $200,000,000 worth of saddles and bridles that the War Department had left over are still in our midst and can only be used in a wild-West show or a Fort Myer society circus—not in a modern war. * * *

All that could be done with large numbers of mobilized men at this time would be to arm a few of them with out-of-date rifles. And, strange as it may seem to aging generals, the war going on in Europe has not been a rifle war.

The cream of the crop of man power would be called up and enlisted at the outbreak of the struggle and they would be the ones who would go into battle equipped the worst. It is an admitted fact that there exists a distinct lack of modern tanks, combat cars, and modern mechanized weapons.

And after the flower of our youth had laid down their lives, and if the war lasted long enough, we might ultimately get around to equipping our armed forces with something like what a sensible bandit would use to rob a filling station. * * *

I think very little of an army implemented with rifles, no matter how well its blue uniforms fit and no matter how well it can execute the ceremonies of the parade ground. Ziegfeld could have taught an army like that much better than the ordinary Army officer, for he knew more about it.

Further, I can't imagine anything more tragic than nicely trained marching men in front of machine-gun fire, much less 60-ton armored tanks, flame-throwing land battleships, and diving airplanes.

China, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium were some of the nations that prepared for war according to the obsolete 1914 plans.

Mr. Speaker, last evening I discussed to some extent our national defense and a program of arming for peace in a world at war, over the Mutual Broadcasting System's coast-to-coast network. I ask permission, as a part of my remarks, to include that discussion. It follows:

ARMING FOR PEACE IN A WORLD AT WAR

Men and women of America, I am speaking to you from our Nation's Capital. The mantle of night has fallen over this beautiful city, one of the world's most lovely capitals. This is a hallowed place, rich in history and sacred memories. Down the old Potomac River a little way from here, on the slopes of Mt. Vernon, sleeps George Washington, the Father of our Country, who gave us our Nation a century and a half ago. Only a few squares from where I am now standing is reverently preserved the hallowed spot where the spirit of Abraham Lincoln took its leave of earth "with malice toward none, with charity for all," as that great soul paid the supreme sacrifice that our Nation might be preserved. Hard by is the old New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, with Lincoln's pew lovingly preserved just as he left it, to which Lincoln would steal away in the harrowing days of the Civil War to seek guidance from the Father of us all. It fell to the lot of these two stalwart Americans to guide this Nation through the anguish and trials of long and bitter wars. Had they failed there would be no Nation of free men here today.

Tonight all is quiet and peaceful here beside the Potomac, where these great men wrought, lived, and died. The brilliant neon lights flood the thoroughfares of the city. We are at peace. But out on the air waves encircling the earth come, by the magic of radio, the tragic messages of the black-out of the capitals of Europe and the ravages of war, bringing death and destruction, an awesome thing as the "wreck of matter and crash of worlds." We who represent you here in the Congress cannot do aught but compare the peaceful scenes here and the tragedy of war over there. You and I cannot but ponder what is our duty to America in this world crisis. Our first duty is to our own country. We in the Congress have taken a solemn oath to preserve and defend it.

The great heart of America beats in sympathy for these suffering peoples of Europe. We want to help them. We want to and are giving them material aid in their great extremity so far as lies within our power without committing acts of war ourselves or stripping ourselves of our own defenses. We want the peace we enjoy to come again to the whole war-torn world. The United States is at peace with all the world. We Americans are a peace-loving nation. I pray God we may remain forever at peace. The Congress wants America to keep out of the war. Our fixed determination is to remain at peace with all the world. We know that we are best equipped to preserve our peace if we are adequately armed to defend it. George Washington, speaking to the Congress in 1790, said:

"To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace."

With the ominous developments in Europe, with nation after nation being crushed into submission by the engines of war, we have been forced to make an appraisal of our own defenses. We in the Congress, for the time being, are the guardians of your peace. We have been aroused and shocked to learn that our armaments are wholly inadequate. The Military and Naval Affairs Committees of the Congress called before them the Chiefs of Staff of the Army, Navy, and Air Forces. This investigation disclosed that our National Guard is only partially equipped, we are lacking in modern rifles, large and motorized guns, tanks, and anti-tank guns, armored cars, and munitions of all types. We can only equip a force of 75,000 men in the Regular Army, which would be deficient in mobile guns. We have not built a 16-inch gun in 20 years and have just launched the first battleship in 19 years. We need air and naval bases and all types of modern aircraft. We have 2,700 airplanes in the Army, and 1,800 in the Navy. The Congress is now authorizing 10,000 and the President said we should have 50,000. Our air force is miserably weak, not only in aircraft but in our capacity to produce them. We are in no position, from a military standpoint, to become embroiled in a foreign war. Sound judgment dictates that we move cautiously and look well to our own defenses in this tragic hour of world crisis. It will require the courage, self-sacrifice, and unswerving loyalty of every American to meet the test that confronts us. The hour has come to prove that the American way is sound and not wanting and will save our democracy.

The European war has demonstrated the absolute need of modern implements of war, if we are to defend America. Fighting spirit and the will to do or die is not enough. The armored cars, monster tanks, and diving bombers, which wrought havoc in the Low Countries, leaving only death and desolation in their wake, have opened our eyes to our own lack of defenses against modern war engines of death.

We must defend on the sea and under it, on the land and over it. The Congress will appropriate all the money necessary for defense. Money alone will not provide our defenses. Our huge gold hoard is only a pile of idle metal, already spent. We must transform by machines and manpower our raw materials into guns, airplanes, ships, and tanks. This means complete mobilization of every resource of our Nation, manpower and property. You and I and every loyal American must join hands to do the job. Personal welfare must be subordinated to the welfare of our country. There must be teamwork. There will be no room here for dissension or partisan politics. The men and women engaged in this enterprise are working in the common defense of our country as much as those who man the guns on the battle front. Time is of the essence now. We must act today, not tomorrow or the next day. England and France debated and delayed. They quibbled while their enemies armed. Today they are paying the price in blood and treasure. They arrived "too late with too little." Let us profit by their experience.

National defense means far-flung national borders and out-lying possessions. It means the Monroe Doctrine and barring foreign footholds in the Western Hemisphere. We are arming for defense and peace in a world at war. We are not arming to fight an enemy but to defend against every enemy. We have no enemies, and if we keep our heads and mind our own business we will have no enemies. If Congress has its way, we will keep out of foreign entanglements. Our defenses must build barriers against invasion by any foreign foe.

There is an enemy, however, as dangerous to our security as any foreign foe which we must not overlook, a sinister foe already within our gates. We have seen nation after nation in the Old World crumple and succumb to the attacks of invading armies by reason of treachery and perfidy within their own ranks. This treason from within, inside jobs, termites undermining the foundations of government, has come to be known as the "fifth column" and Trojan horses. The Dies committee of the Congress has uncovered these traitors to our own country, entrenched within our own borders, boring from within. Many of them occupy key positions in our industries and shipping, even in our own Government itself.

In the event of war they will be under orders from abroad, amply financed, and ready to aid the enemy in wrecking our defense plans. They have even invaded the sacred precincts of our schools and youth organizations. The Congress is determined that, cost what it may, we will not be swerved from our course to run down and stamp out these subversive groups, who are spreading propaganda and the poison of disloyalty among our own citizens. All of us who love America should join hands in this common cause to completely eradicate this most dangerous element which threatens the very foundations of our Nation. The "fifth column" is organized, effective, and at work. It is your job and mine to organize our own forces and help destroy this "fifth column" by reporting any subversive activities to the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

This program to arm America for defense and peace will cost in the next fiscal year from five to six billion dollars. This will be only the first costs. The first essential in national defense is a sound financial program. Unfortunately we face these huge expenditures for national defense with an empty treasury. For 8 years we have been mortgaging the future and spending some $3,000,000,000 a year more than we received, a grand total of sixty-five billions. We have spent over six billions in the last 6 years for defense. We have not much to show for it. The Congress wants to know, and you who furnish the tax dollars are entitled to know where this money has gone. We want to be assured the huge funds now being appropriated for national defense will be spent for national defense and nothing else. This is the duty of the Congress. We have been a spendthrift Nation. We have wasted our substance, dissipated our reserves in times of peace. We have reached our debt limitation of forty-five billions. Now when a crisis overtakes us, which may endanger our very existence, we find our war chest empty. In this dilemma we are confronted with only three courses:

1. Embark on a course of inflation which means national bankruptcy.

2. Raise the debt limitation and borrow for defense, and pass the whole mess, plus the forty-five billion deficit, along to our children to pay; that, too, leads direct to the cemetery for defunct nations.

3. Revamp the whole tax structure, broadening the base, imposing additional taxes, capturing war profits; there must be no new crop of war millionaires coming out of this enterprise; and make drastic retrenchments in governmental expenditures for bureaus and projects which can be curtailed, and thus eliminate wasteful spending; this offers a way out.

Congress alone can enact this plan into law. It should keep in session until it has finished this task. It should not desert in time of trial. With Congress adjourned, only one man elected by the people is here in Washington to protect 133,000,000 Americans, you, my fellow countrymen. This is not a one-man Government. The Members of the Congress represent the people of their several districts as well as the Nation at large. There is an attempt to "shell shock" the Congress so it will sign some blank checks, delegate its legislative powers to the Executive, abdicate and go home.

The President said, May 16: "The Congress and the Chief Executive constitute a team where the defense of the land is concerned." A team can work only if pulling together. If one member of this team, the Congress, is unhitched and sent home, it leaves only a "one-horse team" on the job.

Here in Washington a "blitzkrieg" of jitters, "nerves," war hysteria, and propaganda is being waged against the Congress. The President says the Congress should adjourn. But this is no time to be rushed off our feet. Rather it is a time for calm judgment, clear thinking, and deliberate action to prepare the defenses of America for peace, not for war. We are not at war. With Congress in session we may not be stampeded into war through the back door. The President has asked Congress to grant him wartime powers to order the National Guard into service. He already has power to call out the guard for local service but not for foreign assignments. In peacetimes the National Guard should not become a part of the regular armed forces. It is a citizens' emergency force, men with families and responsibility. The Congress can grant this power when and if it becomes necessary. It would be a dangerous move to lodge such power in the hands of one man in times of peace, involving the welfare of 230,000 citizens and their families. If we must surrender our constitutional liberties of representative government in order to prepare for national defense, we are already defeated and there will be no need for defenses. The Congress in session can meet these problems as they arise.

Our goal is to protect America. To do so we must put America back to work on private pay rolls. We must put a stop to profligate spending and flirting with bankruptcy. The American people demand that we provide immediately strong modern defenses to repel any attack from any source, and that we keep out of war. For this I am sure we will all shoulder our full share of the burden in taxes within our abilities to pay.

Such a program gives rise to many problems. The Congress should stay at its post until the crisis is over. It cannot abdicate. No one under the law can lawfully assume its responsibilities. The President can only carry into effect such laws as the Congress enacts. The Congress alone has the power to legislate for the common defense, the President alone the power to enforce the laws the Congress makes. Such a course offers the best assurance that America will be preserved and will maintain peace with all the world.

God bless America!

Legion Editor Requests the Strange Story Behind the Group Now Trying To Put America Into the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, Frank Miles, editor of the Iowa Legionnaire, is one of the country's great patriots, a splendid citizen, and a close personal friend of mine. I, therefore, call to the attention of the House the following newspaper article containing an Associated Press dispatch wherein Frank Miles asks those misguided patriots some very fair questions.

Frank Miles is an ex-soldier who knows what war means. It is not just a subject for parlor conversation and pink-tea patriotism with him. Hence, he rightfully inquires about the ages and motives of this group who are making an organized effort to put this country into war and from whose well-filled coffers flows an apparently abundant supply of money with which to buy full-page advertisements for war in the big eastern newspapers and with which to propagandize Congress in behalf of our entry into war. After the newspaper statement by Mr. Miles you will find the information concerning the ages of most of this group since I have had the Congressional Reference Library supply me with these data so these interesting questions can be fairly and fully answered. Still to be determined, of course, is the source of the vast sums of money which this committee, the Committee To Defend America by Aiding the Allies, and other groups are getting and spending in this unholy program.

LEGION EDITOR ASKS QUESTIONS OF GROUP—EACH OF 30 WHO URGED UNITED STATES ENTRANCE INTO WAR WAS ASKED IF HE WOULD FIGHT

DES MOINES, Iowa, June 11.—Frank Miles, editor of the Iowa Legionnaire, has sent letters to the 30 American business and professional men who urged this country's entrance into the war on the side of the Allies, asking:

"What fighting did you do in the last war?"

Miles' letter continued, in part:

"Are you now of an age and of physical and mental fitness which would enable you to do military service?

"If you could not be in our armed forces, how many of your own sons would be?

"If we go to war now, what would you have our men fight with?

"Kindly reply by return mail."

The 30 educators, lawyers, writers, and businessmen advocated United States entrance in the war in a statement they issued Sunday night. The Iowa Legionnaire is the official publication of the State department of the American Legion.

THE STARTLING STORY OF THE "SAFE AGE" PATRIOTS

Mr. Speaker, from the Washington Post of June 10, page 2, I have secured the names and addresses of the 30 leaders who are now openly urging this country to send its boys to fight on foreign battlefields. Back of each man's name and address is his year of birth, insofar as these men were prominent enough to have their ages recorded in any of the standard books of reference available in the Congressional Library. These ages reveal the startlingly safe ages of these superpatriots. With due deference to maturity, it will be noticed that only one of the group was born during the current century—all the rest are presumably "too old to fight" but not too wise to urge young men to "make the sacrifice." Such shallow manifestations of good citizenship should be exposed, and I am grateful to Frank Miles for his courage in calling this to the attention of Americans generally.

It might well be added that every man on this list, if his sense of patriotism exceeds the point of trying to get other men to die for "their country" can, today, take a train for Canada and enlist in the Canadian Army—there are no statutes preventing this act on their parts. Or, if these superpatriots want to get out of the "swivel-chair classification" they can go to New York and volunteer as ambulance drivers for the American Red Cross, a most worthy occupation. In either event they would be in better taste than sitting in the safety of their own homes—protected by age classifications guaranteeing them immunity from the draft—and trying to force a peaceful Nation into a war for which it is unprepared and which is taking place 3,000 miles away on the age-old battlefields of a European continent soaked red with the perpetual wars of centuries.

Mr. Speaker, here is this strange list:

Stacey May, New York City (born 1896).

William H. Standley, New York City (1872).

Stringfellow Barr, president, St. Johns College (1897).

Herbert Agar, Louisville, Ky. (1897).

Frank R. Kent, Baltimore (1877).

Edward T. Gushee, Louisville, Ky. (age not available).

LeRoy Hodges, comptroller, State of Virginia (1888).

James F. Curtis, New York City attorney (1878).

Walter Mills, New York City, author of The Road to War (age not available).

J. Douglas Brown, Princeton University (1898).

George Watts Hill, Durham, N. C., big-business man (1901)—as the only member of the committee known to be born during the current century, he should start for Canada tomorrow.

Henry Wise Hobson, bishop of Episcopal Church, Cincinnati, Ohio (1891) (wonder if he has forgotten the fifth commandment).

Francis P. Miller, Fairfax, Va. (age not available).

Burke Baker, Houston, Tex. (age unknown).

John Balderston, author, Beverley Hills, Calif. (1889).

Richard F. Cleveland, Baltimore, Md. (age not available) (son of President Cleveland).

Edwin F. Gay, economist, Pasadena, Calif. (1867).

William H. Hessler, editor, Cincinnati, Ohio (age not available).

Calvin Hoover, college professor, Duke University (1897).

Edwin P. Hubble, astronomer, Santa Monica, Calif. (1889).

Edward R. Lewis, attorney, Chicago, Ill. (age not available).

George W. Martin, attorney, New York City (age not available).

L. Randolph Mason, attorney, New York City (1886).

Helen Hill Miller, secretary, National Policy Committee (age unknown).

George Fort Milton, editor, Chattanooga, Tenn. (1894).

Lewis Mumford, editor, Amenia, N. Y. (1895).

Winfield W. Reifler, college professor, Princeton University (1897).

Whitney H. Sheppardson, writer, New York City (1890).

William Waller, attorney, Nashville, Tenn. (age not available).

SAME UNIQUE AGE RATIO HOLDS FOR OTHER GROUPS URGING WAR

An analysis of the ages of the members of the Committee To Defend America by Aiding the Allies, of which William Allen White of Kansas, born 1868, is chairman, and which has also had its hand in the business of carrying full-page advertisements urging citizens to write their Congressmen pro-war letters and adding to the war hysteria in this country, reveals the same unique age ratio; most of them were born well before 1900, most of them are too old to fight, all of them seem too cautious, because none of them is volunteering in Canada, where they could be used, nor volunteering to drive ambulances for the American Red Cross, where they could be effective. Gentlemen, it is time to call a halt to war mongering in America and to settle down to mending our own defenses and keeping America American. Frank Miles deserves the gratitude of the American people for his efforts to expose the background of the groups trying to disrupt the peace of America. Regardless of their noble intentions, these groups are rendering a great disservice to the peace and progress of our Nation.

My Criticism of the National Defense Revenue Bill for 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, during the past few weeks my mail has shown an overwhelming and patriotic endorsement of the policy of paying for national defense through increased taxation, and also, my mail has shown a very much appreciated endorsement of the efforts of my committee to make our national defenses adequate for our needs. These letters have been most welcome and helpful.

My committee assignment in Congress is to the Committee on Military Affairs and my time is given over in great measure to the study of the needs of our national-defense structure and to the building up of our national defenses.

It is interesting to know that the materials, supplies, munitions, and armaments for which appropriations are now being made and contracts let, cannot possibly be brought into existence in time for use for many months and even some years ahead. Some of the simpler items may be available for use 1 year from now. But actual production of most of the items will require from 2 to 3 years. In other words, all planning in the field of national defense, as well as all planning for payment therefor, must be done far in advance of prospective needs.

In our great rush for preparedness we must not forget that a balanced domestic economy is the most important single factor for us to strive for. By now we are all well aware of the fact that a balanced domestic economy cannot be quickly attained without vigorous effort and genuine determination. Most certainly it cannot be attained unless the administration has the desire to attain it.

The profligate spending of the past 10 years by the Federal Government has placed our Nation in a very awkward position just at the time we are called upon to launch a far-reaching program of building up our national defenses. Even without the present need for huge expenditures for national defense our domestic economy has been so unstable as to speed us year by year to an all-time record national debt and to fiscal disaster. Now we find it necessary to undertake an additional burden which in and of itself will strain our Government to its utmost. We are therefore facing the greatest challenge of our national existence—a challenge that requires the curtailment of every possible nondefense expenditure and the increase of revenues for defense so that we may acquire adequate national defense without accelerating our mad rush to bankruptcy.

I have therefore looked upon the development of the revenue bill of 1940 with special interest. So far as it enables us to build our defenses without delay and without undue danger to our national economy the measure is entitled to wholehearted support. Just as certainly, however, this measure should be viewed critically regarding any portion of it that departs from sound economy. In my opinion, the study of the measure should have been most thorough and far-reaching notwithstanding the urgent need for speed in providing funds for national defense.

The revenue bill of 1940 that passed the House of Representatives Tuesday, June 11, established a record for the brief time required for its passage. The brevity of time for its consideration was quite conspicuous, both before the committee and on the floor of the House. Inasmuch as I am not on the committee that had this measure under consideration, I can speak more fully with reference to the brevity of time given to its consideration on the floor of the House.

We were told Monday evening about 5 o'clock that committee prints of the bill were just then available and, of course, we immediately started our study of the bill in preparation for its consideration the next day. We were told also that there would be 1 hour of debate on the rule and 6 hours of general debate on the bill itself—all of which would take place next day, and that the bill itself would be put to a vote of the House before adjournment Tuesday evening. The rule was a closed rule, more so than almost any rule that has come before the House throughout the Seventy-sixth Congress. For example, the rule provided that "no amendment shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means" and also "amendments offered by the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means may be offered to any section of the bill at the conclusion of general debate but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment."

In other words, we were placed entirely under the control of the administration-controlled Committee on Ways and Means. This situation is of particular importance in view of the provisions of the revenue bill itself.

The revenue bill provides for the raising of an estimated additional revenue in the sum of $1,004,000,000 per year for a period of 5 years. On the raising of such revenue there was very little disagreement in the entire House of Representatives. But the bill contained also a provision to increase the national indebtedness by $4,000,000,000 above the present limit of $45,000,000,000. The bill provided furthermore that revenues derived from obligations issued from this authorization shall be available to meet any expenditures made after June 30, 1940, for the national defense. This provision appears innocent enough until its real meaning is determined. The real issue so cleverly concealed in the bill is that all national-defense expenditures shall come out of either the increased revenue from taxation or out of the $4,000,000,000 increase in our national indebtedness, thereby relieving the Budget for Federal spending in every other department of Government of even the slightest responsibility for the regular and ordinary expenditures for national defense. In other words, under the guise of providing for the national defense, the present national administration has slipped out from providing for the ordinary expenditures for national defense out of revenues heretofore chargeable with that responsibility, and the wild nondefense spending can now proceed without incurring such deficits as have accumulated in recent years. This is important to the spenders in view of the fact that the Federal Government is rapidly reaching the $45,000,000,000 debt limit.

It seems to me that honesty in dealing with the taxpayers would have required that the Government not dip into the $4,000,000,000 increase in our national debt and the $1,004,000,000 per annum additional revenue except for extraordinary expenditures for national defense. If this bill had so provided it would then have been necessary for this administration to curtail its extravagant expenditures in other fields, and I am sure that that curtailment in such expenditures is more important today than any other problem facing our Nation in the building up of our national defenses. I am sure also that public opinion would have heartily endorsed such curtailment in the Federal Government's orgy of spending. Inasmuch as such a restriction would have curtailed expenditures for nondefense purposes by nearly $2,000,000,000 per year, and inasmuch as that would have been a painful restriction for the spenders, the opportunity to side-step this restriction under the guise of national defense and by means of clever manipulation of the rules of procedure in the House of Representatives was too great to expect the present national administration to resist the temptation to blunder ahead to disaster in its spending program. I am amazed at the consistency of the present national administration in thus cleverly achieving its goal of increased profligate spending, and I strongly condemn the administration for doing this under the guise of national defense, and also for even desiring to continue its wild nondefense spending orgy in the face of our speeding to financial disaster.

I voted for the revenue bill notwithstanding these serious objections because I did not wish to impede the imperative augmentation of our national defenses. The fact that the augmentation of our national defenses is so imperative enabled the present national administration to force this bill to passage, including as it does, an increase of funds made available for nondefense spending in the sum of approximately $2,000,000,000 per annum.

I cannot help but feel that such continued wild nondefense spending by the present national administration will be vigorously condemned by the American public when the foregoing facts become known to them.

If Congress Votes To Go Home, the People Should Vote To Keep Them There

EDITORIAL FROM THE INDIANAPOLIS TIMES

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a very illuminating editorial which appeared in the Indianapolis Times, of Indianapolis, Ind., on the 12th day of June 1940. I am in hearty accord with this editorial, and I am convinced it is far safer for the Congress to remain in session during these critical times. The editorial follows:

[From the Indianapolis Times of June 12, 1940]

IF THEY VOTE TO GO HOME, VOTE TO KEEP THEM THERE

Within a few days Congress may be called upon to cast the most important vote of 20 years.

That will happen if administration leaders persist in their effort to force an adjournment.

Any Congressman who does vote to adjourn and go home should be commanded by his constituents to remain at home.

Any elected representative of the people who is so insensible of his constitutional obligations that he would voluntarily abandon his post at a time like this is, we believe, unfit for the responsibility of service in Congress.

The terrible conflict in Europe goes rapidly from bad to worse. Any day may bring the need for fateful decisions involving our Nation's peace and security. Borrowed billions have been laid on the line for rearmament. But to turn dollars into weapons in the quantities needed, old industries will have to be invigorated and new ones created. Only Congress can do what is necessary to mobilize idle capital and manpower for this supreme task.

Overnight it may become, not a matter for academic debate, but an imperative necessity to order compulsory military training and conscript men for defense duty. Congress alone has that power and responsibility.

Our Government has operated in the red through 11 years of apparent peace and security. Confronted now with need for gigantic new defense expenditures, nothing substantial has been done to weed out old wastes, and the only tax proposal yet made won't even balance the nonmilitary outgo.

Congress is the Nation's fiscal guardian. Yet it is suggested that Congress pack up and go home. It is suggested that, if an "emergency" should arise, the President will summon Congress back to a special session—a procedure which requires several days in a period where there may be no day to spare.

We repeat that any who vote to go home at a time like this ought to be made to stay there—and very probably will be.

Second-Class Mail Matter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON A. ROMJUE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, as an extension of my remarks, I herewith include an article printed in the Philadelphia Inquirer of Philadelphia, Pa., under date of February 1, 1940, an article making an analysis relative to second-class mail. The article is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of February 1, 1940]

TAKE SECOND-CLASS MAIL OFF THE DOLE

It is about time American taxpayers were relieved of footing the stupendous postage bills of magazines and newspapers.

The publishing business, generally speaking, is not a charitable institution. Its object is to make money. It can stand on its own feet and pay its own way.

But in Uncle Sam's mails it is on the dole—and has been there for 89 years.

The Inquirer believes newspapers and magazines have been on the postal relief rolls entirely too long and that they ought to get off.

Publishers would get sore if it were suggested that they ask the Federal Treasury for a straight hand-out of public cash to meet their pay rolls.

But they don't grow hot with indignation when the Post Office Department carries their thousands of tons of second-class mail on what amounts to a gigantic Government subsidy.

They publish self-righteous denunciations of tax-financed bounties for farmers, bounties for shippers, bounties for industrialists, bounties for this, that, and the other.

But all the time they are accepting, as a matter of course, a whopping bounty for themselves.

The brutal fact is that in the fiscal year ending last June 30 the United States Government had to pay out $87,264,126.47 more than it received to transport and deliver the second-class mail, in considerable part magazines and newspapers.

That the Post Office Department, according to Postmaster General Farley's annual report, wound up with a deficit of only $38,691,862.90 was no credit to the publishers. Postal revenue from first-class mail cut down the losses on the newspapers, magazines, and other matter.

If the publishers had paid their own way in the mails, not only would there have been no postal deficit: there would have been money left over to defray the cost of the Congressmen's free mailing privilege, free mail for the blind, and the postage of official Government agencies.

Of the more than $87,000,000 worth of red ink in second-class mail delivery, daily newspapers contributed $27,000,000; newspapers other than daily, $14,000,000; magazines of all kinds, $26,000,000; publications put out by religious, educational, and scientific organizations, $13,000,000; county newspapers delivered free within the county, $7,600,000.

It is an impressive list of postage chiselers.

Why don't they hold up their end of postal costs? Technically, the reason is amazingly simple. The average postal rate on second-class matter that costs the Government approximately 8.41 cents a pound to carry and deliver is only about 1.8 cents, or a deficiency of 6.6 cents per pound.

When it is remembered that this second-class mail runs to more than 1,300,000,000 pounds a year it can readily be understood that a loss of 6.6 cents a pound piles up an astronomical deficit.

And why isn't the newspaper and magazine per-pound postage rate high enough to let the mails break even? Because every time there is an attempt to raise the rates the publishers yell bloody murder, and go on the warpath for the Congressmen who would dare wipe out this second-class mail racket.

It all started back in 1851, in the days of President Fillmore, when Congress got the idea that a wider distribution of printed matter would be a good thing for the country. So the postal rate on newspapers and magazines was set attractively low.

The principle was excellent, at that time, and resulted in relatively huge national circulations of papers and magazines.

But now, with Congress trying to cut costs, and the people weighed down by taxes, deficit-producing postal rates are a costly and discriminatory burden.

The postage loss on second-class mail, figured down to a Philadelphia basis, means that Uncle Sam went in the hole to the extent of almost $8,500,000 on the more than 128,000,000 pounds of papers, magazines, and other publications that passed out of this city last year.

But Jim Farley's Department "takes it on the chin" in more ways than this. Some publishers, not content with the already starvation rates on second-class mail, pack their papers, magazines, or what have you in mail bags and ship them by freight to distant focal points for distribution.

This is cheaper than mailing the publications from Philadelphia, or wherever they originate, to remote destinations. It makes possible a considerable saving in the case of magazines having large and far-flung circulations.

But the mail bags, loaned by the Government to publishers for sending second-class matter by freight, wear out. New ones cost money—from 80 cents to around a dollar apiece. And who stands this loss? Uncle Sam, of course.

Why should the Government lend mail bags to publishers in order to "gyp" itself out of money both going and coming? That is only one more puzzle growing out of this second-class mail hocus-pocus.

If permitting the use of mail bags for the freight transport of publications is good business on the part of the Post Office Department, harassed by postal deficits, the fact is not easily perceptible. As for the ethics of it, there may be cause for eyebrow lifting.

The Inquirer believes that magazines and newspapers have no right whatsoever to foist their second-class postage costs upon the taxpayers and the users of first-class mail.

Publishers are not in business for their health. If they are making a profit, or trying to make a profit, they ought to show enough gumption to pay their own way to prevent the Treasury from sinking deeper in the red ink than it is now.

The Inquirer proposes that Congress, closing its ears to the "yaps" that are sure to arise, courageously set about boosting the rates on second-class mail to the point where magazines and newspapers will not be putting the Government and the taxpayers in the hole.

There has been too much of this craven failure of publishers to pay for the service the Post Office Department gives them. Let's have an end to it.

TELEGRAM FROM PAUL R. JARRATT

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

NASHVILLE, TENN., June 13, 1940.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, JR.,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

The 1939 national convention of the American Legion in Chicago by resolution demanded that Congress stay in session "during the emergency." The emergency is even more grave now than it was at the time of the Chicago convention. Notwithstanding the political conventions we want Congress to say in session. The present situation requires the constant attention of Congress now.

Military Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. MILLARD E. TYDINGS, OF MARYLAND

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interesting and timely address on the subject Military Preparedness for the Present and for the Future, delivered by the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] over the National Broadcasting Co. network on Monday evening, June 10, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILITARY PREPAREDNESS FOR THE PRESENT AND FOR THE FUTURE

The devastating war now being waged in Europe, with its new weapons and methods, has finally brought the people of the United States to a full realization of the pitiful state of our own national defense, particularly on land.

Heretofore, it has always been assumed that, with a good navy, the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans were ample barriers against attack. Few realized that oceans can be highways to invasion as well as barriers against attack; that rapid transportation and communication and modern ways and means of war have largely destroyed the former security we enjoyed, and that our natural ramparts of defense are no longer as efficacious as we had supposed.

Fortunately, some of us in Congress have not been blind to these changed and changing conditions. Considering that it takes 4 years to build a battleship and many years to train and equip men for efficient service in the air, Navy, and land forces, we have for some years been calling attention to the tragic state of our national defense.

The time to create a national defense is not when you need it, for usually then you cannot get it. The time to provide for it is when you do not need it, for then it cannot only be more efficiently constructed but more cheaply obtained, as well.

Millions of our people in the past 5 years have opposed the enlargement of our Navy and the modernization of our Army. They opposed nearly every measure calculated to increase the defensive preparedness of the United States. They supported bills in Congress to do away with military training in the land-grant colleges, they favored reduced appropriations, and further reduction of the numerical strength of our Army and Navy.

Against such well-intentioned opposition during the last 5 years it has been difficult to make progress in keeping our Army and Navy and air force at a proper strength, and trained and equipped to a high degree of efficiency.

Those who have consistently fought preparedness on land, sea, and in the air during the past 5 years must now realize what a tremendous disservice they have done to this country and to its poeple. In the light of the happenings abroad, they must know that wishing for peace does not secure it; that to be unprepared is to invite attack, as witness the conflicts in China, Ethiopia, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Finland, Albania, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium, and France and England, as well.

It is generally accepted now that the surest guaranty of peace is to be so well prepared that no nation will feel it desirable to attack us or engage us in war—that the surest way for a rich nation to invite attack is to be unprepared to resist such attack.

We have learned that lesson now temporarily. Have we learned it sufficiently well to make adequate preparedness a part of our future democratic governmental program as the years continue to unfold?

If the oceans are narrower today than they were, they will continually grow more and more narrow, in the face of new invention, of speed and equipment. It is my fervent wish that the present emergency, together with the relentless march of intervention, will cause all to make a firm resolve that never, never, never again shall this rich, great, and powerful United States of America be caught so pitifully unprepared to defend itself as we all know it is today.

If we can only learn this lesson once and for all, we are more likely to escape future wars than to be involved in them, and we can sleep at night knowing our country will be safe.

If we learn this lesson only temporarily, until the present emergency passes, and then forget it, some future emergency will catch us in the same deplorable state in which we find ourselves today.

We have a splendid navy. Fortunately that has been kept up. However, its entire air force needs rapid modernization in equipment and in enlargement of personnel.

Our Army, unfortunately, is one of the smallest on the face of the earth, and while its personnel is good, it is woefully weak in modern war equipment and auxiliary implements.

The Army staff is charged with the primary responsibility of having an Army adequate to defend these shores against any possible foe. The present size and equipment of our National Army is far below the margin of safety.

The Chief of Staff of the United States Army, Gen. George C. Marshall, is asking Congress to provide a Regular Army of 375,000 in place of an army of 210,000 men. This is a most modest request. The chief of staff feels that with such an army, efficiently trained and equipped with modern weapons, together with the 235,000 men of the National Guard, likewise better trained and splendidly equipped, which will give us a combined army strength of 610,000 men, the national defense of this country will be provided for sufficiently.

Of the 375,000 men in the enlarged Regular Army, 280,000 will be in the ground forces and 95,000 will be placed in the Air Corps. This new Regular Army would have 30 percent of its men in mobile combat forces within the United States. There would be 9 infantry divisions, 2 armored divisions, and 1 cavalry division, making 12 divisions in all in the United States proper. These 12 divisions would be arranged in 2 full Army corps, supported by auxiliary troops. There would be about 125,000 men in all.

A quarter of the new Regular Army would be allocated to the Air Corps, composed of 51 pursuit squadrons, 69 bombardment squadrons, 40 reconnaissance squadrons, and 23 transport squadrons, or a total of 183 squadrons.

The new plan provides that one-fifth of our Regular Army be stationed throughout our overseas possessions—in the Philippines, Guam, Hawaii, Alaska, the Panama Canal Zone, and Puerto Rico. Thus, 75,000 Regular Army troops would be stationed outside of the continental United States. About 7,500 men will be stationed at our harbor-defense garrisons and at our coast-defense batteries.

The remaining men of the new Regular Army, between 80,000 and 90,000, would be stationed in Army depots, arsenals, hospitals, military schools, and general service agencies.

This is the minimum Regular Army needed at this very moment. Even after the present emergency passes, it should not be reduced too quickly, and perhaps not at all, lest again we be caught in the same situation in which we find ourselves today.

The new Regular Army, besides placing 95,000 men in the Army Air Corps, would have 15,000 in armored units. There would be 73,000 men in the Infantry, 41,000 men in the Field Artillery, and 21,000 in the antiaircraft Service; 58,000 would be assigned to the Army Engineers, Signal Corps, and Coast Artillery. About 75,000 would be used in supply and auxiliary services and schools. Of those assigned to the Air Corps 8,000 would be pilots who would fly the warplanes. Personnel and facilities would be set up to train new Army pilots at the rate of 7,000 per year.

Supplementing this new Regular Army would be the 235,000 men in the National Guard. Its entire equipment must be overhauled and modernized and filled out. Much additional training, particularly field maneuvers on a large scale, must be provided for the training of the National Guard in the future.

It is regrettable that it is going to take many months, and in some cases many years, before all of the men in the Army and National Guard are fully equipped with modern weapons and auxiliary devices, which a good army must have today to be able to resist attack successfully.

Why has not all this been done before, you ask? Perhaps the biggest reason was that the people of the United States would not support it before. They had been living with a false sense of security. It took the present grim realities to make them realize that a substantial increase in our standing Army was an imperative need.

There have been men in Congress and among our civilian population who have on one occasion after another tried to warn the people that the standing Army, both in numbers and equipment, was far below our needs. Most people did not bother their heads about it, even though in a democracy public sentiment really fashions most national policies.

The question now is, When the present emergency passes will they again sink into that previous attitude of indifference and sense of security and allow our Army to disintegrate and reach the low state of preparedness it is in today? That is what happened after the last World War. Let us hope that it will not happen again after the present war. Let us learn the lesson for all time that adequate defense is the surest guaranty against attack and against involvement in war.

The enlarged Regular Army and the National Guard are made up of voluntary enlistments. Thus, to increase our Army to its desired strength will require from 150,000 to 200,000 new enlistments. If these enlistments do not come voluntarily, it will be imperative that some democratic and equitable system be devised to furnish sufficient men to make up the forces to this minimum number.

The sooner these new enlistments are obtained, the better it will be for us all. It takes months and months to train a good soldier and a skilled aviator.

In addition to the above, I should like to see a plan to permit others who may desire it to receive military training. Military training is a healthful thing. It develops a strong body, a sense of obligation and responsibility to our Government, and an appreciation of what a great privilege it is to live in a country like the United States of America. In addition to the individual benefits, it would be a fine thing for the Nation's defense, too. A good deal of headway could be made if there were camps to which men could go who desire to receive this military training—camps such as were held at Plattsburg some 20 years ago.

In these camps muscles are hardened by training and exercise. Men are taught rudimentary military tactics, the use of arms, discipline, and the like. The strenuous life, lived in the open, would add to the physical prowess of the citizen and help the preparedness of the Nation at one and the same time. These voluntary camps, in my judgment, would attract many thousands of men who would like to help but who are not situated in some cases so they could join the Regular Army or National Guard.

As one who has participated in some of this training, I know it is of great benefit to everyone who takes it, if from no other standpoint than that of health.

Considerable numbers of people have written me advocating universal military training. My own opinion on this subject coincides with that of the Army heads. If we have a Regular Army and National Guard such as I have heretofore described, properly equipped and trained, numbering altogether 610,000 men, it would not be necessary for our national defense to superimpose universal training. It is felt that voluntary enlistments will give us the 610,000 men desired in these two organizations. Besides, universal military training would entail a terrific expense and a great additional tax burden on our country at a time when for 11 long years our National Government has been spending more than it has been receiving in taxes. Our average yearly deficit has been $2,650,000,000, or approximately $30,500,000,000 during the 11-year period.

I believe that with the Regular Army and National Guard brought up to the proposed strength, military training on the Plattsburg model could be more economically administered and would supplement largely any greater need for preparedness we might have. I am sure employers would cooperate with employees to permit this training where the employees themselves desired it.

The increase in the Regular Army and the National Guard together with the complete modernization of equipment of these forces is going to cost money—much money. There is no way this can be avoided. Our problem is to get the most out of the taxpayer's dollar for defense purposes. The plan outlined by General Marshall, and which I hope Congress will adopt in full, is designed to give the country the best standard defense possible for the least money. During the last 10 years we have spent an average of about $500,000,000 a year on our Army and National Guard. This was used for maintenance, training, equipment, and all expenses incident thereto. The new Army will cost at least twice that much a year, in all probability, as it will be equipped with tanks, armored cars, armored eairplanes, and other weapons. For a while it is going to cost more than twice as much as the old Army cost each year, for large sums are necessary for initial equipment, housing, etc.

It will nevertheless be a good insurance both for our security and our future welfare. Not to have this insurance is to be in the position of the owner of a house who has no adequate fire insurance on his home, when fires are breaking out all over the neighborhood. Our problem is to get this insurance on our national welfare without unavoidable delay.

May I be permitted to say a personal word? Your speaker was a soldier in the last war, serving with fighting troops in the American Expeditionary Force in France, in engagements where some of his friends and comrades made the supreme sacrifice or were severely wounded.

No one wants to avoid war more than one who has actually taken part in it or will have to take part in another. Such men want to see war honorably avoided if it can be done.

I deplore the idea that still exists in some quarters in our country, that our Nation ought to have no army or navy at all, or that it ought not to put itself in a state of adequate preparedness and should not even resist invasion if it comes. This is the surest way to really bring on an invasion of this country by acquisitive and aggressor nations for we are the richest and most desirable loot in all of Christendom.

China's policy of being unprepared was an inducement for Japan to attack China, which has cost the Chinese people already 3,000,000 lives among its men, women, and children, and only heaven can count the incidental suffering, destruction, and misery to the living.

If we really want to avoid war, we should have a powerful Navy, second to none on the sea, beneath the sea, and over the sea, and an Army at least the size of the one I have described, on the land and in the air. Then no one will want to attack us, for the price of that attack would be too costly, and they could not hope to achieve success in the face of such preparedness.

But we cannot have that insurance against war coming to our country so long as well-meaning but ill-advised persons continually preach, in the face of all the grim and sad facts of this hour, that we are in no danger of attack at all. We are vulnerable to attack, and in my judgment we would be attacked, under certain possibilities that may occur, if we had no Army or Navy to cause the aggressor to think twice before he struck.

To be unprepared is to invite attack. To be prepared is to prevent attack. To be unprepared is to threaten the stability of this Government, the overthrow of its institutions, the liberty and freedom of our country, and our everyday way of life. To be prepared is to preserve this form of government and its institutions, our freedom and liberty and our way of life, and to be able to hand them down to our children and our children's children.

We need less of the will for pacifism and more of the will to preserve this Nation. We need less of the spirit of indifference and more of the spirit of self-sacrifice for the common good. We need less of soft and indolent self-concern and more of the deep and abiding love of liberty, patriotic instincts, and the spirit of our forefathers. We need these things to be strong enough to escape the fate which already has encompassed nearly a dozen nations in the last 5 years.

Every city has its large police force to prevent crime within its borders. The Army is our national police force, to prevent international crime, the attempt by any aggressor nation to invade us and break the peaceful laws of our everyday lives.

The Army, our national police force, must be of such size and equipment that it is adequate to deal with these outside aggressors so that we may continue to dwell here in the security and safety to which we are entitled.

While we wish to avoid war in every honorable way, we should not shrink from it when our homes and way of life are threatened by invasion any more than we would shrink from dealing with one who attempted to force his way into our private homes and rob or destroy.

We are living in times that may change the whole course of human history. We all know what is taking place throughout the world today. We owe it to our ancestors, to ourselves, and to our children that these things shall not happen here, that this great country shall be preserved, and that we have the will to preserve it and hand it down to those who may come after us, no less secure, progressive, and fine than our forebears have preserved it and handed it down to us.

The American Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. SLATTERY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] to the civic, service, fraternal, labor, and religious organizations in Chicago on June 12, 1940, in celebration of All Chicago Flag Day.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I come to this great city here tonight to address a great audience of patriotic Americans. It is only to patriots that I speak. I come to speak in the same spirit in which you have come to honor the most glorious flag in all the world—the Stars and Stripes. No other emotion so fills our hearts as the inspiration that comes from looking upon that flag and appreciating what it means to have that flag wave over a land. For where that flag is there is liberty, freedom, human dignity, and supreme reverence for a sovereign God. In every one of its noble folds is written the epic of America's patriots who gave that flag ascendency over the land of the free and the home of the brave.

No other flag in all the world has so thrilled the oppressed, been so much an emblem of the emancipated, as has that flag. A little group of patriots, through almost a decade of unspeakable privation and pain, made that flag the flag of a new world and a new country. They put upon it the benediction of their blood. They bathed it in their tears. By the strength of their own brave hands they made it sacred and inviolate against monarch, dictator, or any other enemy. They made it a symbol of a new kind of life builded upon the stifled hopes of dead ages. They conceived a way of life for which there was no old pattern. It was a way strewn with many obstacles, following many devious and dangerous routes, and the road was long and arduous. But along that way could be heard the steady tread of brave and confident feet marching with a purpose and moved by an inspiration as divine as justice and as dignified as the soul of men.

Their sons and their sons' sons, their daughters and their daughters' daughters, good, God-blessed men and women in the nobility of their own lives, have nourished the sentiments epitomized in that flag. They have defended it against foreign danger and domestic strife. They have dimmed not one of its stars from its ancient luster of purity and perfection. They have erased not one of its bold stripes. No ignoble motto have they inscribed upon its azure blue not conceived upon the first flag by Betsy Ross and George Washington.

Its folds have been wrapped around the humble slave and lifted him to the dignity and the responsibility of citizenship. Its embrace has encompassed the oppressed Cuban and clothed him with the unalienable rights of liberty and freedom.

Its warm stripes and its glittering stars have been the glorious banner under which sons of America threw their bodies across the path of a ruthless military machine which sought then as its successor seeks now to defile democracy and conquer the world. Today the first impulse surging through the heart of every true American is the determination to preserve the liberty and freedom of the land for which the flag waves. If that flag falls it would carry down with it all that our heroic dead have saved from the wreckage of the past. Around it and upon its stained folds would crumble the majestic edifices of the most glorious civilization history records. Upon its tattered and frayed remnants would tumble the highest hopes man has ever dared to dream for mortal man. The last citadel of human dignity would be a broken ruin and the refuge of the world's oppressed would be but a desolate land upon which the sorrow of the mourning patriots would fall in a canopy of gloom.

The American people today face the greatest danger of all their history. If the issue of cruel war now raging with unspeakable terror upon the soil of France is against Great Britain and France and those associated with them and in favor of Hitler and Mussolini, the United States of America, for the first time in its whole history, faces a hostile world without a single first-class power for a friend.

Linked in a confederacy which aims at the greatest loot the world has ever known are a group of dictators who, in that unhappy event, would hold unquestioned sway over four of the five continents of the world and mastery over three-fifths of the world's people and three-fourths of the world's territory. Neither to the east nor to the west, to the north nor to the south could we grasp a strong hand as an ally, even to preserve sacred and inviolate our own soil. Nowhere could we hear even an echo of any appeal we might make to preserve a civilization which reverences God and respects man. In neither east nor west would there be a great nation upon whose comradeship we could call to preserve the institutions of free men out of which have been born democracies which have given to the world its greatest learning, its most beautiful culture, its greatest emphasis upon the divinity of the human soul.

Alone should we stand against powers who have defied the first two commandments, the first of which places in the heavens a supreme God and upon the earth Godlike men.

Alone should we stand as the champion of the rule of law, of right, as against force and might. Alone should we stand as the defenders of the forum of conscience, in which justice may speak and charity and mercy may be dispensed. Around us would stand borders of steel and the armed might of conquerors whose appetite for conquest would have been whetted upon the ruins of two of the world's mightiest empires and four great nations, which in 6 weeks of total war have been destroyed.

The doors of world trade should have been slammed shut in our faces by totalitarian masters who would tell the rest of the world who could and would buy the wheat, the hogs, the meat, the lard, the cotton, the fruit, and the other products of America's farms, which has heretofore been sold in the open markets of the world. Wheels would stop in every American factory which is accustomed to sell its output to any of the other four continents.

The standard of living would fall in every ordinary American home. First would go luxury, then leisure, then recreation, then decent hours, then fair wages from every ordinary workingman, while first profit and then cost would disappear from every average American farm. Meanwhile the galling burden of mounting taxes would bear yet harder and harder upon every home, every producer, every worker, and taxpayer to meet the incalculable weight of armaments which this Nation would have to bear to give any assurance of its own security in such a world, much less the safety of the 43,000 miles of the Western Hemisphere which is in the possible zone of attack.

Moneys, meager as they now are, spent upon public health, upon needed education, upon research against the ravages of disease and death, upon homes to house families in decent surroundings, upon the things of the mind and the spirit, no less real than the things we see, these moneys, I say, would go for battleships, tanks, guns, planes, ammunition, antiaircraft guns, coast defenses, Navy and Army air bases in the United States, in Iceland, in Greenland, in the Caribbean, in Central America, in South America, in the islands of the South Atlantic, the South Pacific, the North Pacific, Alaska. A navy would have to grow in the Atlantic which now needs no navy, because mastery of that ocean is in the hands of powers which have, for more than 100 years, exhibited no hostile attitude toward either our territory or our institutions, nor, indeed, to a Christian God.

An Army which now numbers less than 300,000 in active service will have to grow to indefinite millions which could only come from conscription, which would take a man from every home. An air force, now modest, according to the demands of the past, when no nation which was able to reach us threatened us on the East and we were the superior of any force which could be sent against us from the West, would grow by the tens of thousands, until bombers and pursuit planes, perched like sea gulls upon every mile of 43,000 miles of vulnerable coast line in the Western Hemisphere.

In the Senate a few days ago I declared that Hitler had long ago declared war upon the American institution. That statement was taken by some of my colleagues as extravagant hysteria. I leave to my fellow citizens, you here, to men and women, throughout this broad land, to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, to the men of our Army, Navy, and Air Corps the question, has there been since the Nazi Government of Germany set in motion its relentless machine of conquest a steady infiltration of "fifth colmns" and Trojan horses in the United States and South America? Have some aliens violated the hospitality of our soil to spy upon us? Thank God not all from abroad have violated the hospitality of our soil to spy upon us.

Have agents recognizing a foreign master clothed in the raimant of a foreign power fomented strife amongst us, endeavored to break down our confidence in one another and in our institutions and stimulated dissention intended to weaken our productive power and our second lines of defense?

Has propaganda, wicked distorted truth, and honeyed lie with all the devilish subtlety of a Mephistopheles endeavored to break down our will to defend ourselves?

Have designs upon what we have in resource, in territory, in trade, been laid in the chanceries and war offices of the dictators?

Has total war been levied with indomitable and invincible will by the German Fuehrer against our way of life, and against the things we stand for which have been dearly bought by our forefathers?

To what do you attribute the action of the President in requesting, and the Congress in appropriating, nearly $5,000,000,000 in the last 3 weeks, the tightening of the belts of every one of our citizens to meet the sacrifice upon which alone we can build a national defense adequate to our security? Against whom are we arming to defend ourselves? Why have we already spent billions in the last 5 years to arm when before that we were joining other nations of the world in disarmament?

But if there was ever any doubt as to what was the issue of the war now being fought in Europe, that doubt was dispelled 2 days ago when the head of the Italian people announced to the world what was the issue of that struggle. You heard him over your radios, you read his statement in your papers when he said:

"The hour of destiny has arrived for our fatherland. We are going to war against the decrepit of democracies * * * to break the chains that tie us in the Mediterranean. It is to win. We salute the Fuehrer of Germany," he added, "Fascist Italy is on her feet and prepared to strike. This revolution," he continued, "asserts itself against those nations who control the riches of the earth and the gold. It is a struggle of one century against another. We take up arms to solve the problems of our continental frontiers and our maritime frontiers."

In another passage he said, "This gigantic struggle is only a phase in the development of our revolution. This asserts itself against the strangers, the richer nations. It is a struggle between young and progressive people as against the decadent people, the struggle of one century as against another century."

Tragic as was that announcement that the hand poised for months to strike chose to sink its dagger in a neighbor's back when she was being ravaged by another foe, that statement, I hope, will burn itself into the consciousness of every patriotic man, woman, and child in America. Who are the rich nations against whom Il Duce joins Fuehrer Hitler in war? Who are the nations possessing the world's storehouse of gold against which the confederacy of the dictators is formed? Who are the old states against whom the new contend? What is the old philosophy against which the new joins battle?

Clearer than even the German Fuehrer has stated it did Mussolini in that message declare upon what and whom this total war was being waged.

Can it be that the very boldness of the attack shall disarm us as it disarmed Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and Chamberlain? Shall the horrible example of every victim which now lies supine under their tanks and dive bombers and armored cars be not enough to arouse us? Have we not learned yet that a nation which in 1914 startled the world by scorning a solemn treaty as a scrap of paper cannot now under dictators who have drenched in blood every rung of their ladder to power be trusted when they say they want no more? Are our ears sealed and our brains dulled that we do not hear what they say to the wide world?

I speak to you as an American who loves every corner of our sacred soil, every stream, every hilltop and dale, every tree and blade of grass, every home upon this holy land. I speak to a citizenry which for weeks has been calling upon its Congress to awake to our danger and our defense. I speak for the mothers who close their eyes at night in prayer that the blood of their sons will never be spilled upon battlefield. I speak for loved ones who pray in every waking hour that they shall never have to clasp in sorrowful farewell a departing soldier. I speak for those long dead whose spirit cries out that we protect the land they long ago won. I speak for those who have the courage to see ugly realities and the confidence to act as Americans have always acted before it is tragically too late.

Tonight, as an American, I call out to you as Americans that America is not isolated from danger; that America is not indifferent to the issue of the war which rages in France tonight; that America's destiny is not unaffected by who emerges victor in that contest.

As an American, to you patriotic Americans I say that the best, the surest, and the safest way to keep the scourge of war from America's shores, to preserve peace and freedom here always, is for Americans to stand up like men, like men who won that freedom behind that flag, like men who carried that flag through every baptism of fire, like men who threw their arms around it and saved it from everyone who would defile one thread of its sacred folds and say to the world that America still believes in God, America still believes in democracy, America has not lost her moral sense and her virtue, that America will defend not only its soil but her way of life against all who would destroy it, and by all means short of war will now lend her aid to those who fight today to destroy those who would fling us back and would desecrate Old Glory and what it stands for.

Let Europe Pay War Debts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM SOCIAL JUSTICE

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, this is June 15, the due date for European war debts.

Yesterday the press reported that two of the debtors, Great Britain and France, have more than $7,000,000,000 on deposit here. They ought to pay, for we certainly need the money. We also need the West Indies, both British and French, for air and naval bases.

For many years the debtor nations, with the exception of Finland, made no effort whatever to pay their greatly reduced debts to us. During that time there were long periods when there was no imminent danger of war, and they could perfectly well have done so. In fact, it is notorious that Great Britain and France, especially, had very large deposits of gold in this country, and had vast holdings of American securities which could have been taken over by the Governments of those countries and the proceeds applied on the debts.

It may be argued at this moment, when Great Britain and France are in such a perilous position, that they probably cannot safely pay us in cash, which they need for the purchase of war supplies—although such supplies are really being purchased with our money. There is, however, no reason whatever why they cannot transfer to us their West Indian islands. This would have the double purpose of paying us something on the debts and further of obviating a very disagreeable and perhaps dangerous situation if they should attempt to transfer the islands to us at a time when they might be endeavoring to settle the war with Germany.

I ask unanimous consent that an article I have written on this subject, printed in Social Justice of April 29, 1940, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Social Justice of April 29, 1940]

LET EUROPE PAY WAR DEBTS—MINNESOTA SENATOR SUGGESTS CARIBBEAN ISLANDS AS PART PAYMENT BY ENGLAND AND FRANCE

(By United States Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, chairman, Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee)

Again the hue and cry is raised that the United States set itself up as the creditor of all Europe.

What of the fourteen and one-half billion Europe owes us today? Our 10,000,000 unemployed have a right to know how our efforts to finance Europe have dissipated the resources of their country. Our ill-housed, ill-fed, and ill-clothed have a right to ask why all these foreign loans to foreign nations.

WHY NOT FOOD AND JOBS FOR AMERICANS?

The transient farmer who moves his pitiful family about the country trying to find work; the men and boys, women and children forced onto the bread line, demand that their Government put their interest first. W. P. A. families have been thrown off relief, are forced to depend on the allotment of 1½ cents per meal per person from the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation. They demand an answer of the Government whose money flows so readily to Europe.

This Government has waited and negotiated for 22 years, seeking a substantial payment from defaulting foreign countries already in debt to us. For 22 years the answer has been continued evasion and repeated attempts at cancelation.

Great Britain borrowed from the United States more than $4,000,000,000. Has Great Britain paid that debt? No.

France borrowed $3,404,818,945; Italy borrowed $1,648,034,050. Have they paid? No.

And 17 other countries received similar loans.

AMERICANS PAYING WAR-DEBT INTEREST

The interest the United States Government has asked on these loans is of great importance to the American people. In direct violation of an act of Congress, which provided that these loans to foreign countries were to be funded at 4⅛ percent interest, our "world savers" asked interest rates ranging from 3⅓ percent to one-half of 1 percent. From Great Britain, on whose Empire the sun never sets, an Empire which controls 57 percent of the gold production of the world, these statesmen asked 3³⁄₁₀ percent interest over a period of 62 years, while Americans still pay 4⅛ percent interest on these British war bonds.

From France they asked an average of 1⁶⁄₁₀ percent interest over 62 years. Poor France. The French Empire, strange to say, has 1,091,749 square miles more territory than the United States.

From Italy—whose country at this time knows no unemployment, and whose people enjoy an increasing standard of living—from that country the United States asks an average interest rate of less than one-eighth of 1 percent for the first 10 years and an average of four-tenths percent over 62 years, while the overburdened American taxpayer struggles to pay 4⅛ percent on these very bonds.

The American people have financed these empires. We have built them up with our own money: Mussolini's Italy, Chamberlain's England, and the French Empire.

HOW LONG SHALL EUROPE BE PREFERRED?

No American can borrow money from any bank or Government agency at one-eighth of 1 percent interest. The problem of home building at one-eighth of 1 percent would swell the chorus of the hammer and saw all over this great land. It would solve our housing problem overnight. But we don't lend to Americans at that rate of interest. Americans are out of luck. British and French are preferred; Americans come last.

How long, Uncle Sam, how long?

For 22 years these foreign countries, owing us billions of dollars, have branded Uncle Sam a Shylock. They have propagandized our people until some so-called Americans have become more pro-French, more pro-British, more pro-Italian than the British, French, and Italians themselves. Our people are blind to this daylight robbery by foreign countries at the expense of Americans.

There are some at present crusading for Europe when they should be trying to clothe our own destitute, cold, and hungry.

We have 8,000,000 sharecroppers in the South trying to wrest a bare living out of the soil. They live in absolute poverty. Of them Secretary Wallace once said: "I have never seen among the peasantry of Europe so abject as they which exist in the great cotton States." That is in America.

There is no evasion or cancelation for them. These families of the South are bodily removed from their dilapidated shelters in midwinter and turned out on the highways to find what they may in the bitter cold. They can't pay their debts. Groups now begging for funds for European empires never pass the hat nor donate a dollar to the peons and peasants and economic slaves in the United States of America.

This perverted sense of sympathy which places foreigners before Americans is ruining our country.

For Europe the cry is cancelation. The average American does not know that the United States has already canceled 20 percent of the British debt, 50 percent of the French debt, and 75 percent of the Italian debt. Our poor tenant farmers and sharecroppers, our unemployed, need the immediate attention of Uncle Sam right here in the United States.

WAR-DEBT ISSUE DELIBERATELY CONFUSED

The issue of foreign war debts has been deliberately confused to befog the minds of the American people. If the farmer, the laborer, or millions of unemployed knew that they were to this day paying 4½-percent interest on old European war bonds they would rise and demand that this Government account for 22 years of un-American activity. They would tear this sham of cancelation propaganda from the eyes of the American public and demand payment from these foreign countries who have evaded their debts to the United States.

These were not only banker's loans, as I have heard collegiate debaters contend. Every American contributed to these loans through the Liberty bond issues. After the war these bonds were purchased from us, and if our Government is not repaid by these foreign countries, you and I will have to pay the war debts in taxes, and we are paying them, and we are paying them now.

If the average American knew that the United States would be out billions of dollars and more, even if these foreign countries paid every cent as required under the funding agreements, perhaps we would have enough Americanism left in us to demand to know why our Government funded and financed Europe.

IF WE CANCEL, WE PAY EUROPE'S BILL

Another evasion-of-debts propaganda is that we should "wipe the slate clean" and call our loans to these European empires our contribution to the last war. We sent our boys to die for them. We paid England and France for transporting our troops, and we paid for all supplies furnished our troops in France. In wiping out the debt, we would not only be paying our part of the World War but we would also be paying that of England, France, Italy, and 17 other foreign countries.

Our greatest debtors have made no attempt to pay. England was able to give Turkey an outright gift of $240,000,000 in October 1939. Since that time England and France made another $340,000,000 loan to bolster Turkish defense.

I do not question their political right to do that. I question their constant excuses of not being able to pay us.

CARIBBEAN ISLANDS FOR PART PAYMENT

Billions are being spent for United States defense. Military authorities readily agree that the Caribbean Islands would form our Maginot line, making the Canal Zone invulnerable and adding absolute protection to our entire coast line, east and west. In addition to increased appropriations for more locks at Panama, our Government should negotiate for the acquisition of the Caribbean Islands, which the British and French now hold. Let these islands be a part payment of their "dead-beat debts." Andrew Jackson, the great Democrat revered in history, advocated that policy when he said:

"It is a well-settled principle of the international code, that where one nation owes another a liquidated debt which it refuses to pay, the aggrieved party may seize the property belonging to the other, its citizens, or subjects, sufficient to pay the debt, without giving just cause for war."

America has carried Europe on its back these 22 years. The unemployed ask:

"How long, Uncle Sam, how long?"

Subversive Action

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON POST

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, when the Senate votes on the joint resolution to deport Harry Bridges it will be making a decision, the effects of which will be felt for generations to come. In this proposal there is involved a principle of supreme importance. The matter is ably discussed in an editorial appearing in the Washington Post today. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUBVERSIVE ACTION

By a vote of 330 to 42, the House has approved a bill ordering the Attorney General to deport Harry R. Bridges, west coast labor leader. No charges were brought against Mr. Bridges other than general accusations that he is a "troublemaker" and an "undesirable" alien with communistic leanings.

Mr. Bridges has already been absolved of charges that he has been agitating for the overthrow of our form of government. After long and exhaustive open hearings, James M. Landis, dean of the Harvard Law School, concluded that Mr. Bridges was neither a member of nor affiliated with the Communist Party and that his activities as a labor leader were in accord with democratic principles.

Not only did the House ignore these official findings but the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization did not even accord the accused man a hearing before reporting favorably upon the bill for his deportation. In the course of the debate it was said that this is the first time a bill aimed exclusively at the punishment of one man has come before Congress. That is not surprising, since our Government is supposed to be one of laws.

What is almost past belief, however, is that a legislative body sworn to uphold democratic principles should be so misguided as to approve a measure subversive of the fundamental principles upon which our constitutional form of government rests.

There was difference of opinion among Members of the House as to whether the deportation bill could be regarded as a bill of attainder, banned under the Constitution of the United States. Legal hairsplitting on this issue can be left to the lawyers. But patriotic citizens will hope that if this bill is enacted the Supreme Court will quickly sweep aside the legal casuistry by which its supporters seek to deny law-abiding aliens rights guaranteed to them as persons under the Constitution.

The bill to deport Mr. Bridges is, in any case, an example of the kind of legislation the founding fathers sought to prohibit in banning bills of attainder. What Justice Story has to say on the subject is enlightening. Bills of attainder—that is, legislative acts which inflict punishment without judicial trial—"have been most usually passed," he says, "in times of rebellion or of gross subservience to the crown or of violent political excitements—periods in which all nations are most liable * * * to forget their duties and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."

Those words have a prophetic ring, for the House, in its zeal to safeguard cherished institutions, has voted to trample upon individual rights and liberties. The fact that the prospective victim is an alien is no excuse for such conduct.

If emulation is the sincerest form of flattery, then Hitler and Mussolini should extract great satisfaction from the unprecedented action of the House, for the Congressmen who voted to deport Mr. Bridges, after he had been cleared of charges of being illegally in this country, are certainly following totalitarian methods of ridding the state of "undesirables."

A number of Congressmen maintained that they might deport an alien simply because they did not like the color of his eyes or his hair. If that view is accepted, how long will it be before Congress extends its purge to eliminate citizens who, for any reason, or for no reason, have become objectionable?

Much more than the wholly unimportant future of Harry Bridges is at stake in the present instance. His foes, as well as friends, can meet on common ground to oppose an action which is utterly repugnant to everything for which America is supposed to stand.

America and the World War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER T. BONE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

TWO EDITORIALS FROM LABOR, NATIONAL ORGAN OF THE RAILROAD BROTHERHOODS OF AMERICA

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials published in Labor, the national organ of the Railway Brotherhoods of America, in the issue of June 11, 1940. One is headed "Let's put an end to this hysteria," and the other is headed "God is not responsible."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Labor of June 11, 1940]

LET'S PUT AN END TO THIS HYSTERIA—AMERICAN PEOPLE MUST NOT BE STAMPEDED INTO MAKING DECISIONS WHICH VITALLY AFFECT THE REPUBLIC

In recent weeks someone has said: "Hysteria does not become a great people." Most of us will agree that Americans are a great people. Therefore, hysteria does not become us.

A considerable section of our population became hysterical after we entered the World War in 1917. Hundreds of innocent men and women were cruelly persecuted, while most of those who were genuinely disloyal—of example, those who looted the Public Treasury or ballooned the cost of the necessaries of life to the point where ordinary citizens suffered grievously—went unwhipped of justice.

Another wave of hysteria is sweeping the country now. Some of those responsible for it wish to involve us in the European war; others hope to strip labor of its hard-won rights; many have lost their mental balance and are unable to face the barrage of truths and half truths to which they are subjected by press and radio.

In such an abnormal atmosphere there is danger that the American people may be stampeded into decisions which will cost them dearly. When the storm has passed, they may find that the democratic institutions they cherish have been seriously impaired. The workers will be among the chief victims of such a catastrophe.

It behooves us to display calm judgment and a capacity for vigorous and constructive action.

Above all, it is a time to think of America first. We must strengthen our defenses; we must punish disloyalty wherever it is found; and at the same time we must demonstrate our capacity to resist propaganda of every kind.

This isn't the first time America has faced a grave situation, and there is no reason to believe it will be the last. Anyone who suggests that America would be "easy pickings" for Hitler, or any other foe of democracy, simply doesn't know what he's talking about.

We have repeatedly demonstrated that we know how to fight. Our American youngsters have the same courage, intelligence, and love of country that animated their fathers when they crossed the ocean to save the day on the fields of Flanders. When the call comes those youngsters will give a good account of themselves.

But before we summon them to arms we should count the cost. If we enter the European war, we must go all the way. Those who say it will be sufficient to give money and supplies are either poorly advised or are seeking to deceive.

Our boys will follow our money and our supplies. Before the contest is ended, probably a quarter of a million of them will be dead and another half million physically and mentally shattered.

Are we prepared to make that sacrifice? We must have calm nerves and clear heads when we frame the answer to that momentous question. Therefore let's have an end to this hysteria and conduct ourselves in a manner "becoming a great people."

GOD IS NOT RESPONSIBLE

Lord Lothian, British Ambassador to the United States, suggests to a New York audience that Hitler's success may be "the scourge of God" to punish the democracies for their shortcomings. Why try to shift the responsibility to God?

All the evidence indicates that the financiers, the politicians, and the militarists of the democratic nations are responsible for the catastrophe. British and American bankers supplied Hitler with hundreds of millions of dollars, and were equally generous with Mussolini. The militarists permitted the dictator to build up a gigantic war machine right under their noses, and the politicians looked on complacently, many of them believing Hitler would turn his weapons against Russia.

While all this was going on, the representatives of capitalism in all the democracies were refusing to take effective steps to end unemployment and thus restore the physical strength and the morale of the men they now expect to do the fighting.

It's difficult to find the hand of God in any of this, but it's easy to detect the stupidity and greed of human beings who occupied positions of power.

Man and Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech which I delivered yesterday in Milwaukee, Wis., before the State Association of Life Underwriters, the subject of my talk being Man and Government.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

These are historic days. World history is being written daily. Out of the world's conflict there may emerge new concepts of man and government. It is well for us today to analyze this subject dispassionately—free from the emotions which may some day distort our judgment.

In discussing this subject, Man and Government—you will notice that I have put man ahead of government—I am reminded of the statement of our great American philosopher, Emerson. He said:

"The less government we have the better—the fewer laws and the less confided power. The antidote to this abuse of formal government is the influence of private character, the growth of the individual."

In these days of grave international crisis it is interesting to recall that the great German thinker, Goethe, said: "The best of all governments is that which teaches us to govern ourselves."

Burke, the great English statesman, said: "No government ought to exist for the purpose of checking the prosperity of its people or to allow such a principle in its policy."

Grover Cleveland said: "Though the people support the Government, the Government should not support the people."

In these days when our republican form of government—a republic, not a democracy—is being tested in the crucible of history, in these days when other peoples who had forms of government which simulated our own have cast these forms into the discard and returned to a form of absolute monarchy, which we call dictatorship or the totalitarian state—in these days we who value our liberties, our privileges, and our great American values, we believe in building up the man, the individual, to become responsible, courageous, and duly and truly qualified with wisdom, Christlike faith, and charity.

Fronting the battle land of the future, we are asking ourselves, How can American citizenship thus equip itself?

May I be privileged to relate a personal incident that may bring a little light on this subject—this matter of each man putting on armor for the glorious struggle that is up ahead?

(The story before the Press Club—develop a sense of humor, not taking one's self too seriously, and getting perspective.)

Daniel Webster on one occasion said: "Nothing will ruin the country if the people themselves will undertake its safety, and nothing can save it if they leave that safety in any hands but their own." This statement of Webster's has special application to the present. In other lands the people have delegated away or permitted their rights to be taken away by other hands. It is well in America to see that we do not follow the same course.

It is particularly important in these trying times to see that war scares are not used as a pretext for unwarranted regimentation. We have permitted the fungus growth of bureaucracy—a growth which is un-American in its inception and in its operation. In the last years we have heard so much of inequality between folks, condemnation of those who know how to succeed, build, etc., with the result that initiative, invention, and confidence have gone out the window. On the other hand, we have reduced a large percentage of the middle class of this country to a mere subsistence level (take 70 percent of the farmers in the State of Wisconsin) and we have builded up a bureaucracy of a million men—creating a special class, if you please, and paying unto them large salaries that are paid for by the taxpayers of this country. Let me give you some figures and some information.

Whenever we have created a Government department, or a commission, or a bureau, like a fungus it starts to multiply itself to find new fields of activities, new necessities for an increased personnel and increased appropriations. Senator CLARK, speaking on the subject, said: "Few jobs once created are ever abolished, even when their activities are over; and when they are abolished, two or three new jobs are created in their places. Worse than this, these administrative agencies, each for itself, constantly reach out for new fields of authority over the lives and well-being of the ordinary citizen, each constantly strives for further delegation of legislative power and from every grant of regulatory, inquisitorial, or administrative authority to one of these agencies, there immediately ensues an appropriation for a force of administrators, collectors, experts, recorders, secretaries, and these in turn immediately begin to agitate for further extensions of activity and authority and appropriations."

President Coolidge said on one occasion: "Of all forms of government, those administered by bureaus, are about the least satisfactory. Unless bureaucracy is constantly resisted, it breaks down representative government and overwhelms democracy."

Take for instance the Department of Agriculture. It is a good example. In 1839 it began with a modest appropriation of $1,000 to collect agricultural statistics. Now the ordinary appropriation for its ordinary activities, exclusive of the A. A. A. or other emergency activities, runs close to $500,000,000 a year, comprising hundreds of divisions and bureaus within itself, including a huge staff of press agents. In 1911 the total appropriation for agriculture amounted to only $19,916,000, but in 1931 it had grown to $296,865,000, and today as I said it is reaching close to a half billion dollars. The total number of employees in this Department was 77,111 on January 31 of this year.

The point I am making is that bureaucracy and the expenditures for Government have exceeded many times the growth of the Nation. In the first year of our Government we spent $4,269,000; in 1811 we spent $9,000,000; while a few years ago the travel expense alone of one bureau, the Resettlement Administration, amounted to five and one-half million dollars, and the bill of this same Bureau for telegraph and telephone tolls alone amounted to two and one-half million dollars.

All of you know that by reason of the depression, or recession, or panic, whatever you want to call it, a great horde of Government offices have been created on the theory that they were justified as emergency activity. Is there any talk, now that the claim is that the emergency is passing, that such offices shall be abolished? Not at all. Everywhere among the bureaucrats and those who want the votes of the bureaucrats the idea is to make these emergency bureaucrats into permanent bureaucrats. There is a lesson here. It is the lesson that we must not create war-scare emergency jobs in such a manner that they shackle us permanently.

Of course, there is no consideration to be given to the people's Treasury. Yes; these bureaus and departments are very jealous now of their field of activity. No one thinks of trying to reduce the cost. In fact, they want to retain all their functions and increase their power and personnel. You know that government now engages in hundreds of functions of business in competition with private enterprises in the field of manufacturing, merchandising, transportation, and agriculture. Of course, it is well that the Government constructs some of its own naval craft and has arsenals for the manufacture of munitions and arms. We can justify some of that, but in these other enterprises which compete with the taxpayer we find many, many examples of inexcusable waste of the taxpayers' money which cannot be justified on any ground.

Senator CLARK, speaking recently, said it was difficult to determine whether government was operating these enterprises at a profit or loss because of the lack of any uniform system of accounting and because in many instances they failed to take into account such items as insurance, depreciation, return on capital invested, etc. He said that each bureau uses whatever system of accounting it pleases and considers what elements of accounting it may desire to employ. He said that in the War Department alone there were at least a dozen different systems of accounting. Senator CLARK has been pressing for the consideration of a bill which requires uniform accounting, but he stated whenever he tried to get consideration of the bill the bureaucrats blocked it. In other words, your servants and mine, whom we pay, could bring sufficient pressure to block an efficient system of accounting to be put into effect in our business—the business of government. This bureaucracy, CLARK said, employs a powerful and active lobby supported by taxpayers' money.

Now, I have gone into this discussion with you people because you are interested as citizens of the greatest Nation on earth (which I am sure you desire to keep great not only for yourselves but for your children) and because you have seen some of the working of government.

You have seen in your insurance field how government can do that which will benefit or do that which can injure the great business of insurance. You have seen how in the last years, because government has failed to coordinate capital, labor, and the man of genius in a great enterprise, capital has gone lagging. There is no place to put it except in the deficit rathole built by Government. With what result? That the new birth of enterprise, the new birth of creative America has not come into being. There is no reason why with our great resources and manpower and capital, with our great consumer demand, that this country should not go places except for the lack in leadership and fear inspired by that lack of leadership. Furthermore, as I stated before, an inability in our leadership to harness labor and capital together, and an inability in leadership to foster invention, venture, and faith in our citizenship. Yes; even in our defense, we couldn't rely on Government to do the job. We had to call on private industry.

With reference to industry and defense, I personally am in favor of having the industrial mobilization plan centered in temporary emergency agencies. Such agencies would have the benefit of the business mind—the executive mind, recruited from successful private enterprise. Furthermore, after the emergency is over, if the powers were in a temporary agency, it would be far easier to demobilize. If the matter were left in the hands of existing bureaus or departments of the Government, demobilization would be impossible. We would have just another bureaucratic crowd who would want to stay on. It would mean an additional horde of swivel-chair job holders who would want to perpetuate both their jobs and the emergency. And there would be just another "pressure" group that Congress would be "pressured" with.

As everyone knows, this administration likes to see Government powers extended and overextended, not only temporarily but permanently. I feel that to place the industrial mobilization plan in the hands of existing departments might be dangerous and might bring us into the identical governmental rut that Europe has experienced. War scares must be met realistically. They must not be used as a pretext to make an unwarranted extension of bureaucracy or executive power.

Under no consideration should the Food Administration, if we have one, be placed in the Department of Agriculture. That Department is already overgrown and overinflated. It is unwieldy and top-heavy. In fact, that is one of the reasons why the President's reorganization plan recommended transfer of some of its agencies to other departments. Food administration must be placed in the hands of an independent organization—nonpolitical.

If there is ever a War Labor Administration, it should not be placed in the Department of Labor. Neither should the war trade-control rights be placed in the Department of State or in the Tariff Commission, except so far as diplomatic relations during war are involved. If we have to go into a great preparedness financing plan, this should not be placed in the R. F. C. It should be placed in the hands of a temporary agency free from political control and political red tape.

In times like this, when we must preserve our economic institutions in order to finance tremendous defense measures, it is particularly important that we do not attack any segment of our national economy. I mention this because the insurance companies of this Nation were subjected to a scathing, searching scrutiny only a few months ago.

It was with great relief on February 22 of this year that I heard the statement of the chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee with reference to the committee study of life insurance. At that time the committee chairman stated that nothing in the hearing and nothing in the testimony which had been developed was to be considered as a basis for the fears which have been disseminated that it is the purpose of the committee to nationalize or take over the insurance business. No constructive purpose could possibly be served by such a "blitzkrieg" against legitimate business.

I know that officials of your great business were not opposed to an investigation. I know, however, that you thought, as do most people, that such an investigation should not be a public trial or prosecution of the business. Such an investigation, in order to be effective, must have as its purpose a coordination of government with business, to the end that the practices of the companies and the laws of the States would be coordinated.

In Washington while that investigation was being conducted we heard a great deal about the powerful lobby which insurance companies were supposed to maintain. To my knowledge, no such powerful group existed. Similarly, I could not believe comments to the effect that insurance companies were opposed to the investigations because they did not want the details of their business made public. As far as I know, insurance companies have always spent substantial sums to inform their policyholders and the general public of the details of their business.

Furthermore, as far as I know, no insurance company of any consequence has been uncooperative with the S. E. C. to such an extent that it withheld necessary vital information.

When I read the report of the T. N. E. C. insurance investigations I was concerned with one major issue. I believe that issue serves a constructive purpose. I wanted to see that a clear, factual picture was obtained from the investigation. I believe that this picture should indicate the bearing of life insurance on the American system of economy. That, incidentally, was the objective originally stated by the chairman of the committee.

I know that every insurance company gave that objective its endorsement. It is more than unfortunate that such constructive purposes should have been lost in the shuffle of the investigation in a way which was extremely disturbing both to the policyholders and to some Members of Congress. I, for one, am not ready to accept the assumption that because a business is large it must necessarily have a rigorous control by the Federal Government. Nor do I believe that because a business is large its management must be investigated solely with a view to determining its shortcomings. In fact, the very sizable growth of any company evidences, to some degree, at least, public confidence in its integrity and its soundness.

We know that insurance companies grew in depressions when other forms of saving enterprises were curtailed. That must mean that the general public accepted the insurance company as a safe haven for money during the days of economic uncertainty.

My friends, like most of you, I am opposed to a concentration of economic power. I am opposed to a very limited control of assets. I am not convinced, however, that the insurance businesses of this Nation are guilty of such an undue concentration of economic power. As a matter of fact, there is considerable evidence to the effect that the increasing competition in the insurance business has resulted in a steady decentralization over the past few decades.

No, my friends, I cannot conclude that bigness necessarily means badness. I cannot conclude, without further evidence, that insurance companies have grown large by the use of monopolistic devices. Certainly I cannot conclude that they have grown large by throttling fair competition. There is much more evidence to indicate that they have grown large by doing a good job for the general public. The very fact that there is so much competition in the insurance business has served to prevent an undue centralization of assets. After all, we know that insurance holds the bulk of its reserves for the benefits of its policyholders, rather than for benefit of the manager.

We know that insurance does not seek economic power or control the ownership of American business. In fact, the objective is to make credit available to American business, or to the Government itself. In general, it appears as though insurance has prospered under State supervision. For the most part, I believe that such State supervision is desirable. As far as I know, State supervision has not been arbitrary or dictatorial in its action.

They have no forced, untried, and untested reforms on legitimate business. Federal Government sometimes has. Of course, under State control it is possible for companies to experiment in a manner which would be impossible under a rigid, inflexible Federal regulation.

There is another reason for State rather than Federal control of insurance companies at this time. That reason is found in the fact that insurance companies which are regulated by the State are less susceptible to control or influence by subversive groups than they would be if they were strongly centralized. By this I do not mean, incidentally, that I favor State trade barriers, nor do I mean that insurance must be controlled by classes or factional groups. I merely question the desirability of strong Federal control at this time, particularly in view of the fact that State control has thus far apparently been satisfactory to the policyholders and to the management. There may be some value to a program of Federal control, but I believe that it should not be considered casually. Such a program might conceivably involve the savings of millions of policyholders and the protections of the life estates of millions of human lives, and virtually billions of dollars of property.

I do not believe that the insurance companies of the Nation need become unduly alarmed about the report of the Temporary Economic Committee. This committee has, after all, a very limited function. It is not a legislative committee. It could not under any circumstances present to the Senate a report for legislation to go upon the Senate Calendar for action. The committee has no jurisdiction whatever to report legislation. Whatever recommendations it makes must of necessity be referred to the standing committees of the Senate and House for their consideration.

Nor do I believe that insurance companies need become unduly alarmed about any intelligent defense financing. I do believe that they should rightly fear war-finance proposals, such as the Lee bill. This bill would require registration of every citizen's gross wealth and financial obligations, including life-insurance policies.

The life-insurance companies of the Nation may well be a financial life line in these chaotic days. Your industry has a tremendous stake in America's economic future. You have a right to demand sane, long-range economic planning from your legislators, common sense and honesty.

America faces a mobilization—a mobilization of what? First, her manpower, and at best it means creating in this country such a mechanized industrial unit for production that all the world would fear to tackle us. Today—but I hope not tomorrow—force, brute force, is the only language that is understood. Therefore, we have to follow the slogan of Teddy Roosevelt; we must now speak softly but carry a big stick, a stick that would be the wonder and the awe of the world.

And looming large in the picture of mobilization is the wealth of all of us centralized in our insurance companies, and this wealth now will be used to create this mechanized American unit. All America has to be synchronized in a production that will speak loudly to the rest of the world these words—hands off of the Western Hemisphere.

We in America did not want to go into this tremendous defense race, but Hitler's invasion of all the countries in Europe has made it imperative that we do so. And isn't it fortunate that at least 64,000,000 American citizens have placed their money in these big institutions that they own, so that this money can be made indirectly available for self-defense? This must not mean conscription of wealth. This means investing the money and the wealth that has been saved through these great agencies, in a great "production plant." The money will join with the great heart and soul of America in this enterprise. Men will forget their petty differences. Labor unions will temporarily forget their legal rights to limited hours. Young men will train to become the most proficient soldiers, sailors, and sky pilots in the world so that America can defend herself in any emergency. The farmers will produce more than ever so we will not only feed our own but feed the millions whom war has raped and scourged.

Yes, we have to grow "so big" that the world will not want to tackle us. Yes, we want to grow "so big" in heart that when we get through doing for undernourished, stricken humanity, the world will love us and be willing to give heed to our counsel.

This is going to cost us something, but if we are clean in our endeavors there will be compensations. In undertaking this great venture in preparedness, we are doing it not with the idea of chastising the world or telling the other nations what they shall think, and how they shall live and what they shall do, but with one great objective in mind, and that is to build ourselves so that we will be immune from attack, and so that a devastated world can look to us for succor.

Yes, my friends, man in this period must know his government, must have a part in his government, and must appreciate his government. But more than all else, man must dedicate himself—you and I—to preserve this Government. There was a time when our schools taught the youth of the land what a great place America was. I pray God they will again—for America is a great place.

I am speaking to leaders—men whose thoughts and actions determine the course of other men and women. In our lodges, in our churches, in our business life, we help shape the lives of others, and in so doing we help shape the destiny of America.

What way will America go tomorrow? What kind of government will we have in this land tomorrow? That depends upon all of us. We have to get rid of our smugness, our complacencies. We have to see this as a great adventurous age, and by that I do not mean military adventure—I mean an age to adventure in science and in learning, to live greatly in, to explore in scientific and industrial fields, and in the realm of the spirit. If we do that, we will light a flame within ourselves and within those we contact that will never go out, and America will be a better place to live in, because, we lived, in this day and generation.

Appraising America's Strength

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. PAUL V. McNUTT

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by Hon. Paul V. McNutt, Federal Security Administrator, under the title, "Appraising America's Strength."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There is no need to remind you that we are today confronted with a grave menace to the free and peaceful mode of life which we have made for ourselves on this continent.

A century and a half ago our forefathers began here a brave experiment in liberty. Throughout the years that experiment has been validated over and over again. Democracy and freedom have, in this country, been repeatedly vindicated. In many tongues throughout many lands have reechoed the heroic achievements of men with the song of liberty on their lips and the fire of freedom in their hearts. The extraordinary achievements of ordinary men, driven by a lofty vision of their destiny, have inspired the lowly and the great wherever men have sought to liberate their spirits from the bondage of fear and oppression.

We now stand horrified at the immediate threat to the liberties of nations which, with us, have sought to establish the dignity and worth of the common man. We are consumed with apprehension lest we be the only democracy remaining to complete the death struggle with aggressors and despots. Lest we find ourselves standing at last alone in an ugly world.

But while we need a clear understanding of the gravity of our position in this harsh world we also need cool and balanced appraisal of the events which are transpiring and the task which we must perform to assure our own safety. We must not underestimate the strength of the forces of evil and destruction which have been let loose in the world or the action on our part necessary to meet them. And above all, we cannot afford to succumb to fear or risk the loss of effectiveness which comes from panic.

There is need for reassurance.

Recognizing that we, with all free men throughout the world, stand in peril of losing our liberties, we can now do with some ordinary, American self-confidence. America has been in danger before. There have been times when our very existence as a nation hung in the balance. It may be that we ought to have some good, old-fashioned Fourth of July speeches. We need to recall a little history and to remember the heroic deeds of our ancestors. The achievements of Washington and Jefferson, Lawrence and Perry, of Stonewall Jackson and Lee, and Lincoln and Grant. And the millions of common Americans, whose indomitable courage and love of liberty have carried America through every danger of the past and have met every challenge to the ideals of a free people.

Americans are not soft, and our country has not grown old and tired. The heirs and descendants of the pioneers are made of the same stuff, and can face dangers as great as those over which our forefathers so valiantly triumphed.

It is true that a mechanized army and a sky full of Stuka diving bombers cannot be stopped by an indomitable spirit alone. But we Americans have a vast reservoir of power to build ships and tanks and planes. And we are building them now. We gain confidence as we see how quickly our united effort to build up our military defenses is taking form, and how smoothly and efficiently the machinery of government and industry is already working to produce the materials necessary to our safety.

It will not take long. The magnificent and immediate response to the President's call for preparedness is the tangible and convincing answer to the dictator's taunt that democracy is a decadent form of government and an obsolescent political institution.

The heart of our defense program, let us constantly remember, is first and last a matter of working together, of standing together, and of sacrificing our own personal interests to promote the effective use of all our national powers. We are a great Nation and a rich Nation, with vast resources of material, of manpower, of machinery, and of organizing skill. Better than any nation on earth, we can afford the effort and the cost of every necessary action to defend ourselves both outside and inside our boundaries. We need only the will and the spirit of common sacrifice to bring our tremendous power into action.

America has that, too.

The country at this moment is geared high and driving hard as only a free and loyal people can drive when they sense danger to the foundations of their freedom.

Labor will do its part. Labor always does.

Labor believes in democracy, and it has never failed to exert itself completely to defend democracy. Twenty-three years ago this Nation was plunged into a titanic struggle to stem the tide of aggression then sweeping over Europe and threatening the foundations of liberal government everywhere.

That war was democracy's war and it was labor's war. The unselfish cooperation and loyalty of the Nation's workers was as important and as vital to the successful outcome of that war as the gallant heroism of the men who went over the top on the western front and met the enemy in the treacherous wilds of the Argonne.

The emergency which today confronts us finds labor again ready and willing to furnish the necessary manpower to build up and maintain our defenses. America knows it can count on labor—on the individual worker, doing his essential and vital bit to make the machines and supplies for the armed forces, and on the organizations of labor, steeped in the fundamental doctrines of the political philosophy of the American people.

And the country can count on American business. The great industrial plants of the Nation have been placed at the call of the Government. The great leaders of industry are at the people's service. The best organizing skill and the finest production management are being used to plan and promote the program which will make America the best armed and best equipped nation in this confused and disordered world. There is here the same splendid loyalty and patriotism that is found in the ranks of labor.

Neither labor nor business is trying to take advantage of the national emergency. There is no selfish attempt, on the one hand, to hold up the agencies of production by unreasonable wage demands nor, on the other hand, to reduce wages or introduce the stretch-out. Reason and patriotism brings a black-out of the bitterness of industrial strife when the national security is in peril.

The first elements of strength, therefore, the loyal and intelligent patriotism of labor and business, have already been shown to be intact. Now we must look beyond the immediate needs of the Army and Navy and begin to check up every aspect of American strength or weakness. Let us remember that the danger which thunders along the horizon of the world is the danger of total war, and to meet that danger we shall have to establish and maintain total preparedness.

To meet the challenge of dictatorships, America will need to understand their power. Especially do we need to understand Nazi power and Nazi resources. Unless we can match our own strength against the strength of the dictators at every point, we may find our defenses outflanked at some point of fatal weakness.

The strength of Germany is not only in the army and the air force. It is also on the home fronts. As nearly as we know, the German Government has not spent more than 20 percent of the whole productive capacity of the nation for military armament. The rest of the nation's economic power is used for building up the internal resources of Germany for fighting disease, for feeding the children, for clearing the slums, for putting German agriculture on a sound basis, for every kind of internal strength and economic power. If Germany fails to conquer the world, it will not be for lack of efficient and thrifty use of all her resources at points where they do her the most good.

We shall be deceived if we think Germany's financial position is weak—that it is liable to collapse. Germany has no financial position in a time like this. Having no financial position at all, the nation has none to maintain. In the Nazi economy only real things count. Nazi leaders realize that when it comes to the final test, nothing counts except material and human strength. Tanks and airplanes are only the cutting edge. Back of them are factories and farms, and back of everything are the people. How much skill, how much physical endurance, how much courage have the people on both sides of the great battle line in France, where the next thousand years of history may be decided this month?

As we turn now to the building of airplanes and guns, we must suffer no weak points behind the lines of our own military defenses. It is time to reinforce every fiber of our country and every sinew of our national strength.

The United States is not going to spend for military preparedness anything like 20 percent of the national income. We are probably not able to spend 10 percent the first year of our effort. We are so much richer than Germany that we do not need so large a proportion of our income for arms alone.

It is true that we have fallen behind in building battleships and airplanes, for the excellent reason that the American people had no reason to believe in advance of recent events that ships and planes in great numbers would ever be needed. But we have not neglected the more fundamental problems of our physical and human resources, on which all military strength, in the long run, must be founded. Here is the real foundation of national power. And for the work of upbuilding during these past years we can now be profoundly grateful.

We do not regret that during the past 7 years we have had 2,400,000 boys in our C. C. C. camps. These boys have sweated in the hot sun to plant nearly 2,000,000,000 trees, and in the searing breath of forest conflagrations to protect the wealth of our country. They have learned to drive trucks and to handle machinery. They have learned to live and work together and to respond to the discipline of camp life. They have a stake in the country because they have helped to protect and build it. In time of need some of them will fight; others will man the factories, where strong, keen men are needed. We do not regret that we have given these boys their chance to grow into strong, disciplined men with a devotion to their country which comes only from having had a part in building and preserving it.

Our only regret now is that we did not have twice as many C. C. C. camps.

Nor do we regret the N. Y. A. or the money invested in youth training. It is reassuring to think of the two and one-half million boys and girls who have obtained the education that they could not have had without the N. Y. A. Hundreds of thousands of young people would have sat at home in idleness and despair if the N. Y. A. had not given them a chance to stay in school. Other hundreds of thousands would still be without skills to work if the N. Y. A. had not given them a job where they could obtain training as mechanics, welders, machine tenders, photographers, and other skills which may now be used in the cause of freedom.

These great programs for building the strength of our Nation were not begun as military preparedness. They were as valuable in peace as they will be if we are engulfed in the madness of war. But the threat of war puts every part of the Nation to the test, whether it is an element of soundness or an element of weakness. Insofar as we have been able to build up our resources and our people in these past years, we have built strength into the body and bones of America; insofar as we have only partially done that work, we have failed to realize our full powers.

Today, in the pressure of world crisis, with the flames of war in the east and in the west, we must not hesitate or slip back. On the contrary, in these days, we must use every ounce of our strength. We cannot let any worker remain idle now. No young person can be told today that he is not needed. America needs all its people and all their labor and all their loyalty.

We have no regrets now because our Government has begun the work of curing the ills of American agriculture; no regrets because, after the great dust storms, the Government men moved in and began to save the land threatened by the marching desert; nor because the Soil Conservation Service has established full protection on more than 50,000,000 acres of land, so that neither wind nor water can carry it away. We do not regret that thousands of sharecroppers and tenant farmers have already been put on their feet and have started to build up their own stake in the country and to realize the personal privileges of living under democracy.

We have done much to build a sound foundation for American farming. We wish we could have invested more money and could have made faster progress. Certainly today we must not fall behind. On the contrary, we must speed our work of salvage and rebuilding.

We are not sorry that our Government has broken the log jam of high costs that kept American farmers from having electricity. We rejoice that today electric lines reach 1 farmhouse in 4, whereas only 1 farmer in 10 had electric power in 1934. It is comforting to know that the T. V. A. has worked out the manufacturing processes that will bring cheap phosphate fertilizer to every farm in America, and that hundreds of thousands of farmers are working with Government electricity and Government fertilizer to save their farms and their soil and to build a sound agriculture in America. We shall need a sound agriculture in the new world that may lie ahead of us.

It is also good to remember how the Government took action to save the farmers from losing their farms during the emergency of the depression. We all regret that the fundamental soundness of agriculture was so long neglected; that so many evils were allowed to develop; that American farmers by the millions were caught by soil erosion, by duststorms, by falling world markets, by technology. But who is there now who regrets the mighty efforts of the past years to eradicate these evils and to mitigate their effects?

With all the confusion and distress of the great depression, with all the casualties that were suffered and that still are to be seen along the roads where the migrants wander, still we know that our Government has made a heroic effort to restore the balance in agriculture, and we know that we cannot afford to slacken that effort at a time when agriculture becomes vital to the national security.

This is not the time to desert any individual or any county or any State that is in trouble. We look with mingled horror and pity at the long lines of homeless refugees lining the roads of Europe. We cannot afford to have refugees crowding our own roads, despairing of hope in democracy. We have no regrets for what we have already done to help the farmers of America. We regret only that we were unable to do more.

And who is there now who will regret the public works of the past 7 years? The T. V. A., which has built up the power resources of a great inland valley, far from our coast lines, where we need to have a great nucleus of strength in case of emergency? Who regrets the money that we spent on flood-control works on the Ohio, on the Tennessee, on the Mississippi, on the Colorado, now when this country cannot risk the tragedy of further flood disasters and losses? And the great power dams on the Columbia? And the inland waterway of the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, which today carries twice the tonnage that it carried before our railroad systems were built? And who is not grateful for the water-supply systems and the sewer systems that we have built during these depression years to protect the people against typhoid fever and other diseases?

All these resources are now available for America's protection. We regret only that we do not have more. Now we must hasten these and all other lines of defense to make up as well as we can for lost time.

It is also good to remember how the Government took action to save the farmers from losing their farms during the emergency of the depression. We all regret that the fundamental soundness of agriculture was so long neglected, that so many evils were allowed to develop, that American farmers by the millions were caught by soil erosion, by dust storms, by falling world markets, by technology. But who is there now who regrets the mighty efforts of the past years to eradicate these evils and to mitigate their effects?

And we know that we cannot afford to slacken that effort at a time when agriculture becomes vital to the national security.

This is not the time to desert any individual or any county or any State that is in trouble. We look with mingled horror and pity at the long lines of homeless refugees lining the roads of Europe. We cannot afford to have refugees crowding our own roads, despairing of hope in democracy. We have no regrets for what we have already done to help the farmers of America. We regret only that we were unable to do more.

And who is there now who will regret the public works of the past 7 years? The T. V. A. which has built up the power resources of a great inland valley, far from our coast lines, where we need to have a great nucleus of strength in case of emergency? Who regrets the money that we spent on flood-control works on the Ohio, on the Tennessee, on the Mississippi, on the Colorado, now when this country cannot risk the tragedy of further flood disasters and losses? All these resources are now available for America's protection. We regret only that we do not have more. Now we must hasten these and all other lines of defense, to make up as well as we can for lost time.

Then there are the $11,000,000,000 in the past 7 years used to keep millions of our fellow citizens employed. We will shortly now rely heavily upon the skills and morale and loyalty of those millions to whose rescue a liberal and humanitarian government came in the hour of depression. We are reassured with the knowledge that these same citizens will now come to the aid of their Government in its hour of need.

And what of the millions of dollars invested in highways and roads? We need vast fleets of mechanized and mobile units for the Military Establishment. But the efficiency and the patriotism of American industry will supply these needs far quicker than we could construct the highways over which they are to operate in their country's defense.

All the investments of the past 7 years in America now stand us in good stead. Ill prepared would we be to face the task we are now undertaking were it not for the great start we had made to make secure the underpinning of the Nation. We know that the foundation is firm.

Upon that solid foundation we now put forth a supreme effort to make our country impregnable. And Americans are meeting the challenge.

Men born free do not readily submit to chains. Indeed, they do not endure them at all. No price is too high, no sacrifice of money, effort, or life itself too great for the preservation of liberties once enjoyed.

America is equal to the test. We are demonstrating what an alert, vigilant, and aroused democracy can do when danger is sensed. We, too, can be relentlessly scientific and realistic about our safety when aggressors are on the march.

There is nothing soft or defeatist about the descendants of Old Hickory, or Daniel Boone, or George Rogers Clark, or General Custer, or Sam Houston, or Davy Crockett, or a long line of heroes from Valley Forge to the Argonne.

There are a hundred and thirty million people in the United States who know what it is worth to them to live in a country which, since its birth, has been the freest place under God's sun to live; who know what it means to be able to think freely, speak freely, write freely, and worship freely according to their conscience and their convictions; men and women and children, of all races and creeds, bound together by the indissoluble bonds of a common liberty and a common country and a common flag; a hundred and thirty million people who realize the incomparable privilege of living under a government which recognizes each and every single one of them as a human being, endowed with the inalienable rights of a individual, entitled to life and physical security and spiritual freedom; a government which recognizes the inviolability of the physical person, the sanctity of his intellectual being, and his individual right to pursue happiness for himself and his loved ones; a government which in times of distress will help him to do these things according to his own inclinations and desires.

When you have a people like that—a people who know why they are here, how they got here, what it cost in human sacrifice and bloodshed; when you have a people who freely acknowledge their debt to the past and firmly resolve to discharge their trusteeship for the future by the same unselfish sacrifice and loyalty—when you have such a people, aggressors will count well the cost of threatening the security and freedom of the proud Nation which claims their affection and their loyalty.

With such a nation and such a people, there will be no fear. A united and determined America faces the unknown future with confidence and courage. In that unity and in that confidence lies the assurance that democracy will prevail here; that our destiny is secure.

The Generation That Was Duped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, whenever anyone on the floor or the Senate or elsewhere states that America entered the World War because it was duped by propaganda, or that its motive was mercenary, I see red. A more sensible reaction is to offer argument and proof to the contrary.

Accordingly I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an illuminating discussion of this question from the pen of Walter Lippmann.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GENERATION THAT WAS DUPED

A few days after the Nazi invasion of western Europe, Mr. Ernest Lindley explained in a column why he, formerly a convinced isolationist, had come swiftly to the conclusion that "we have ample reason to oppose Hitlerized Germany" by giving assistance to the Allies. "My answer is, bluntly," he wrote, "that we have not prepared ourselves against the downfall of British sea power."

In making this statement, Mr. Lindley, who is 41 years old, went on to say that his generation, the World War generation, as he calls it, do not respond to the "moral" judgments of the older men, but only to concepts of national interest. Therefore, as long as the older men were complaining about aggression, lawlessness, faithlessness, oppression, Mr. Lindley was too realistic to be moved. But when he saw that Hitler might destroy or capture the British Fleet and obtain possession of its shipyards and its bases, Mr. Lindley understood the danger to this hemisphere, and instantly abandoned the isolationist doctrine which he had held until a few weeks ago.

The question I should like to put to Mr. Lindley, and also to discuss myself, is this: Why did he, and those of his generation who have thought as he does, fail to understand the American national interest until it was so nearly fatally imperiled by the Allied military disaster in Belgium and Flanders? They are, he has told us, too realistic and too sophisticated to be bamboozled by any idea which is not directly concerned with the physical security and economic well-being of the American people. For 20 years they have specialized in making themselves hard-boiled, buncombe-proof, unbamboozleable, antiseptic to flag waving, deaf to the bugles, so that they would never be deceived about the real national interest of this country. Yet after this careful education in realism, it was not until Hitler was at the Channel ports that Mr. Lindley discovered that we have a national interest in the maintenance of British sea power and that "we have not prepared ourselves against the downfall of British sea power."

Must he not confess, if he means to be candid, that what he thought was cold realism has proved to be a curtain which hid from him the truth, the very truth about our national interest, which he so confidently believed he was specially trained to discern? I am sure he will not wish to confuse the question by saying that he was misled into believing that the Allied defenses would stand better than they have. That is not the point. If, as he now says, it is our national interest that British sea power should not fall, then it was also our national interest 2 months ago when the Allied defenses were still intact. Yet until those defenses were broken, Mr. Lindley did not tell his readers that the American national interest was involved. In other words, as a young realist he saw our national interest only when it was already very dangerously imperiled. Is it not evident that Mr. Lindley and those who think as he does have been somehow bamboozled while they supposed that they had learned to debunk all things?

What is it that has prevented the young realists from being realistic until it is very nearly too late? It is, I submit, that the post-war generation have been duped by a falsification of American history. They have been miseducated by a swarm of innocent but ignorant historians, by reckless demagogues, and by foreign interests, into believing that America entered the other war because the British propaganda, the loans of the bankers, the machinations of President Wilson's advisers, and a drummed-up patriotic ecstasy. They have been taught to believe that anyone who challenges this explanation of 1917 and insists that America was defending American vital interests is himself a victim or an agent of British propaganda.

Yet the history which Mr. Lindley's generation have been taught is false history. It is not true that America entered the World War because of the British propaganda or the British loans. America entered the World War because Germany's declaration of unlimited submarine warfare threatened to blockade and starve the Allies and to destroy British sea power. I venture to say this categorically and on the basis of direct personal knowledge of what determined President Wilson's decision.

In February 1917 I was an editor of the New Republic, a paper which has in recent years devoted many of its energies to proving to Mr. Lindley's generation that its founders were misguided fools. In February 1917 the editors of the New Republic knew at first hand what was in President Wilson's mind, and this is what they wrote in the issue of February 17, 1917, under the title "The Defense of the Atlantic World":

"The safety of the Atlantic highway is something for which America should fight. Why? Because on the two shores of the Atlantic Ocean there has grown up a profound web of interest which joins together the western world. Britain, France, Italy, even Spain, Belgium, Holland, the Scandinavian nations, and Pan America are in the main one community in their deepest needs and their deepest purposes. They have a common interest in the ocean which unites them. They are today more inextricably bound together than most even as yet realize. But if that community were destroyed, we should know what we had lost. We should understand then the meaning of the unfortified Canadian frontier, of the common protection given Latin America by the British and American fleets. And now that she (Germany) is seeking to cut the vital highways of our world, we can no longer stand by. We cannot betray the Atlantic community by submitting. If not civilization, at least our civilization, is at stake.

"A victory on the high seas would be a triumph of that class which aims to make Germany the leader of the east against the west, the leader ultimately of a German-Russian-Japanese coalition against the Atlantic world."

Mr. Lindley will remember that those words were written before our entrance into the other war, and in the light of what he realized just 2 weeks ago, I ask him which of the generations, the war or the post-war, saw the more realistically the vital interest of America in the maintenance of British sea power?

No doubt it will be said in retort that since President Wilson regarded the maintenance of British sea power as a vital American interest, he was obviously himself the victim of British propaganda. But those who say this are merely betraying their abysmal ignorance of American history.

Even they will agree, I think, that if there has ever been a true American who was not likely to be the victim of British propaganda, that man was Thomas Jefferson. He was the author of the Declaration of Independence. During his life he twice supported an American war against England. Along with Washington he provided the ideas and the very phrases which from the founding of the Republic have defined the separation of the American from the European political system.

In 1823 the victorious Holy Alliance was threatening to reconquer the Spanish colonies in this hemisphere which had recently proclaimed their independence. Simultaneously, to the west of us Russia was threatening to extend its power from Alaska down the Pacific coast. Then, as now, this hemisphere was threatened on both sides by a coalition of victorious imperial states, and it was under those conditions that President Monroe, acting through our Minister in London, entered into negotiations with Canning, the British foreign secretary. The negotiations began in August 1823, and the results reached Washington on October 9, 1923. They provided for some kind of joint American and British policy to forbid the Holy Alliance to enter this hemisphere.

President Monroe sent the documents to Jefferson, who studied them for a week and replied that while "America, North and South, have a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and particularly her own," there is "one nation" which "could disturb us in this pursuit; she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition we detach her from the bands, bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate a continent at one stroke, which might otherwise linger long in doubt and difficulty." Supported by Jefferson's approval, President Monroe, in a message to Congress on December 2, 1823, proclaimed the Monroe Doctrine.

So I suggest to Mr. Lindley that in recognizing the American interest in British sea power, he is not the victim of British propaganda and of hysterical chatter. He is seeing what Wilson saw 25 years ago and what Jefferson and Madison and Monroe saw more than a hundred years ago, long, long before Lord Lothian came to Washington.

Graduation Exercises, George Washington University

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN THOMAS

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY EUGENE M. LERNER

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered in Washington this week by Eugene M. Lerner, president of the class of 1940, in connection with the graduation exercises at the George Washington University. This speech, I believe, is typical of the reaction of American youth to the war some people are asking them to fight. Theirs is a patriotic desire, filled with the highest idealism and love of country, to save the democracy that they know our going to war would destroy.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is time for the senior class to say goodbye. It is time for the class of 1940 to say farewell. We leave the George Washington University for a world at war, and what we young people are told about the war situation does not make for strong, forward, virile steps after we leave our university.

I know the class of 1940 in this university and all the other universities of the country love America and its democratic institutions as much as the older citizens of the Nation do, and we are disturbed, just as our professors and political leaders are, about the challenge of democratic institutions seen in the totalitarian states of Germany, Italy, and Russia.

This concern for our country was indicated in the petition against America's entry into the present European war signed by 1,400 Yale University students. A dean at Yale, in disagreement with the 1,400 signers, called them "confused," and urged upon the Nation's leaders a program which would make for eventual participation in Europe's latest struggle.

The horror expressed by our college leaders at student expression of this kind is not, in my opinion, well founded. For if these 1,400 students—as well as millions of others over the Nation—reach the conclusion that America must stay out of war, these conclusions have come from what was taught them in the classroom openly, freely, and certainly by patriotic faculty members. In our college life, we have been taught again and again—and we see with our own eyes—the failure of the World War and how it brought the bitterness of today rather than the democracy we were supposed to secure forever. We have been taught in every classroom that the World War was responsible for the tragic, inhumane depression period from 1929 to this day. Our professors have told us—and we need only to observe and we will see the truth of their teaching—that we are still economically unstable, still uncertain of our own future, still faced with tremendous problems that must be settled if we are to progress. Surely the logical conclusion based upon academic learning and the words of true American teachers is that America, especially because of its experience in the last war and its present instability, must stay out of the contemporary conflict.

We may cry out inside of us, passionately and righteously, against the slaughter and the inhumanity seen in Europe today; but we must remember that we can neither impress upon Europe or any continent of the world the principles we believe in, nor can we maintain those principles for ourselves if we enter this second horrible World War. If our professors and our political leaders refuse to consider what this war will do to our democratic system and our democratic faith, surely the class of 1940 must do so. All over the country, graduates are being told that it is their world. All of the graduates want to give to this world; all of us want to give to our friends, our community, and our country. I know I would be glad to give my life to rid the world forever of the horrors of totalitarianism. But it would be useless, for we can only give in positive pursuits and not in death and killing. We can only give by using our reason and not in sacrificing everything in a moment of blinding passion. We can only give by thinking—always, always, thinking—of the future. We must always remember to love American democracy more than we hate anything. We can make no progress through intolerance, or murder, or hate, or war. If we love America, if we love its civilization, its dream for humanity, its opportunity for a final realization of those great hopes that have lived on in spite of Pharoahs, crucifixions, inquisitions, and totalitarian states, we will remember what we have learned and we will not risk our bitter experiences of the past 300 years and the greatness we can achieve on a gamble which military victories can never win.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 12.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 12, 1940]

THE ANSWER TO MR. ROOSEVELT

We strongly urge every reader to study carefully the remarkable article on national defense printed in the Mirror of Public Opinion today.

To those who may have been moved by the President's eloquent and bellicose address of Monday this article will provide an antidote of realism. The article, in fact, supplies the answer to Mr. Roosevelt's reckless speech, and to the pleas of the war hawks who openly urge that the United States plunge into the European inferno.

To readers who have not been swept off their feet by the crusading spirit of the Roosevelt harangue, the article offers reassurance that they are eminently right in opposing intervention, and provides an arsenal of facts for resisting the war pressure of the tense days that are ahead.

Representative Ross A. COLLINS, of Mississippi, from whose address in the House these extracts are taken, knows the United States Army's weaknesses perhaps better than any other civilian. He has been pounding away for 20 years to have them corrected. But, today, he finds that the Army is about as well equipped to withstand a new model "blitzkrieg" as were the forces of Poland or Holland.

Where does this leave Mr. Roosevelt with his tacit threat to Mussolini, as disclosed by the President himself in his speech Monday, that this country would get into the European war if Italy did? It leaves him with his bluff called, holding a pair of deuces against two dictators with a royal flush apiece.

Mr. COLLINS' analysis deals only with the Army, however, and the war hawks just now are talking chiefly about sending the Navy and the air force to Europe. All right; there is expert testimony on their status, too.

The Post-Dispatch has published in recent weeks three detailed articles on the capacities of our fighting forces' three major divisions. What does this analysis show?

First, the Navy: It is a first-rate navy, but its major policy is still fixed on the theory that battleships possess supremacy over the airplane. Even so, light is breaking. Ex-Secretary Edison confessed before a committee that today he would not think of building vessels like the 6 battleships under construction. As it is, every battleship now in service is more than 16 years old, and 10 are 20 years old or more. The age and slowness of auxiliary craft are acknowledged by Admiral Stark as "among the greatest deficiencies of our fleet." Reserve stocks of all kinds are dangerously low. Drydocks are inadequate in number. Submarine defenses are imperfect.

The darting, powerfully weaponed craft of Germany and Italy could work plenty of havoc on such a navy. Furthermore, as the Senate Naval Committee pointed out in a report reprinted in part on this page Sunday, if Germany can destroy British sea power, it can also overcome the American fleet if that fleet were operating far from its bases.

What about our aviation? The Army and Navy together have 2,707 fighting planes, of which 1,128 are obsolete or obsolescent. To send the celebrated B–18 bomber against modern equipment "would be suicide," says Major General Arnold. The flying fortresses, pride of the Air Corps, have three fatal defects, for they lack antileak tanks, armored pilot seats, and ordnance firing explosive shells. Neither Army nor Navy has a single reserve plane. The President demands 50,000 more planes, but it takes from 2 to 3 years to train a first-class combat pilot, and there is an average of fewer than 1,500 students in the Army and Navy flying schools.

What could such an air force as that do against the swarms of deadly modern planes possessed by Germany and Italy?

Before entering upon a crusade in Europe it would be well for war-minded citizens to ask what military resources we have to make such a crusade successful. It would take a year or more to manufacture the mechanical equipment the Army needs, Mr. COLLINS points out, and only then can the men be adequately trained in their use.

In short, this country is not now equipped to wage modern warfare. To suggest sending our young men, with little more than courage to defend them, against dive-bombers, 60-ton tanks, and flame throwers is the most vicious kind of loose thinking under the circumstances.

Americans, horrified by the tragic events abroad, can keep their emotions from carrying them to disaster if they consider the cold, hard facts.

Reclamation Needs of Idaho

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN THOMAS

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

LETTER FROM E. W. RISING AND ADDRESS BY H. W. MORRISON

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter I have received from Mr. E. W. Rising, together with an address by Mr. H. W. Morrison before the Idaho State Reclamation Association at its meeting at Twin Falls. Mr. Morrison has presented an excellent picture of some of the reclamation needs of Idaho and the lack of consideration these needs have too frequently received.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1940.

Hon. JOHN THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: May I present you with a copy of the address of Mr. H. W. Morrison, president of Southwestern Idaho Water Conservation Projects, Inc., before the annual meeting of the Idaho State Reclamation Association on May 18, 1940. I am sure you will find this a most informative document regarding Idaho reclamation history and our future needs.

Mr. Morrison states in a concise manner the reasons why supplemental water is needed for a large proportion of Idaho lands—changing cycles, with period containing more dry years; deforestation of watersheds, permitting earlier run-off, with correspondingly longer period of irrigation from storage water, and raising of more root crops; need of more fall pasture, being among the reasons given.

* * * * * * *

I will consider it a particular favor if you will find time to read Mr. Morrison's address in full, and then I shall desire to discuss with you plans for future action.

Thanking you, I am,

Yours very truly,

E. W. RISING.

AN ADDRESS BY H. W. MORRISON BEFORE THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE IDAHO STATE RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION, TWIN FALLS, IDAHO, MAY 18, 1940

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen, it is my pleasure and privilege to meet here today with friends of Idaho reclamation.

I have been requested to tell you something of the proposed program of the Southwestern Idaho Water Conservation Project, Inc. Before outlining details thereof, permit me to briefly sketch the history of Federal participation in Idaho reclamation.

HISTORY OF FEDERAL RECLAMATION IN IDAHO

Surveys for our first Federal projects were undertaken following the enactment of the National Reclamation Act, in 1902 and 1903, and construction was started on the Minidoka Dam as the first unit of the Minidoka project in 1904. About the same time construction was undertaken on the Boise Diversion Dam, which is the intake of the New York Canal, and was the forerunner of the taking over of the New York Canal from a private corporation and the inclusion of same as a Federal reclamation project.

The necessity for storage reservoirs in connection with the Minidoka project was early foreseen, which resulted in the construction of the original structure of Jackson Lake Dam, completed in 1907.

Construction of the Arrowrock Dam, providing storage for the Arrowrock division of the Boise project, was undertaken in 1912 and completed about 1916. During the same period the original structure at Jackson was enlarged and rebuilt, providing a large amount of additional storage for the Minidoka project and the Upper Snake River area.

Following this Black Canyon Dam, being the key unit of the Payette division of the Boise project, was completed in 1926.

The American Falls Dam, stabilizing the water supply for the Upper Snake River area and the Minidoka and Twin Falls projects, was completed in 1927.

Following completion of the Black Canyon Dam on the Payette division, it was promptly apparent that storage water was necessary to stabilize the power development at the Black Canyon Dam, which resulted in the construction of Deadwood Dam, completed in 1930.

With the completion in 1930 of the Deadwood Dam, we note that the active construction of additional storage reservoirs and the aggressive expansion of new acreage in Idaho came to a halt, with the exception of the construction of the Ashton Reservoir and the minor works in the Upper Snake, completed in 1938 and 1939, and which works were, comparatively speaking, of minor importance.

ECONOMIC RESULTS OF RECLAMATION DEVELOPMENT

The growth of population in Idaho, so clearly presented in Mr. Strike's remarks last night, indicates an almost parallel ration between the yearly increase in new lands placed under cultivation. It is to be noted that the trend of increase, both in population and acreage under cultivation was rapid and consistent up to the decade ending in 1930, following which the growth in population leveled off in relation to the new acreage of cultivated land brought into production.

It is interesting to note that the reclamation development, following the construction of the major works previously cited, resulted in agricultural and dairying production having a cash income value to our farmers and water users in southern Idaho of approximately $75,000,000 per year, or approximately 75 percent of the total cash income value of $100,000,000 per year, which is about the average yearly production of agriculture in the entire State. Following, and parallel thereto, has been the consistent growth and increase in wealth and prosperity of our cities and industries.

ADDITIONAL SUPPLEMENTAL WATER, A VITAL NECESSITY IN SOUTHWESTERN IDAHO

Following the completion of the Arrowrock storage on the Boise and the Deadwood storage on the Payette, subsequent dry years continued to emphasize the necessity for additional supplemental water to complete an adequate supply to existing lands under cultivation in the southwestern Idaho area.

At the time of completion of Arrowrock Dam it was thought that the water supply would be ample, but time has proved the opposite. Several unforeseen factors were responsible, including, perhaps, the changing cycle of long-range dry-year periods, the deforestation of watershed lands, and most important, perhaps, the gradual changing of crop plantings growing out of a more diversified and intensive cultivation of the area, resulting in the necessity of a larger duty of water for a given area. The effect of this transformation from one- or two-crop farming to wide diversification brought about a condition wherein the holders of original stream-flow rights were faced with the necessity of being served with supplemental water to take care of the maturing late fall crops. Early water-right users along the Payette and the Boise therefore found that their original holdings, based on priority, did not protect them fully, resulting in a general realization on the part of the major portion of our water users that substantial increases must be made in the amount of available storage water to provide properly for the full maturity of late fall crops.

Many of our people have recognized this increasingly vital necessity. Efforts were made in the Boise Valley area as far back as June 1927 looking to action to start a program to increase the water supply. This took the form of resolutions passed by the board of control of the Boise project to Congress and Dr. Mead, the then Commissioner of Reclamation, requesting immediate study and consideration of reservoir sites to expand the existing supply. This was followed year after year with a continuous effort on the part of the board of control of the Boise project, without positive and final results other than the very important work of sowing the seed, laying the foundation, and obtaining preliminary investigations and surveys to a certain extent—all of which is the procedure which has been necessary in the development of any of the major projects of the West.

Attorney Lampert, for the board of control of the Boise project, can cite an amazing amount of effort expended in attempts to alleviate the situation confronting Boise project water users.

IDAHO'S RECLAMATION PROGRESS IN THE PAST DECADE AS COMPARED TO SISTER STATES

To any of us who are familiar with the development of the Western States as a whole it should be immediately apparent that our sister States have succeeded in obtaining far larger appropriations for reclamation and other major development than has been the case in Idaho. Time does not permit the discussion of what is taking place in our sister States, except in a very general way, but I am sure you will grasp the point which I am emphasizing when I recall just a few of the projects of more recent origin, such as the—

Fort Peck project in Montana	$100,000,000
Central Valley project in California	170,000,000
Grand Coulee project in Washington	394,000,000
Deer Creek project in Utah	8,000,000
Conchas project in New Mexico	20,000,000

There have generally been three sources of funds available for this development, consisting of:

First. The funds made available through the Reclamation Service revolving fund, and additional appropriations made to the reclamation for expenditure on western projects.

Second. Certain moneys allocated through the Public Works Administration, popularly known as P. W. A., which agency is no longer existent.

Third. Funds allocated through the United States Army Engineer Corps to work, embracing the multiple development of flood control, power development, and irrigation.

As to the Reclamation Service funds, approximately $470,000,000 has been available through this channel for expenditure on western projects during the last 8 years. Idaho has received less than 2 percent of these available funds which have been handed out in such generous quantities to our sister States.

When it is considered that Idaho has failed to receive any major apportionment of funds directly for reclamation, has failed to receive any major projects of the P. W. A. in the sense of the large projects which have been developed by this agency in other States, and has had no major development by the Army engineers such as our sister States have had, it is readily apparent that we have definitely failed to receive our fair proportion.

FORMATION OF SOUTHWESTERN IDAHO WATER CONSERVATION PROJECT, INC.

While we have the State reclamation association and the Governor advisory committee functioning in Idaho at this time, it was generally felt that if we were to be competitive with the surrounding States in the obtainment of a fair share of the available funds for reclamation as a whole, it was vital that we have an aggressive promotional organization representing the southwestern Idaho area. This resulted in the formation of the Southwestern Idaho Water Conservation Project, Inc., which is a nonprofit corporation, representing the area generally from Glenn's Ferry on the east to Council, Idaho, on the west, the purposes of which are:

First. To develop an adequate supplemental water supply for existing lands under cultivation in the Boise, Payette, and Weiser areas; and Second. To provide long-range planning and the development of storage reservoirs and distribution systems necessary to bring about the full utilization of all the available waters from the Snake River below Milner, the Boise, the Salmon, the Payette, and the Weiser Rivers.

The organization has a directorate consisting of 80 prominent citizens throughout the area and is supported financially by the major industries of the area, some 600 business firms having subscribed to our budget, and with an individual membership in excess of 1,000 members.

We have established a resident vice president in Washington to coordinate the activities of our group as between Washington and the Denver office of the Bureau of Reclamation. We have been working effectively with the current Congress in an effort to bring about larger appropriations for the construction of these vitally needed facilities for the purpose of providing supplemental waters as outlined in our statement of purposes and for the appropriation of adequate funds to provide for surveys and investigations throughout the State to permit follow-up in the construction of vitally necessary irrigation development.

We maintain a year-round office and headquarters at Boise devoted to the purpose of "selling" our people and keeping them "sold" on our program. The southwestern Idaho organization believes it a vital necessity, if we are to be successful, to coordinate the demands and requirements of all of the various watersheds and irrigation districts in a unified program based on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number.

NECESSITY FOR UNIFICATION OF EFFORT OF VARIOUS COMMUNITIES IN THE STATE IF WE ARE TO ACCOMPLISH MAXIMUM RESULTS

Speaking for the southwestern Idaho organization, we desire to emphasize our readiness to cooperate with the upper Snake River area or any other area who are interested in reclamation development. We definitely want it understood that we in no way expect to induce the allocation of all available funds to the southwestern area. We believe, however, that it is vitally necessary, if the State is to receive the recognition as a whole to which it is entitled in the allocation of funds from Washington, that we must aggressively go after these funds; and this can only be done by promotional organizations.

We understand that the State reclamation association is a planning organization and must devote its efforts to the welfare of the State as a whole. This is proper procedure. However, we believe that if strong promotional organizations are established in each area which it is believed can be developed, we will be successful in obtaining a far larger proportion of available funds for Idaho than could otherwise be obtained.

I would also like to suggest that there has been an overemphasis on the allocation of funds between our areas. By this I mean that we should not accept as a fair proportion for Idaho sufficient funds to undertake construction of only one project at a time. Adjacent States are receiving sufficient funds to construct two or more projects simultaneously; and when consideration is given to the remarks heretofore made about the vast sums being allocated to the majority of the Western States as compared to those received by Idaho, I feel that we are amply justified in insisting that the allocations to our State be sufficient to speed up our activities on a basis comparable to those elsewhere.

NECESSITY FOR PROVIDING FUNDS FOR INVESTIGATIONS

When we review the history of the development of the major projects in adjacent States, such as the Grand Coulee, Central Valley project in California, and elsewhere, we find that actual construction is preceded by many years of surveys and investigations and planning in an effort to obtain data which will permit determination of the lowest cost facilities.

In this connection I desire to emphasize the fact that adjacent States have been and are now making available substantial sums which can be used for matching like funds made available by the Federal Government in order to speed up this necessary preliminary survey and investigation work. Furthermore, it is important to keep in mind that those States which have funds available for matching with the Bureau of Reclamation naturally receive the preference in the allocation of Federal money to this work.

It is therefore a vital necessity that the State of Idaho provide funds for matching, in order that we may obtain our fair pro rata of Federal funds to carry on and get the necessary answers as to the proper construction at as early a date as possible.

We match funds with the Federal Government in the construction of highways, and without such an arrangement Idaho's highway program would be severely retarded. In a limited sense, the principle here is the same, since the Federal Government will expend its funds in the survey and investigation of water-utilization possibilities in those States which indicate a willingness to cooperate by matching funds for that purpose. The State of Idaho spends two to four million dollars of its own money annually on the development of highways. When we consider that the farming and dairying industry of the State as a whole produces a cash income value of $1,000,000 annually, we can better appreciate how large a stake the State has in advancing the development of water facilities.

I therefore urgently request that this meeting today go on record by the passing of proper resolutions urging our next legislature to make an appropriation of not less than $50,000 for this purpose.

CLOSING REMARKS

In conclusion, permit me to say, my friends, that those of us who have studied the results brought about by the reclamation of arid lands in the West are convinced that the future development of Idaho and its economic growth will be directly in ratio to our success in developing the use of our water resources.

Aside from our supplemental water requirements, we have vast tracts of fertile soil, ideal climate for the growing of crops, and energetic and aggressive citizens. We have available large quantities of water throughout the State now running to waste.

Our population and our wealth can be doubled during the next decade through the increase in productivity of lands now under cultivation and the bringing of new lands, if we are willing to put forth the effort and the energy to bring this about through a united, aggressive, promotional effort.

ADDRESS BY PROF. SIDNEY POST SIMPSON AT KNOX COLLEGE ALUMNI DINNER

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Prof. Sidney Post Simpson, of Harvard Law School, at the Knox College alumni dinner, on June 11, 1940, on the occasion of receiving the Knox alumni achievement award.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, President Davidson, ladies, and gentlemen, this is indeed a great honor which you are conferring upon me. When I listened to my introduction I wondered who it was that the toastmaster was talking about. But I am glad that it was meant to be I, and I deeply appreciate this award.

My original intention, when I was notified of the award and was told that I was expected to speak, was to say something about those matters with which my 23 years since leaving Knox College have mainly been concerned—the law and education. Both are very important in a normal state of affairs. But this is not a normal state of affairs. And so I am going to talk about presently important things—things important now, and which, unless dealt with now and dealt with right, may well render things of true and permanent importance quite unimportant for a very long time to come. I am going to talk about our own country.

Some of you will think that this is a fairy story that I am about to tell. And so I will begin it like a fairy story. Once upon a time, in the year 1940, there was a very rich country. It was relatively free. It was relatively prosperous. It was devoted to the arts of peace. It had most of the gold in the world. It had most of the iron. It had most of the coal. It had most of the oil. It had grown rich, fat, and sure of its own external security. Many of its people were mainly absorbed with making money and with securing material comfort. But it had churches, schools, colleges like this one, and it cherished a tradition of the freedom and dignity of man, and the maintenance of certain elemental human decencies.

Three thousand miles away, across a great ocean, were some countries something like it—less rich, mostly less free, some smaller countries perhaps more free. But there were other countries, too, countries which had ordered the lives of their people on quite a different plan. For relative freedom they substituted organized constraint. For the arts of peace they substituted the art of war. In their relations with other countries they employed a diplomacy based on propaganda and an equal readiness to make or to break promises in order to reach a desired end. For the human decencies habitually observed in other countries they substituted different ways of doing things. One of them in particular was a very efficient country, and it devoted its efficiency to developing the art of war. It had an extremely ambitious leader. That leader, indeed, was so ambitious that most people in other countries could not comprehend his ambition, even though he had put it all in a book. They thought that he was looking for more ultimate comfort for his people, for more territory, for a more adequate share of the world's raw materials, for revenge on enemies. He was looking for these things. But he was also looking for more, and so were his people—and the mass of his people were squarely behind him, partly by reason of a new system of education and partly by reason of a drastic means of dealing with those who disagreed. He was even able to persuade the women of his people to accept a definitely inferior position in his country's scheme, and he was able to enlist the enthusiastic aid of many of his people in a cruel racial persecution. He and his people were looking for power. His and their desires for power were not limited, any more than were those of Alexander, or of the Caesars, or of Napoleon. To be sure, as I have said, most people in the other countries could not or would not understand this. But such was the fact. This country was seeking to dominate the world—not part of the world, but all of the world.

So this particular country set out on its career of world conquest. It was a comparatively small country, half the size of its great, rich, fat neighbor 3,000 miles across the sea. It had been crushed in a war not many years before. It had been bankrupt and unhappy. But when this leader came into power, he was able in 6 years to undertake this career of conquest, and in 1 more year he and his people dominated or were about to dominate a continent. One by one, the less powerful first, the countries nearest were reduced to submission, sometimes by deception, sometimes by force, sometimes without resistance.

In the meantime the great, rich, fat country across the sea attended to the arts of peace and sought to help its people be happy—and while it did not succeed perfectly, it had succeeded pretty well. But it did not realize that it was in any danger. It played games, especially a game called politics, and it got very soft and very defenseless. Then one day, after it saw one smaller country after another fall into the hands of a conqueror, it began to wake up. But then it was very nearly too late. Perhaps it was too late. The country was large, it was thought by its enemies—and not without reason—to be disunited, and it still wanted to play the game called politics. Its people used little words like "Republican" and "Democrat" and "New Deal' and "that man in the White House" and "third term" and "underprivileged" and "C. I. O." and "A. F. of L." and "American business" and "retention of social gains." It had forgotten to think in terms of big words like "our country" and "American ideals," and it did not like to think at all of two very big and terrible words, "war" and "invasion." And there seemed only one answer to what would happen.

Is there only one answer? That is the question that the United States must face today, and face without any delay. And I ask you to face it with me tonight, without fear, but without self-deception.

Let us examine first the basis of the policy of which we have heard so much—that the United States must keep out of war. It is based on the assumption of a fact. Unless that fact is true, that policy is mere words. The fact which that policy assumes is that there is no practical possibility of an invasion of the continental United States. Let us examine that supposed fact.

There are three questions which we must ask. First, is an invasion of the continental United States possible, as a technical military question? Second, if such an invasion is possible, is it likely to be attempted? Third, do we want to prevent it? Let us consider each of these questions.

The answer to the first question is clear. It is "Yes." An American invasion is now a military possibility. While the considerations that compel that answer are technical military considerations, they are not hard to understand. Let me direct your attention to four things, and you can draw your own conclusions. First, the German strategy beginning in Poland, then in Norway, then in Flanders, and most recently on the Somme, is a new kind of strategy. It is fundamentally based not on defeating the opposing armies directly but on attack of rear areas and on attempts to break down the morale of the civil population. It is not like the older strategy which primarily contemplated the occupation and holding of territory. It operates rather in terms of paralyzing the adversary's circulatory and nervous systems. Second, to carry out such a strategy, where the primary purpose is destruction rather than occupation, with occupation coming later when the opposing army is paralyzed or civil morale broken, does not require large bodies of troops.

Irretrievable destruction can be accomplished by comparatively small numbers of determined men, and these people I am talking about are very determined men. The parachute corps of the German Army has been recruited by volunteering. It is a suicide assignment, and it is known to be such. And yet it has been impossible to accept anywhere near all the men who have volunteered for that service. Third, in past wars the assumption has been that a military force must keep open a line of retreat. That assumption, with respect to the present Germany Army, can no longer be made. With their strategy, and with their troops, soldiers can be sent out to do their mission of destruction—and they need not return. Hitherto our considerations of the possible vulnerability of the United States to air attack, even taking into account the geographical location of our munition plants and our industries, the fact that they are all above ground, and the ease with which the complicated organization of our great cities could be disorganized, has proceeded on the theory that planes must get here and back. Leave out the "and back," and the picture is quite different. Fourth, the Atlantic Clipper is now flying, nonstop, from Horta in the Azores to New York. At the present time heavy bombers are being delivered in England by flying them from Newfoundland. And if any of you think that this indicates merely a threat to the eastern seaboard remember for a moment the large extent of German interpenetration in Mexico which has already been accomplished.

If an American invasion is militarily practicable, as it is, will it be attempted? Here again I want to call your attention to some concrete facts. One fact is the character of the ambition of Nazi Germany and its systematic refusal to be hampered by considerations of humaneness or honor. Another is the real and inescapable conflict of interest, both material and ideological, between the United States and an ambitious and expanding Germany. This, indeed, may very well be a case where not the country but the world cannot exist half slave and half free. Moreover, this country is a rich prize in its own right. And, especially at the present time in Rome, the prospect of an American conquest is being boasted of by responsible German officials and intervention in American affairs is being talked of by the Italians.

This brings us to the third question: Do we want to prevent an American invasion? I heard one man say in New York City the other day that he would rather have Hitler than Roosevelt. I do not think he really would, and I do not think he had the slightest idea of what that would actually mean. Be that as it may, in this place and with this audience, I think I need do no more than mention our country's historic devotion to the basic ideal of freedom, including the notion of equality between men and women of which this institution is a symbol, our American devotion to Christianity and religious freedom, and our American reluctance to become a subject race.

Thus, if you are willing to face the actual situation, the supposed fact which has been the basis for this talk about America's keeping out of the war is not a fact at all. The question is not whether we can keep America out of war, but whether we can keep war out of America. We have been hearing much talk in recent months about "not sending our boys to die in France." My friends, if I have to defend the United States—and I am, and for over 20 years have been, an officer in the Reserve Corps of the United States Army—I would far rather do it in France than in New York or California or Illinois. We do not want Chicago bombed like Paris. Of course, too, no one is suggesting that we should now send troops to France. We have not enough to send to do any good. Our whole Regular Army ready for active service in the continental United States is about one-fourth the size of what was the army of the Netherlands. The thing that would be helpful now is planes, guns, and financial assistance.

You will think that I have painted a dark picture. I have, because that is the picture. Some of you will think that I am an alarmist, because that is what you want to think. I am not an alarmist. I am a realist. In military operations—and this in essence is a military operation forced upon us through no fault of our own—one must consider not merely what the enemy is most likely to do, but what is the most dangerous thing that he can do, and then one must take sufficient and prompt steps to meet that most dangerous possibility. If these steps be taken, and taken in time, then that dangerous possibility either will not happen or it may be defeated.

The most dangerous present possibility is some such form of invasion as I have suggested. But there are other possibilities equally dangerous even if less immediate. We have no idea yet what will be the situation of the British Navy, nor have we had time to consider yet what would happen if the British Government moved to Canada. We do not know what disposition will be made, in the event of a German victory in Europe, of the other British and French possessions near us. Developments of this nature may change things—and not for the better. Moreover, the present South American situation is ominous, as is that in Mexico, and the situation in the Far East is loaded with dynamite.

Some of my friends on the eastern seaboard have said to me that the Middle West is not interested in these things. I have never believed it, and I do not believe it now. We middle westerners can be depended upon when our country is in danger.

What can we do? We can do three things—each of us can do three things—

1. We can use all the power each of us has to make effective present efforts to send immediate aid to the Allies. This European battle may well be simply a desperate delaying action by our own outpost, and it may be that the outpost is doomed. That outpost will fight to the last. If you need evidence, look at the amazing gallantry of the recent retreat from Flanders and the present defense on the Somme. The outpost may win. If so, the United States will never be assailed. But even if the outpost does not win, its present fight is giving us time—and we desperately need time. So we must help the Allies to hold on as long as they possibly can.

2. We must give every support in the power of each of us to the President's preparedness program. There are people who have hindered it; there are people who have delayed it; there are people who have argued about it. Some of these people have done this in partisan terms. But this is not a partisan problem. This is an American problem. We can also support efforts for compulsory military service in time to do some good. I don't want the soldiers in my outfit to die without having a chance.

3. We can stop talking and thinking in political terms. I am by inheritance a Republican. I voted against Roosevelt in 1932 and again in 1936. But I have very great difficulty in understanding some of the reactions—and they are not Republican alone—to the present efforts of the President of the United States to secure the powers necessary to make possible the defense of our country. I must suppose that these reactions derive from ignorance. If they do not derive from ignorance, they are very close to treason. This is no time to snipe at the Commander in Chief.

We must realize now that this is a really critical situation, that time is of the essence, that the next 6 months, or even less, may well be decisive, that a real and visible national unity is immediately essential. It will be a very tough job to win this fight. The way the game is being played now we have a beautiful chance of losing. We can still win if we act quickly enough. Let us act, and act now.

RADIO ADDRESS OF RAYMOND J. KELLY, NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the attitude of the American Legion in respect to the emergency of the moment is of interest to the Nation and to the membership of the House of Representatives. War, and all of its terrible consequences, to the Legionnaire is not just a theory but a stern and ugly reality. He knows the horrors of war.

On Monday evening, June 10, 1940, Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, delivered a most timely address over the radio facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. from Chicago, Ill., an address in which the considered opinion of the more than 1,000,000 members of this great patriotic fraternity in reference to the war overseas and our relation to it was revealed to the country.

Among those that have risen to national leadership in the American Legion, no one is held in greater respect nor warmer affection than is the one whose voice was heard by the American people on the occasion to which I have just referred. Because of the esteem in which his every expression is received, I am happy indeed to be able to offer the text of his address for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this day's proceedings.

The unanimous consent of the membership having been indicated, Mr. Kelly's address follows:

Good evening, everybody: The chief question occupying the people of our Nation this evening its what to do about the war in Europe, and the peace that must some day follow. None of us, I think, can prophesy with any great degree of certainty the ultimate outcome of the wars now raging. All of us, I think, are in agreement when we discuss the horrible rape of individual liberties and the destruction of small nations which have come from the spread of the totalitarian powers.

We have seen clearly what can happen when nations neglect their defenses, when pseudo-liberality is encouraged, when the "fifth column" is tolerated. We know now what occurs when communism, nazi-ism, and fascism are placed at the controls.

The question is whether you and I are willing to accept our individual responsibilities in shaping the course the United States will follow. Nothing, I believe, is to be gained from taking a hysterical view of the situation. Keeping first things first we must root our course in sane thinking. The time for wishful thinking is past. Vain boasting about our undeveloped but potentially great military strength will avail us little. Loose talk about our neighbors will butter no parsnips.

Within the past few days I have addressed a written message to the more than 1,000,000 members of the American Legion. In it I have called their attention to the soundness of the position of the Legion. Every great danger now troubling the people of our country heretofore has been the occasion for discussion and action by the American Legion.

These dangers, as I see them, are wrapped in a now familiar package. They include the things in store for us if our Nation abandons its neutrality completely; the plight of our national defense unless there is complete unity in strengthening our Army, our Navy, and our air forces; the weakness arising from continued failure to accept the principle of universal service in time of war; what may come from continued complacence in handling the enemy within who never ceases to work for the spread of alien ideologies; how we will fare if there is any slackening of the individual effort to unite for the common defense to show the world that our Republic within a democracy can meet any emergency.

In my message to the legionnaires, speaking as their national commander, I have presumed to speak with some degree of authority because consistently, in the past, the Legion called the turn and pointed the way of sanity for handling many of these problems now confronting the United States.

For 21 long years the Legion raised its voice to the highest pitch in the effort to rouse the Nation to the need for an adequate national defense. Few listened to us.

Since 1922, the Legion has had a definite program looking toward universal service. In the event this country ever becomes involved in another war our plan would deprofitize such a conflict, leaving special privilege for none, equal service for all.

Knowledge of the existence of subversive influences, apparently just now penetrating the public consciousness under the modern description of "fifth column" is neither new nor novel to the Legion. It is only lately we have had public acceptance of the dangers from such influences.

The definite complacence of America in a world rapidly becoming an armed camp with high explosive potentialities has occasioned dismay in the Legion for many years. Few heeded our warnings.

The 1939 Chicago National Convention of the American Legion demanded that Congress stay in session during the emergency. The emergency is even more grave now than it was at the time of the Chicago convention. In my message to the Legion, I stressed the importance of having our Senators and Representatives stay in the Nation's Capital so long as national and international affairs are on a 24-hour basis. We are hopeful the country will join with us in asking Congress to remain where it can give constant attention to the needs of the hour.

In my belief, the most menacing factor to the safety of the United States arises from within our borders rather than without. Our house must be set in order. But the neglect of years cannot be corrected in a few short minutes, hours, or days. What must be done will be done—if a determined and united Nation sets its will to the task.

Let us face the fact that "communazi" conspirators seeking to undermine and destroy our institutions are fanatics. The truth as we know it is not in them. Reasonable treatment has no effect upon them and but serves to embolden and encourage them in their efforts.

We have been told that far-reaching suppressive measures against flourishing domestic ideological conspiracies might injure innocent people. In my belief the good of the whole Nation compels summary action to be taken by our properly constituted Federal, State, and local authorities to stamp out in their entirety the activities of these subverters. Such action is needed irrespective of what may happen to their fellow travelers or innocent bystanders. This is no time for quibbling. We must pull no punches.

Good, law-abiding American men and women who enjoy and cherish their civil liberties do not follow the policy of shouting about them. In many cases those who clamor the loudest about the dangers of losing such liberties bear the most watching. All too frequently what they fear most is the loss of their opportunity to work for the destruction of our form of government. There are more than 600 "communazi" organizations flourishing in the United States. Many of these are Trojan horse and "fifth column" groups. They have no rightful place here among us.

The second place where we are woefully lacking is in our national defense. For two decades national-defense preparedness has lagged. Within the past 2 weeks the first new United States battleship in 19 years has been launched. In every other element of preparedness we have been equally complacent.

We must appreciate that the hurried building of our defenses to the point needed may not make for the most efficiency. Errors will be made and the ball will be fumbled. But the characteristic of a great pitcher is that he pitches over his errors and goes on to win. I am confident we are a nation of thoroughbreds, neither to be upset nor deterred from our purpose by such mistakes.

There is no change in the official position of the American Legion with regard to the neutrality of the United States. We believe the protection—at all hazards—of the free peoples of the Western Hemisphere is our primary obligation. While our Nation is ill-equipped to provide even a minimum of protection for the Monroe Doctrine, it is idle to consider the feasibility of intervening in the great conflict across the Atlantic.

With what would we intervene? Though some progress has been made in giving educational orders for matériel and equipment, and in providing for the needs of an expanded air corps, we do not have on hand today the needed planes, weapons, and materials to train properly the extremely moderate armed forces we are able to put in the field.

How, then, would we make our potential strength felt, short of two or three years? Fast-moving aggressor nations have no intention of allowing us to select our own time and place for exerting the might of a rearmed America.

In my written message to the members of the Legion, I have also told them the safety of our Nation transcends any political issue. I have cautioned them to avoid the danger of subjecting such safety to the fear generated through hysterical approach to the handling of our problems.

In my public utterances as national commander, I have stressed the importance to American Legion organizations of assisting and working through recognized agencies of the Government. I have told them that only rarely when there is a collapse of recognized authority as in times of great natural disasters is it our job to do what we can independently.

In recent years many of our Legion posts have prepared disaster-relief plans to become effective at the onset of such catastrophes. In other words, the machinery of Legion support for law and order is already established with a fair degree of efficiency. Posts without plans are being urged to form them now. Such plans should be integrated with existing Government authority in every community where there is a Legion post.

State departments of the Legion can well initiate and urge the adoption of State emergency councils. In several States this has been done already with the support and consent of the State Governors.

Official representatives of the national organization of the American Legion are now engaged in conferences and discussions with proper agencies of the Federal Government. These conferences look toward utilization of Legion organization and membership in the most effective manner possible in the event of any conceivable emergency developing. Such perfected plans will be ready for immediate use when conditions warrant their invoking.

The American Legion is working to make this a nation geared to go. We recognize it as a blue-chip game in which we are engaged. We advise playing them close and playing the cards to win.

Our members regard this situation as another call from the Nation. It is not a call to the armed forces where once we served, though we will not shun such a call if it comes. Rather it is a call to develop sanity superseding hysteria; to remove all doubt about the strength of our national defense whatever the cost; to have all of us individually willing to bear the heavy price of the defense which must be paid to assure peace for our people.

For 21 years the American Legion called the turn. It is confident its judgment in the present situation will coincide with the safety and well-being of our beloved Nation.

For God and country we have associated ourselves. We pledge again our loyalty to that creed. We extend the hope that America now is awake to the dangers we face. Resolutely we pledge our organization to work with those who are for the preservation of our national unity that thus we may safeguard the glory of our ideals, our principles, and our institutions.

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

OPEN LETTER FROM MAURICE LÉON TO WENDELL L. WILLKIE AND HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD an open letter addressed by Hon. Maurice Léon to Hon. Wendell L. Willkie and myself, jointly, on the subject This Is America's War.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS IS AMERICA'S WAR—AN OPEN LETTER

WENDELL L. WILLKIE, Esq.
Hon. CLAUDE D. PEPPER.

DEAR SIRS: I am addressing this open letter to you jointly because at this critical juncture in our country's history your leadership has been expressed in terms calling for prompt action in defense of all that America stands for against the menace which has now reached the valleys of Picardy and which aims at nothing less than the enslavement of the world.

Because of your stand, you are entitled to be looked upon as Americans first, as being able to work together in a national crisis without thought of partisan advantage or expediency.

Because of the events which have justified your stand, the number of Americans who believe that this horrible war forced on the world by Hitler and his cohorts is America's war is growing daily by leaps and bounds.

In the pages that follow, you will see that it is America's war not only because Hitler and his forces mean to crush all that America stands for, but because the door was opened and kept open to them by acts and omissions of those in authority at Washington which culminated in a deadlock between the President and the Senate.

In the archives of the Department of State, there is the treaty known as Document No. 63, Senate, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, which is appended hereto as Document 7, and the significance of which only becomes plain after reading documents numbered 1 to 6.

This treaty was never passed upon by the Senate.

I submit that as a starting point to a policy at once clear-sighted and virile, it should be resubmitted and ratified.

America has her share in the mistakes which have brought the free peoples of the world to Armageddon. These mistakes should be faced in good faith, without flinching. I know of no other guide to safety for us, for without self-respect there is no safety.

Sincerely yours,

MAURICE LÉON.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE RHINE FRONTIER

INTRODUCTION

In his foreword to André Tardieu's book The Truth About the Treaty (Bobbs-Merrill, 1921), Edward M. House, writing on March 3, 1921, states concerning Mr. Tardieu:

"He was in all truth the one nearly indispensable man at the conference.

"Therefore, if one would know of those fateful days in Paris when the allies of France had gathered from the ends of the earth to have their reckoning with the Central Powers, it would be well to read The Truth About the Treaty, for here it is told by him who knows."

This foreword is followed by an introduction written by Mr. Clémenceau, France's war Premier, and head of the French delegation at the peace conference, which begins as follows:

"It was near your heart, in face of the virulent attacks on our peace treaty, to set up the truth in print."

Thus the man who next to President Wilson was the most important member of the American delegation and the man who headed the French delegation of which André Tardieu was the chief member next to Mr. Clémenceau, both vouch for the facts given in this book.

Chapter VI of this book, under the title "Treaties of Guarantee," begins on page 202 as follows:

"It was on March 14, 1919, that Mr. Lloyd George and President Wilson proposed to M. Clémenceau, in place of the inter-Allied occupation of an independent Rhineland, the undertaking by Great Britain and the United States to come immediately to the assistance of France in case the latter should be the object of an unprovoked aggression by Germany."

"On March 28 he put this solution into concrete form and handed the head of the French Government the following: 'In a separate treaty with the United States, a pledge by the United States, subject to the approval of the Executive Council of the League of Nations, to come immediately to the assistance of France as soon as any unprovoked movement of aggression against her is made by Germany.'

"This formula, approved by Mr. Lloyd George, became the basis of the negotiation."

A treaty was signed, on the part of the United States of America, by Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States; and on the part of the French Republic, by Georges Clémenceau, President of the Council of Ministers, Minister of War, and Stephen Pichon, Minister of Foreign Affairs. This treaty, signed June 28, 1919, specifically provides in article IV:

"The present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the Treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification."

It was transmitted to the Senate July 29, 1919, with a message from the President of the United States in which he refers to the fact that he had transmitted the treaty of peace 2 weeks previously.

President Wilson's message will be scanned in vain for the remotest revelation of the fact that this treaty had been offered by him to France as a substitute for the permanent security of the Rhine frontier and had been accepted by France in exchange for her agreement to limit the occupation of the Rhine bridgeheads to 15 years.

Article I of this treaty specifically refers to the provisions of the treaty of peace forbidding military occupation or fortification of the left bank of the Rhine by Germany and providing that violation by Germany of these provisions should constitute "a hostile act against the powers signatory of the present treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world."

The separate treaty then specifies that should these provisions constitute "inadequate security and protection to France, the United States of America shall be bound to come immediately to her assistance in the event of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her being made by Germany."

This meant, in plain terms, that should Germany violate the provisions of the treaty of peace under which the left bank of the Rhine was demilitarized, this would constitute an act of aggression, and the United States would be bound to come to the aid of France in meeting this act of aggression.

This treaty, Senate Document No. 63 in the Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, was not ratified. The Senate had no opportunity to learn the facts bearing on its offer to France and acceptance by France until long after it had been withdrawn from its consideration by President Wilson at the same time that he withdrew the treaty of peace. His message merely gave "high obligations of gratitude and tested friendship" as the reason for making the treaty.

As shown by Mr. Tardieu in his book, Marshal Foch had taken the definite position in November 1918 that nothing short of the Rhine frontier would secure peace, and he had been unswerving in maintaining that position.

The story of the struggle to defeat the measure which the Allied Commander in Chief, whose greatness was not confined to mastery on the battlefield, regarded as indispensable to peace, is best told in contemporary documents which are appended to this memorandum, of which the following is a list:

Document 1: Conclusion of Marshal Foch's memorandum of January 10, 1919.

Document 2: Proposal of the French Government to the heads of the Allied and associated Governments (March 12, 1919).

Document 3: Note of the French Government handed to the heads of the Allied Governments (March 17, 1919).

Document 4: Text of offer made March 28, 1919, by President Wilson to Prime Minister Clémenceau as a substitute for Rhine frontier.

Document 7: Agreement of assistance to France in the event of unprovoked aggression by Germany.

The maxim "Verba volant scripta manent" (words fly away, writings remain) applies here. I am not here questioning President Wilson's motives. He died a broken man because by his failure he had assumed a responsibility before the conscience of mankind greater than could be borne by a mere mortal, to recall a prophecy made in the early stages of the Peace Conference. President Wilson should have given the Senate the facts which led to his offer of the Treaty of Assistance to France and its acceptance. Without those facts, the Senate had no opportunity to judge of the character of the obligation which the only officer of the Government of the United States having power to conduct its foreign relations, had assumed on behalf of the people of the United States, subject only to ratification by the Senate. By withholding the facts from the Senate, President Wilson withheld them also from the people of the United States, which to this day is largely unaware that the Government of France when it was in a position to hold the permanent security of the Rhine frontier, gave up that security in reliance on and in exchange for the undertaking contained in the Treaty of Assistance

The French Government must, of course, be taken to have known that President Wilson's treaty without ratification by the Senate would not legally bind the United States. But the facts completely dispose of the idea so widely prevalent among our people that the present European situation was Europe's own doing and solely the result of European action with which we had nothing at all to do. The fact that the surrender of the Rhine bridgeheads which made German aggression possible was actually effected in reliance on an obligation undertaken on our behalf, by our Chief Executive, who alone had the power to enter into it, subject to subsequent ratification by the Senate, shows conclusively that we had our part in bringing about the present tragic situation; and this having been shown it should follow that we should take our share in a war which is ours in more senses than one.

Marshal von Moltke placed the military frontier of Germany at the Rhine and at the end of one of his papers writes: "There can be no doubt about the ordinary strength of our theater of operations on the Rhine. One thing only could endanger it—a premature offensive by us on the left bank with insufficient forces." And elsewhere he states: "The main line of defense of Prussia against France is the Rhine with its fortresses. This line is so strong that it is far from requiring all the forces of the monarchy."

Today this situation is reversed in favor of the coalition. The coalition cannot renounce its advantages, cannot relinquish its buckler of defense in that region—the Rhine—without seriously compromising its future. The "Wacht am Rhein" must be its slogan.

Henceforth the Rhine must be the western frontier of the German peoples. Germany must be deprived of all access to or military utilization of it, that is to say, of all territorial sovereignty on the left bank of this river—in a word, of every facility to reach by sudden invasion, as in 1914, Belgium and Luxemburg, the shores of the North Sea and threaten England; to move around France's natural defenses, the Rhine and the Meuse; to conquer her northern regions and approach that of Paris.

This is, for the present and the near future, a guarantee indispensable for the maintenance of peace, because:

1. Of Germany's material and moral situation.

2. Of her numerical superiority over the democratic countries of western Europe.

The Rhine, a military frontier indispensable for the maintenance of peace, which is the aim of the coalition, offers no territorial advantage to any country. There is no question indeed of annexing the left bank of the Rhine, of increasing the territory of France or of Belgium but simply one of maintaining on the Rhine the common barrier of security essential to the society of democratic nations. There is no question of entrusting the guardianship of this common barrier to any one power, but of assuring by the moral and material support of all the democratic powers the defense of their lives and futures by forbidding Germany, once for all, to carry war and her spirit of domination across the river.

Of course it will be the function of the peace treaty to fix the status of the inhabitants of the left bank of the Rhine not included within the French and Belgian frontiers.

But this arrangement, whatever it be, must take into consideration the military necessity set forth above and therefore—

1. Absolutely forbid to Germany all military access to, or political propaganda in, the Rhenish territories of the left bank, perhaps even protecting this territory by a neutral zone on the right bank.

2. Assure the military occupation of the Rhenish territories of the left bank by Allied forces.

3. Guarantee to the Rhenish territories of the left bank the outlet necessary to their economic activities by bringing them into a customs union with the other western states.

On these conditions, and in accordance with the universally accepted principle of the liberty of peoples, it is possible to conceive the establishment, on the left bank of the Rhine, of new autonomous states, governing themselves subject to the above reservations, an arrangement which, with the aid of a strong natural frontier, the Rhine will alone be capable of assuring peace to western Europe.

DOCUMENT 2.—PROPOSAL OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT TO THE HEADS OF THE ALLIED AND ASSOCIATED GOVERNMENTS (MARCH 12, 1919)

WESTERN FRONTIER OF GERMANY

1. In the general interest of peace and to assure the effective working of the constituent clause of the League of Nations, the western frontier of Germany is fixed at the Rhine. Consequently Germany renounces all sovereignty over, as well as any customs union with, the territories of the former German Empire on the left bank of the Rhine.

2. The line of the Rhine to be occupied under a mandate of the League of Nations by an inter-Allied military force.

The extent and conditions of occupation in German territory of the bridgeheads of Kehl, Mannheim, Mayence, Coblenz, Cologne, and Dusseldorf, necessary to the security of inter-Allied forces, to be fixed by the final treaty of peace. Until the signature of the said treaty the conditions of occupation established by the armistice of November 11, 1918, to remain in force.

In a zone of 50 kilometers east of her western frontier Germany shall not maintain nor erect fortifications.

3. The territories of the left bank of the Rhine (except Alsace-Lorraine) to constitute one or several independent States under the protection of the League of Nations. Their eastern and southern frontiers to be fixed by the peace treaty. Germany undertakes to do nothing which could hinder the aforesaid state or states in the fulfillment of the duties or the exercise of the rights devolving upon them from the causes or the conditions of their creation.

4. Within 1 month after the signature of the present preliminaries of peace, the general conditions of evacuation of the higher German and Prussian civil officials at present on duty on the left bank of the Rhine, to be settled by a special agreement between the signatory powers and the German Government.

5. Within 2 months from the signature of the present preliminaries of peace, a special agreement between the signatory powers and the German Government to determine, under the guaranty of the League of Nations, the general conditions of liquidation of the German economic interests on the left bank of the Rhine.

6. The German Government undertakes to furnish every year to the independent state or states, which may be created on the left bank of the Rhine, the amount of coal necessary for their industries. This amount shall be credited to Germany in the general reparations account.

DOCUMENT 3.—NOTE OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT HANDED TO THE HEADS OF THE ALLIED GOVERNMENTS[1] (MARCH 17, 1919)

I. RÉSUMÉ OF THE FRENCH PROPOSAL OF FEBRUARY 25, 1919

(1) The military occupation of the Rhine by an interallied force (with this immediate and lasting result, separation of the left bank from the German Reich and Zollverein) is, in the present state of international relations, a vital necessity for France and of common interest to the Allies. A detailed memorandum has proved this assertion.

The object is to prevent the renewal of that which we have undergone twice in 50 years, and for that to deprive Germany of her essential means of attack (the left bank, the railroads, and the bridges of the Rhine).

As a guaranty of this, the military occupation of the Rhine border is indispensable to France, with a far smaller population than Germany, deprived of Russia's alliance, and without good natural frontiers.

On the other hand the overseas democracies cannot fight in Europe if the French ports and railroads are not substantially protected. The last war demonstrated how serious for them is this danger, which might completely deprive them of a European battlefield.

(2) The limitation of the military forces of Germany is not a sufficient guaranty against this danger until experience has proved the method efficacious, and especially so long as Germany has at her disposal more than 3,000,000 men who are trained to war, because they fought in war. The total suppression of the German fleet was not sufficient reason for the naval countries to disarm their own fleets. On land, France, too, has need of physical guaranty.

The League of Nations is also not a sufficient guaranty. The present draft of its clauses makes final victory almost certain. But the League is too slow moving a mechanism to prevent territorial invasion at the beginning of a war. Here also, therefore, a physical guaranty is necessary.

This physical guaranty is the military occupation of the Rhine and the control of its bridge traffic.

(3) The objections presented do not modify this conclusion.

It is feared on the left bank that there may be a movement for union with Germany. But the left bank is different from the rest of Germany. It fears Bolshevism and war taxes. It is conscious of its economic independence. It has no liking for Prussian officials forced upon it by the empire. Separatist tendencies are already making themselves felt despite the strict reserve we have maintained.

A nationalist irritation in Germany is foreseen. Defeat has aroused this sentiment. The question resolves itself into protecting ourselves against its possible consequences.

It is thought that the proposed solution may be suspected of imperialism. But it is not a question of annexation, it is a question of creating under the safeguard of the League of Nations an independent state in accordance with the interests of the inhabitants and with the aspirations of a very large number of them. This is not a Bismarckian solution.

Anxiety is expressed concerning the effect upon British and American opinion. But the whole lesson of the war is that the Rhine is the military frontier not only of France and Belgium but of the overseas democracies as well, "the frontier of freedom," as President Wilson expressed it. These democracies will understand this as they understood the necessity of conscription during the war, as British democracy understands today the channel tunnel.

The danger is pointed out of the indefinite duration of the occupation. But as the entire organization of the left bank is to be in the hands of the League of Nations, the latter will always have the right to alter it.

Therefore, the physical guaranty which will make impossible a renewal of the 1914 situation remains of vital necessity to France in the present state of international relations.

II. EXAMINATION OF THE SUGGESTION PRESENTED BY OUR ALLIES

(1) The suggestion presented on March 14 that Great Britain and the United States should pledge themselves in case of aggression by Germany to bring their military forces to the aid of France without delay is a recognition that France needs a special guaranty; but in place of the physical guaranty demanded by France it substitutes a political guaranty designed to curtail by a definite pledge the time which would elapse between the menace of war and the joint action of the Allied forces.

The French Government fully appreciates the great value of such a guaranty, which would profoundly change the international situation, but this guaranty to be effective must be supplemented and defined.

(2) In the first place there will always be, on account of distance, a period in which France attacked will have to defend herself single-handed without her overseas Allies; she must be able to do this under fairer conditions than in the past.

On the other hand, it is important there should be no doubt about the substance and scope of the pledge—that is as to the obligations imposed upon Germany, the methods of their enforcements, the nature of the act which shall constitute a menace of war, the right of France to defend herself against it, and the importance of the military aid to be furnished by Great Britain and the United States.

(3) In other words, before we can consider giving up the first guarantee (a material guarantee founded on space) it is essential that the second guarantee (founded on time, that is on the speedy aid of our Allies) lend itself to no uncertainty and that it be supplemented by some of the other safeguards contained in the first guarantee.

It is really not possible for France to give up a certain safeguard for the sake of expectations.

III. POSSIBLE BASES OF AGREEMENT

Wishing to respond to the suggestion which has been made to it, the French Government thinks it its duty to set out in detail the general bases upon which agreement might be reached, these bases being the minimum guarantees indispensable to France.

It should be agreed, in the first place, that:

In case Germany, in violation of the peace conditions imposed upon her by the allied and associated governments, should commit an act of aggression against France, Great Britain, and the United States would bring to France the aid of their military forces.

Therefore:

(1) The date and the conditions of evacuation of the bridgeheads on the right bank, and of the territories on the left bank of the Rhine, to be fixed by the peace treaty (as one of the guarantees to be taken for the execution of the financial clauses).[2]

(2) Germany to maintain neither military force nor military organization on the left bank of the Rhine nor within 50 kilometers east of the river. The German Army to be forbidden to maneuver there. Recruiting to be forbidden there—even appeals for volunteers. Fortifications to be demolished there. No new fortifications to be erected there. No war material to be manufactured there. (Certain of these clauses already figure in the preliminary peace proposals; but in the present hypothesis it would be necessary to strengthen them.)

(3) Great Britain, the United States, and France to have the right to satisfy themselves by means of a permanent Commission of Inspection that the conditions imposed upon Germany are complied with. (For without this right the preceding clause would be worthless.)

(4) Great Britain, the United States, and France to agree to consider as an act of aggression any entry or attempted entry of all or any part of the German Army into the zone fixed in paragraph 2.

(5) Furthermore, Great Britain and France to recognize the right of France to occupy the line of the Rhine with five bridgeheads of a radius of 20 kilometers in case Germany, in the opinion of the Commission of Inspection, should violate the terms of paragraph 2 or any one of the military, aerial, and naval clauses of the peace preliminaries. (In fact, if France gives up after 30 years' permanent occupation she must at least, in case of danger of war resulting from Germany's violation of her pledges, be able to advance her troops to the only good defensive position; that is, to the Rhine.)

(6) Great Britain and the United States to recognize to France her frontier of 1814 and, by way of reparation, the right of occupation without annexation of that part of the coal basin of the Saar not included within this frontier.

P. S.—It goes without saying that by act of aggression against France the French Government also means any aggression against Belgium.

[2] In other words, an occupation for 30 years.

DOCUMENT 4.—TEXT OF OFFER MADE MARCH 28, 1919, BY PRESIDENT WILSON TO PRIME MINISTER CLEMENCEAU AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR RHINE FRONTIER

In a separate treaty with the United States, a pledge by the United States, subject to the approval of the executive council of the League of Nations, to come immediately to the assistance of France as soon as any unprovoked movement of aggression against her is made by Germany.

DOCUMENT 5.—CONCLUSION OF STATEMENT MADE BY MARSHAL FOCH ON MARCH 31, 1919, BEFORE THE HEADS OF THE ALLIED AND ASSOCIATED GOVERNMENTS AND THE COMMANDERS IN CHIEF OF THE ALLIED AND ASSOCIATED ARMIES

To sum up, unless we hold the Rhine permanently, no neutrality, no disarmament, no written clause of any kind, can prevent Germany from seizing the Rhine and debouching from it at an advantage.

The Rhine remains today the barrier essential to the safety of the peoples of western Europe, and therefore of civilization.

In the circumstances, it seems difficult to refuse to the nations in the forefront of battle—France and Belgium—the protection they deem indispensable to enable them to live and fight until their allies arrive. * * *

Whether the inhabitants of the left bank of the Rhine remain German or not, the political frontier between the western European nations and Germany is the Rhine.

I urge with all my strength upon the allied and associated governments, which in the most critical hours of the war entrusted to me the conduct of their armies and the future of our common cause, to consider that the future can only be permanently assured—tomorrow as it was yesterday—by the military frontier of the Rhine and its occupation by the Allies. This essential position must therefore be held.

DOCUMENT 6.—ASSISTANCE TO FRANCE IN THE EVENT OF UNPROVOKED AGGRESSION BY GERMANY

Message from the President of the United States transmitting an agreement between the United States and France which was signed at Versailles, June 28, 1919, to secure the Republic of France the immediate aid of the United States in case of unprovoked movement of aggression against her on the part of Germany

July 29, 1919—Read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed

MESSAGE OF TRANSMITTAL

Gentlemen of the Senate: I take pleasure in laying before you a treaty with the Republic of France, the object of which is to secure that Republic of the immediate aid of the United States of America in case of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her on the part of Germany. I earnestly hope that this treaty will meet with your cordial approval and will receive an early ratification at your hands, along with the treaty of peace with Germany. Now that you have had an opportunity to examine the great document I presented to you 2 weeks ago, it seems opportune to lay before you this treaty which is meant to be in effect a part of it.

It was signed on the same day with the treaty of peace and is intended as a temporary supplement to it. It is believed that the treaty of peace with Germany itself provides adequate protection to France against aggression from her recent enemy on the east; but the years immediately ahead of us contain many incalculable possibilities. The Covenant of the League of Nations provides for military action for the protection of its members only upon advice of the Council of the League—advice given, it is to be presumed, only upon deliberation and acted upon by each of the governments of the member states only if its own judgment justifies such action. The object of the special treaty with France which I now submit to you is to provide for immediate military assistance to France by the United States in case of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her by Germany without waiting for the advice of the Council of the League of Nations that such action be taken. It is to be an arrangement, not independent of the League of Nations, but under it.

It is, therefore, expressly provided that this treaty shall be made the subject of consideration at the same time with the treaty of peace with Germany; that this special arrangement shall receive the approval of the Council of the League; and that this special provision for the safety of France shall remain in force only until, upon the application of one of the parties to it, the Council of the League, acting, if necessary, by a majority vote, shall agree that the provisions of the Covenant of the League afford her sufficient protection.

I was moved to sign this treaty by considerations which will, I hope, seem as persuasive and as irresistible to you as they seemed to me. We are bound to France by ties of friendship which we have always regarded, and shall always regard, as peculiarly sacred. She assisted us to win our freedom as a nation. It is seriously to be doubted whether we could have won it without her gallant and timely aid. We have recently had the privilege of assisting in driving enemies, who were also enemies of the world, from her soil; but that does not pay our debt to her. Nothing can pay such a debt. She now desires that we should promise to lend our great force to keep her safe against the power she has had most reason to fear. Another great nation volunteers the same promise. It is one of the fine reversals of history that that other nation should be the very power from whom France fought to set us free. A new day has dawned. Old antagonisms are forgotten. The common cause of freedom and enlightenment has created new comradeships and a new perception of what it is wise and necessary for great nations to do to free the world of intolerable fear. Two governments who wish to be members of the League of Nations ask leave of the Council of the League to be permitted to go to the assistance of a friend whose situation has been found to be one of peculiar peril, without awaiting the advice of the League to act.

It is by taking such pledges as this that we prove ourselves faithful to the utmost to the high obligations of gratitude and tested friendship. Such an act as this seems to me one of the proofs that we are a people that sees the true heart of duty and prefers honor to its own separate course of peace.

WOODROW WILSON.

DOCUMENT 7.—ASSISTANCE TO FRANCE IN THE EVENT OF UNPROVOKED AGGRESSION BY GERMANY

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE SIGNED AT VERSAILLES JUNE 28, 1919

Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are equally animated by the desire to maintain the peace of the world, so happily restored by the treaty of peace signed at Versailles the 28th day of June 1919, putting an end to the war begun by the aggression of the German Empire and ended by the defeat of that power; and

Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are fully persuaded that an unprovoked movement of aggression by Germany against France would not only violate both the letter and the spirit of the Treaty of Versailles, to which the United States of America and the French Republic are parties, thus exposing France anew to the intolerable burdens of an unprovoked war, but that such aggression on the part of Germany would be and is so regarded by the Treaty of Versailles as a hostile act against all the powers signatory to that treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world by involving inevitably and directly the states of Europe and indirectly, as experience has amply and unfortunately demonstrated, the world at large; and

Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic fear that the stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in said Treaty of Versailles may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France on the one hand and the United States of America as one of the signatories of the Treaty of Versailles on the other;

Therefore, the United States of America and the French Republic having decided to conclude a treaty to effect these necessary purposes, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, and Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, specially authorized thereto by the President of the United States, and Georges Clemenceau, president of the Council, Minister of War, and Stephen Pichon, Minister of Foreign Affairs, specially authorized thereto by Raymond Poincaré, President of the French Republic, have agreed upon the following articles:

Article I

In case the following stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in the treaty of peace with Germany signed at Versailles the 28th day of June 1919 by the United States of America, the French Republic, and the British Empire among other powers:

"ARTICLE 42. Germany is forbidden to maintain or construct any fortifications either on the left bank of the Rhine or on the right bank to the west of a line drawn 50 kilometers to the east of the Rhine.

"ARTICLE 43. In the area defined above the maintenance and assembly of armed forces, either permanently or temporarily, and military maneuvers of any kind, as well as the upkeep of all permanent works for mobilization are in the same way forbidden.

"ARTICLE 44. In case Germany violates in any manner whatever the provisions of articles 42 and 43, she shall be regarded as committing a hostile act against the powers signatory of the present treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world."

may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France, the United States of America shall be bound to come immediately to her assistance in the event of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her being made by Germany.

Article II

The present treaty, in similar terms with the treaty of even date for the same purpose concluded between Great Britain and the French Republic, a copy of which treaty is annexed hereto, will only come into force when the latter is ratified.

Article III

The present treaty must be submitted to the Council of the League of Nations, and must be recognized by the Council, acting if need be by a majority, as an engagement which is consistent with the Covenant of the League. It will continue in force until on the application of one of the parties to it the Council, acting if need be by a majority, agrees that the League itself affords sufficient protection.

Article IV

The present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the Treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. It will be submitted before ratification to the French Chambers of Deputies (aux Chambres françaises) for approval. The ratifications thereof will be exchanged on the deposit of ratifications of the Treaty of Versailles at Paris or as soon thereafter as shall be possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries, to wit: On the part of the United States of America, Woodrow Wilson, President, and Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, of the United States; and on the part of the French Republic, Georges Clemenceau, President of the Council of Ministers, Minister of War, and Stephen Pichon, Minister of Foreign Affairs, have signed the above articles both in the English and French languages, and they have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at the city of Versailles, on the 28th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1919, and the one hundred and forty-third of the Independence of the United States of America.

Tribute From Son to Father

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

REMARKS OF BRUCE GREEN, OF ARLINGTON, VA.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, tomorrow the Nation will celebrate Father's Day.

No more beautiful tribute from a son to a father has come to my attention than that paid by Mr. Bruce Green, of Arlington, Va., to his father, Harry K. Green, past master, Columbia Lodge 285, A. F. and A. M.; past district deputy grand master of district 54; and past grand master of the Grand Lodge of Virginia.

I ask unanimous consent to insert this tribute in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Most worshipful grand master and brethren, amidst such an outstanding array of Masonic dignitaries, who have gathered at this grand annual conclave to foster the welfare of our fraternity, I feel somewhat restrained to attempt to fulfill the assignment which has devolved upon my head at the instance of the master of my lodge.

I see many craftsmen in this vast assembly that are far more capable of delivering a commemorative address than I could ever hope to be. I see brethren here that have held this august body spellbound with eloquence on many occasions, and it is, therefore, with a sense of genuine humility that I rise today to extol a name that I hold near and dear to my heart—a name which reverberates with kindness, affability, and good deeds; a name which is a symbol of service to his fellow men—that distinguished craftsman, that God-fearing gentleman, that crusader of right, your bicentennial grand master and my affectionate father, most worshipful brother, Harry K. Green.

Along life's highway other men have had fathers who have possibly attained greater heights of distinction and wealth than mine, as such are measured in the affairs of men, yet I have never known a son that could claim a father who was a more earnest warrior in the field of right, who labored more devotedly in the interest of his family and his fellow men, or who had a larger soul than my father, whose portrait is being unveiled today.

He has been the beacon light for good that has spread its refulgent rays of companionship, wise counsel, good cheer, and God-like pervading influence, which have surrounded all the years of my life. As far back as I can recall, I can see his friends, too numerous to mention, seeking his good offices when misfortune would overtake them—men who had lost their jobs, women who had been widowed by the death of their loved ones, all finding their way to our home in Arlington County, there to receive his kind word of admonition and seek his judgment in their hour of trial and distress. His kindness has extended, not alone to Masonic brethren and their families, but to black and white alike of almost every creed and denomination. He has truly lived to help his fellow beings.

Father's life is filled with many beautiful characteristics, and, as I look down memory lane into the years of long ago, I can see a multitude of instances that would be well worthy of laudation, but the limitation of time allotted for these ceremonies makes it necessary to pass over most of them and direct my remarks to the fortitude of his existence.

There he sits, my brethren, somewhat broken in body, his hands ancylosed and distorted in appearance, his motivating power impaired to the point of excruciating pain at every step, yet, withal, he clings to the faith of his childhood, manifests the courage of a saint, relies upon the wisdom of the Master Builder, bears the pain it is his lot to bear and carries on, as he has for many years, his laudable efforts in life with a greater perspective and a more propitious outlook than those of us who are well and able-bodied.

A recapitulation of the beauties of his life discloses the presence of four outstanding tenets—rectitude, loyalty, kindness, and service, and it appears to me that the Great Ambassador of Good impregnated his being with the rich influences so essential to the fulfillment of his mission in life.

Around his head he placed an invisible garland of lilies symbolic of the probity of his life; about his shoulders he bedecked the cloak of loyalty to his friends and his beliefs; in his heart he implanted a seed of kindness which has fructified with luxuriant splendor since his childhood days of yore; and about his soul he draped a tapestry taken from the walls of the spacious temple of the spirit world and embroidered thereon in golden letters, the word "service." Service to the God he worships. Service to the family that is proud to bear his name. Service to his friends and neighbors. Service to his State and Nation.

And in conclusion, brethren, may I make a personal reference by way of a poem which I read some years ago. Its author is unknown, but it expresses in beautiful language the feeling which permeates my heart.

"Always my counselor, always my friend,
Always with patience his help would he lend
Always at hand when life's problems I met
Throughout all the world my best friend yet,
Always consistent, understanding my mould,
'Midst all my sorrows as true as gold.

"Always the first to wish me luck,
Always the first to praise my pluck,
Always at hand to give me a tip,
Usually saying, 'Keep a stiff upper lip.'
Always at hand whether rain or shine,
The same old sport, this Daddy of mine."

It is with genuine pride and deep emotion that I present to this grand body on behalf of Columbia Lodge, the portrait of the man I proudly call "Dad."

Condemnation of Italy's Entrance Into War by Italian Club of Tampa, Fla.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 15 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE AND AN EDITORIAL FROM TAMPA (FLA.) TRIBUNE

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a newspaper article appearing in the Tampa (Fla.) Tribune of June 13 giving the encouraging news that the Italian Club of Tampa, which is a large and responsible club, unequivocally denounces the conduct of Mussolini in entering the war.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Tampa (Fla.) Tribune of June 13, 1940]

ITALIAN CLUB CONDEMNS ACTS OF MUSSOLINI—PRAISES PRINCIPLES EXPRESSED BY ROOSEVELT

Directors of L'Unione Italiana, the Italian club of Tampa, adopted resolutions yesterday, strongly condemning the entrance of Italy into the war against the Allies, heartily praising and endorsing the principles expressed by President Roosevelt, and offering to defend American democracy.

"As we always have been in the past," the resolution said, "we are now and always shall be at the disposal of the Government of the United States, ready, under any emergency or circumstances, to defend with our utmost loyalty and vigor those principles and ideals, regardless of sacrifice."

SENTIMENT OF ALL

The directors pointed out that they expressed the sentiments of all of the club's 3,500 members, 90 percent of whom are citizens of the United States.

The resolutions said the action of the Italian Government was contrary to the ideals of the organization, which never had been in sympathy with totalitarian government and was contrary to general sentiment in Italy, long recognized as a natural enemy of Germans and Austrians.

They emphasized that the club had always expressed disapproval of the Mussolini government, had never received its delegates or representatives here, and took no part in any events according them recognition.

Members of the club, the resolutions added, are "lovers and defenders of principles of the Constitution of the United States," and are now reaffirming their allegiance.

TEXT OF RESOLUTIONS

The full text of the resolutions follows:

"Whereas, the Italian Nation under the government of Benito Mussolini, has entered the existing war in Europe as a belligerent on the side of Germany and against France and Great Britain;

"Whereas, the said action of the Italian Government is contrary to the sentiments and principles of the membership of L'Unione and of the ideals which this institution represents;

"Whereas, the L'Unione society has never been in sympathy with the totalitarian government of Benito Mussolini which governs Italy, and, in fact, has always expressed its disapproval of same to the extent of not receiving delegates and representatives of said government which have visited this city, abstaining from taking part in any event or occasion which signified attention, recognition or courtesies to the delegates of representatives of said totalitarian government;

"Whereas, we believe that the general sentiment of the people of Italy is not favorable to Germany, because it cannot be forgotten that for the past 2,000 years both the Germans and the Austrians have been natural enemies of the Italian people who have received from him only antagonism and harm;

"Whereas, our membership are lovers of democracy and defenders of the principles and ideals embodied in the Constitution of the United States, of which we are loyal and sincere citizens, which ideals and principles we have always propagated, encouraged, and defended under all circumstances and which we will continue to encourage, propagate, and defend no matter what conditions or situations may arise;

"Whereas the President of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, has lately expressed the sentiments of the Government and the people of the United States relative to that declaration of war by Italy against France and Great Britain in favor of Germany and indicated the line of conduct to be followed by the Government and the Nation to better promote and defend the great principles of democracy, liberty, and justice of the Constitution of the United States;

"The board of directors of L'Unione Italiana gathered in representation of all its members, solemnly and sincerely resolved:

"1. To strongly condemn the action of Benito Mussolini's government of Italy in joining Germany in the European conflict in a declaration of war against France and Great Britain;

"2. To express our antagonism against the totalitarian system of government or any other that is contrary to the principles of true democracy as practiced and sustained in the United States;

"3. To heartily praise and endorse the principles, expressions, and suggestions made by the President of the United States in his speech relative to the said declaration of war;

"4. To once more, as we have done many times before, express and reaffirm our sentiments and principles of true democracy and our loyalty to and true faith in the ideals embodied in the Constitution of the United States;

"5. To declare that, as we always have been in the past, we are now and always shall be at the disposal of the Government of the United States ready, under any emergency or circumstance, to defend with our utmost loyalty and vigor those principles and ideals, regardless of sacrifice."

IF WE HAD FOLLOWED WILSON

In a thoughtful article in the New York Times, Edwin L. James recurs to the League of Nations, and our refusal to join in it and support it. He discusses the possibility that had the United States fulfilled Woodrow Wilson's plan and purpose, upheld the League, and made it function effectively there would have been no conquering Hitler, no European-grabbing Reich, "no blitzkrieg."

"Who can say," asks James, "that if Washington had insisted on the virile League Wilson planned, if Washington had made it necessary for other nations to go to Geneva to do international business with us, if the League had had put back of it the force Wilson intended, it would have sunk to such low degree? The statement that anyhow the League would not have worked is a statement which cannot be proved."

And he continues:

"Look at the United States today after 20 years of that proud isolation to conserve which we deserted the international effort of two decades ago to prevent just what has happened today. We planned to be safe in our isolation, but today we are planning to spend billions of dollars to prepare ourselves to protect the Nation. And there are very good chances that if that protecting has to be done, we shall have to face the peril alone. And what peril is it? It is exactly the peril of brute aggression which the League was shaped to prevent.

"The oceans have become highways instead of barriers and that this is true is shown by the fact that the potential dangers which now excite us exist, both of them, on the other side of the two oceans which were to have been our safe protectors.

"Can it not be argued that if there had been in existence for the past 20 years the kind of organization Wilson intended that the perils to our national interests would not have grown to their present importance? Whatever may be the truth of the matter, it must be admitted that the United States did just about nothing to prevent the dangers we now face. For our present position we must blame ourselves first of all.

"A good case can be made for the argument that with a virile League Hitler would never have come into power in Germany. It can be argued that the support which a democratic Germany might have received from Geneva would have prevented his rise. But suppose for argument's sake that he had come to power. Does anyone imagine that if Germany had faced a united League the Fuehrer would have been able to do what he has done? Would he have been able to pick his weaker victims off 1 by 1 and would he be fighting today just 2 nations if he had been faced by 50?"

There will be no League, no proposal for a League, if Germany wins this war. The only League of Nations will be a League of Nations subjugated and controlled by Hitler. For this sad situation, if it comes, the United States, or rather the small group of petty partisans who prevented our participation in that original League, must take much of the blame.

We went into a victorious fight to save democracy and insure the peace of the world, and we forthwith threw away the fruits of that victory and, with them, the prospects of understanding and harmony among nations.

When we left the League powerless, we invited the dictatorships and hastened their coming.

Was not the far-seeing wisdom of Woodrow Wilson, discarded at the time, after all the salvation of democracy, peace, and civilization?

Reply to Address by Colonel Lindbergh

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KEY PITTMAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. KEY PITTMAN, OF NEVADA

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I broadcast last evening, June 16, 1940, over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co., from 9:45 to 10 o'clock, in reply to the address of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, broadcast over the same network the previous night.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLONEL LINDBERGH'S MISCONCEPTION OF OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Fellow citizens, Colonel Lindbergh, in his speech last night, said: "We cannot continue for long to follow the course our Government has taken without becoming involved with Germany." The only possible justification for such a statement was his pronouncement that "There are many perfectly sincere men and women who believe that we can send weapons to kill people in Europe without becoming involved with these people."

Colonel Lindbergh evidently desires and intends to stop the purchase of materials in this country by Great Britain and France. He does not deny that this is absolutely in accordance with the customs of international law and nations since the beginning of time. He believes, however, apparently, that this will lead us into war. How absurd!

Well, suppose it does. Who would institute and conduct the war? Not the United States, but Germany. Hitler is too wise to undertake so futile an undertaking. It is significant that when the United States had its markets open to Germany for all the materials, arms, and instruments of war that have built up Hitler's brutal machine, there was no such argument by Colonel Lindbergh. It must be admitted that the purchase of these materials is legal.

Then what is Colonel Lindbergh's objection? It is plain and simple: That such legal actions will involve us in war with Germany. It appears that Colonel Lindbergh, who has resided long in Great Britain as its guest, through fear of incensing Hitler, would deprive the people of Great Britain and France of the weapons necessary to protect their lives against airplanes and tanks which, with our other materials, were supplied to Germany.

Colonel Lindbergh in his address quoted the policies of the pioneers of the West with regard to the use of guns. He evidently was not informed entirely as to the courage and spirit of those early pioneers. They never refused to give a gun even to a stranger whose life was threatened by a bandit. Selfishness and cowardice were not so marked with the early pioneers.

Colonel Lindbergh's advisers are expert upon the subject of political propaganda. Colonel Lindbergh should have sought other advice with regard to military matters. He attempts to excite and intimidate the citizens of the United States through fear of Hitler. He tells them with the authority of a Pershing that if they get into war with Germany that they have to undertake the impossible task of transporting millions of men from the United States to fight in Germany. He informs our people that this war would last for generations. What a brutal and unfounded assertion! The United States has no desire to conquer Germany. We simply intend to prevent Hitler from conquering any country on the Western Hemisphere. Instead of the United States undertaking the practically impossible feat of conveying an invading army to Germany, that necessity will be placed upon Hitler, if and when he ever attempts to invade the Western Hemisphere.

Colonel Lindbergh, in his love for the people of the United States, criticizes our condition of unpreparedness, and proposes immediate and extraordinary preparedness for national defense. When did this patriotic spirit animate him? Did anyone ever hear of it until recently? Are we to prepare to that extent unless there be a threat to our national safety? Who threatens our national safety?

Colonel Lindbergh's address plainly indicates that it is Hitler with his inordinate ambition and his unlimited intent for conquest. Would it be to the welfare of the United States if Hitler were stopped in Europe? If he were stopped, there would be no threat against the United States. If the opening of our markets to Great Britain and France for arms, ammunition, and implements of war would stop Hitler, would Colonel Lindbergh favor it?

Even if it would anger Hitler, even if Hitler should conquer Europe, as suggested by Colonel Lindbergh, would his anger toward us in any way actuate his course of conquest? Is it possible that if we refused to do the legal, humane thing toward Great Britain and France—if we stultified ourselves by praising the brutal and atheistic Government of Hitler—that it would in any way alter his course toward us, if it were in his power to conquer us? Oh, certainly not.

Witness the peaceful, friendly attitude of Holland and Belgium.

It is strange the motives that actuate man. Maybe Colonel Lindbergh still trusts Hitler with regard to the policy of appeasement indulged in by Chamberlain and apparently advanced by Colonel Lindbergh. Who is Colonel Lindbergh fighting in the United States. Certainly not Congress, for Congress even today is criticized for surrendering the freedom of the seas that they might keep out of war.

Has Colonel Lindbergh unwittingly been led into an attack on the President of the United States? Has the cunning incitement of his ambition blinded him as to the safety of his country. Is the "fifth column" behind Colonel Lindbergh, without his knowledge, in attempting to defeat the present leaders of our country?

Has Colonel Lindbergh failed to read his written speech, or, if he did, to understand that there is an apparent attack upon the patriotism of the Chief Executive of this country? I doubt if he has realized it.

The President, in his last public proclamation in answer to Premier Reynaud of France, stated emphatically that nothing he had said should be considered a commitment to enter the war.

Colonel Lindbergh is a young man, subject to flattery, as all of us are, and through flattery are often deceived. Colonel Lindbergh is a courageous man. No one doubts his patriotism. But he is a young man inexperienced and totally unfamiliar with our country, its statesmanship, and its military matters.

Our Government has an exceedingly serious responsibility imposed upon it. If Colonel Lindbergh desires to help in our national defense, let him throw aside all of his false political advisers, and volunteer in the United States Government as an expert in aviation.

Let Colonel Lindbergh cease efforts to create unfounded war fear and lack of confidence in our Government. Let Colonel Lindbergh and his advisers know that when one fools with politics in a national emergency he is fooling with disaster.

Let the people of the United States understand once and for all that there is no immediate danger of attack on this country, that there is future danger of Hitler's involving this country in a serious war, that this country is able, and intends to make any preparation that may be necessary to successfully defend this hemisphere against any invasion by Hitler, or by any other militaristic conquerors.

Our Drift Toward War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY COLONEL LINDBERGH

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, on June 15, 1940, Col. Charles A. Lindbergh delivered another great speech on our foreign relations.

The Colonel delivered the three other speeches on foreign affairs on September 16, 1939, October 14, 1939, and May 20, 1940, all of which may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this session.

Charles A. Lindbergh is a great son of a great father.

I ask the honor of placing his last speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of June 16, 1940]

LINDBERGH CALLS ON AMERICANS TO CURB WAR FEVER—CHARGES FUTURE OF NATION IS PERILED BY MINORITY

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 15.—The text of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh's address on Our Drift Toward War follows:

"I have asked to speak to you again tonight because I believe that we in America are drifting toward a position of far greater seriousness to our future than even this present war. There is an attempt to becloud the issue that confronts us. It is not alone an issue of building an adequate defense for our country. That must and can be done. Our people are solidly behind an adequate military preparedness, and no one believes in it more than I.

"But we must not confuse the question of national defense with the question of entering a European war. And it is just as important not to confuse this present war with the type of war we would have to wage if we fought against Germany. Arming for the defense of America is comparable with normal life, commerce, and culture. It is an integral part of the destiny of our Nation. But arming to attack the continent of Europe would necessitate that the lives and thoughts of every man, woman, and child in this country be directed toward war for the next generation, probably for the next several generations.

"WARNS OF WAR TRAP

"We cannot continue for long to follow the course our Government has taken without becoming involved in war with Germany. There are some who already advocate our entry into such a war. There are many perfectly sincere men and women who believe that we can send weapons to kill people in Europe without becoming involved in war with these people. Still others believe that by gestures and applause we can assist France and England to win without danger to our own country.

"In addition to these, however, there are men among us of less honesty who advocate stepping closer and closer to war, knowing well that a point exists beyond which there can be no turning back. They have baited the trap of war with requests for modest assistance. This latter group is meeting with success at the moment.

"There is a saying that grew in the old West to the effect that a man who enjoys life should never touch his gun unless he means business; that he should never draw unless he is ready to shoot, and that he should never shoot unless he is ready to kill. Those old pioneers of ours knew from long experience that there can be no successful dabbling with death.

"WISDOM OF WEST GONE

"But the red-blooded wisdom of the old West is gone from American politics today. Our present danger results from making gestures with an empty gun after we have already lost the draw. Fortunately, the wide wall of the Atlantic stands between us and the shooting that is going on.

"This dabbling we have been doing in European affairs can lead only to failure in the future as it has in the past. It is not a policy that we can continue to follow and remain a great nation.

"Let us look at our position today. Our leaders have lost the influence we could have exerted as the world's greatest neutral nation. The driblets of munitions we have sold to England and France have had a negligible effect on the trend of the war, and we have not sufficient military strength available to change that trend. We demand that foreign nations refrain from interfering in our hemisphere, yet we constantly interfere in theirs. And while we have been taking an ineffective part in the war abroad, we have inexcusably neglected our defenses at home.

"NO HOME-DEFENSE PLAN

"In fact, we have let our own affairs drift along until we have not even a plan of defense for the continent of North America. We have been doing to England and France what they did to Abyssinia, to Czechoslovakia, to Poland, to Finland, and to Norway—we have encouraged them to hope for help we cannot send.

"Yet with these examples before us, we still continue in this course—the same course that led England to failure abroad and weakness at home, a course that will lead us also to a disastrous and unsuccessful war if we persist in following it.

"When the subject of our participation in war is discussed, most people visualize the war that is now going on in Europe. They think of sending more arms and possibly some soldiers. There is still very little understanding of what our entrance into European war would mean. When we talk of such a war, we must realize that we are considering the greatest struggle the world has yet known—a conflict between hemispheres, one half of the white race against the other half.

"Before allowing ourselves to become further involved, we should consider the conditions which may exist by the time we are ready for military action. If we enter a war at all, we should prepare to meet the worst conditions rather than the best.

"NEED MONTHS TO PREPARE

"It is useless to talk of sending American troops to Europe now, for we would need months of preparation before we could train and equip even a small army, and small efforts do not effect great movements—witness Norway, Holland, and Belgium.

"We must face the fact, regardless of how disagreeable it is to us, that before we can take effective action in a European war the German armies may have brought all Europe under their control. In that case Europe will be dominated by the strongest military nation the world has ever known, controlling a population far larger than our own. If we decide to enter war, we must be prepared to attack that nation. We must prepare to invade a continent which it controls.

"No people ever had a greater decision to make. We hold our children's future in our hands as we deliberate, for if we turn to war, the battles will be hard fought and the outcome is not likely to be decided in our lifetime. This is a question of mortgaging the lives of our children and our grandchildren. Every family in the land would have its wounded and its dead.

"WAR MEANS DICTATORSHIP

"We start at a disadvantage because we are not a military nation. Ours is not a land of guns and marching men. If we decide to fight, then the United States must prepare for war for many years to come, and on a scale unprecedented in all history. In that case we must turn to a dictatorial government, for there is no military efficiency to be lost.

"We should start to build an army of several million men. We will need several hundred thousand airplanes before the battling is over. And we must have a navy large enough to transport this force across the sea. This war we are asked to enter would not be a repetition of the last war. It would be more comparable to the struggle which took place between Athens and Sparta, or Rome and Carthage. It would involve the destiny of America and of western civilization as far into the future as we can see.

"HALT 'EMPTY GUN' GESTURES

"But whatever our decision may be in regard to Europe, we must start now to build our own defenses. We must stop these gestures with an empty gun. In this we are a united Nation. The only question that arises concerns how our defense can best be built.

"We must first construct a clear-cut plan of defense, and have the cooperation of all American countries in carrying it out. We must insist upon military bases being placed wherever they are needed for our safety, regardless of who owns the territory involved. We must be willing to do more than pay taxes and make appropriations. Military strength cannot be purchased by money alone. Strength is a thing of spirit, of preparation, and of sacrifice extending over years of time.

"The men of our country must be willing to give a year of their lives to military training—more if necessary. And our capitalists as well as our soldiers should be willing to serve without personal profit. We must have a nation ready to give whatever is required for its future welfare, and leaders who are more interested in their country than in their own advancement.

"WE HAVE DEFENSE ADVANTAGE

"With an adequate defense no foreign army can invade us. Our advantage in defending America is as great as our disadvantage would be in attacking Europe. From a military geographical standpoint, we are the most fortunate country in the world. There is no other nation in this hemisphere strong enough to even consider attacking us, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans separate us from the warring armies of Europe and Asia.

"If the British Navy could not support an invasion of Norway against the German air force, there is little reason for us to worry about an invasion of America as long as our air force is adequately maintained. As far as invasion by air is concerned, it is impossible for any existing air force to attack effectively across the ocean. In the Arctic regions the severe climate and ruggedness of terrain counteract the vulnerability of shorter distances between land.

"NATION AT CROSSROADS

"With our geographical position, nothing but the gross neglect of our military forces, or quarreling between American countries themselves, could make possible an invasion by foreign armies. America stands today where the road divides, at the signpost of war and peace.

"Now that we have become one of the world's greatest nations, shall we throw away the independent American destiny which our forefathers gave their lives to win? Shall we submerge our future in the endless wars of the old world? Or shall we build our own defenses and leave European war to European countries?

"Shall we continue this suicidal conflict between western nations and white races, or shall we learn from history as well as from modern Europe that a civilization cannot be preserved by conflict among its own peoples, regardless of how different their ideologies may be?

"A FLOOD OF PROPAGANDA

"You men and women of America who believe that our destiny lies in building strength at home and not in war abroad—to you I say that we must act now to stop this trend toward war.

"An organized minority in this country is flooding our Congress and our press with propaganda for war. They are spending large sums of money in advertisements. They are telegraphing, writing, and talking every hour of the day, pushing us closer and closer to the edge. Some are even now demanding a declaration of war.

"If you believe that we should not enter a European war, you must support those of us who oppose such action. We cannot stop this trend alone. Some of your Representatives in Washington are already considering a declaration of war, but they are responsible to you for the action they take. Let them know how you feel about this. Speak to your friends and organize in your community. Nothing but a determined effort on the part of every one of us will prevent the disaster toward which our Nation is now heading."

Imports of Agricultural Products Less in 1938 and 1939 Than in 1929

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a number of statements purporting to show that agricultural imports have been unusually high in recent years are being distributed. As a matter of fact such imports have been lower in recent years, and this is brought out in a table comparing figures for the past 2 years with those of 1929.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a table showing the imports, for examination of specific duties for the years 1929 and the years 1938 and 1939.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

OKLAHOMA DEMOCRATS IN STATE CONVENTION ALSO COMMEND STATE DELEGATION IN CONGRESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, this week Democrats of Oklahoma held their annual convention at Oklahoma City. Every county in the State was well represented. It was a great, harmonious convention. The senior Senator from Oklahoma, ELMER THOMAS, delivered the keynote address. The resolutions presented and unanimously adopted were sane, sensible, progressive, and very much to the point.

Feeling that the resolutions in question will be of special interest to the citizens not only of Oklahoma but of the entire country, I am taking the liberty of submitting same for the RECORD. I am indebted to one of my distinguished constituents, my personal friend, Judge Bert B. Barefoot, chairman of the resolutions committee, for sending a copy of the resolutions. They are as follows:

The democracy of Oklahoma takes great pride in the accomplishments of her representatives in Washington, particularly during the period since the return of the Government to the people on March 4, 1933.

Our present representatives in Congress, Senators ELMER THOMAS and JOSH LEE, as well as our Congressmen, WESLEY E. DISNEY, LYLE BOREN, JACK NICHOLS, WILBURN CARTWRIGHT, MIKE MONRONEY, JED JOHNSON, SAM C. MASSINGALE, PHIL FERGUSON, and WILL ROGERS, have stood foursquare for the great humanitarian policies of our party and have particularly supported our peerless leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his program of conservation of the human and material resources of the Nation.

These gentlemen today occupy places high up in the ranks of those who are directing our governmental policies and have marked out a course of leadership that has drawn unprecedented prestige to the statesmanship of Oklahoma's sons. It would take too much time to call the roll here of these men and their splendid accomplishments. Suffice to say that theirs is a record of which every Oklahoman may take pardonable pride.

At this time of uncertainty, when new problems are daily demanding attention, we think it wise that our national representatives remain in attendance at Washington upon their official duties, and we commend them for their policy of remaining on the job to be of all possible assistance to the other branches of Government in promoting a national-defense program to the end that our Nation may be prepared to defend itself regardless of who may undertake to attack us.

Following his administration this country had 12 years of Republican rule. Its battle cry was "Hands off big business—it knows best." The result was that labor lost all it had ever gained; agriculture was on the verge of bankruptcy; from twenty to thirty million farmers were removed from the purchasing class; banks were failing, business was at a standstill, and 14,000,000 men were walking the highways and byways of this country unable to secure employment for the support of themselves and their families. On that day in March 1933 came to the White House Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the Democrat. His first step was to come to the assistance of the businessman and the banker. With the reformation of the banking laws the banks were reopened, and back of them was the confidence of the people of this Republic. Hardly a dollar has been lost to the bank depositors during his administration. For years after his inauguration he was praised by all business, and not until he was a candidate for a second term did they oppose him. His second step was the assistance of the laboring people of this country. His devotion to this task throughout his entire administration has given to them a magna carta such as they had never had before. Next to agricuture. His devotion to their cause has been a noble effort to place agriculture on a par with industry and finance and to bring to the American farmer restoration of prosperity. Time forbids the mention of all the accomplishments of his administration, but we shall recall: The Federal Deposit insurance law, the creation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Housing Administration, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the T. V. A., the Rural Electrification Administration, the Wagner Labor Act, the Civilian Conservation Corps, the N. Y. A., and the social-security program. These laws have become a permanent part of our Nation and Government.

The people will not give up the man who conceived and brought into effect the laws above mentioned until these further rights are established in this Nation: The right to a job; the right to security in times of private employment and in old age; the right to a decent home; the right to an education; the right to bargain collectively with the boss; the right to enough to eat; the right to adequate pay; the right to sell the products of the farmer's toil at a fair price; the right to security of savings; the right to security of home and family; the right to a fair share of the Nation's resources and to protection against their exploitation.

In his fight to preserve the fundamental principles established by Jefferson, Jackson, and Wilson he, like they, has been attacked by many conscientiously, by others as the organized forces of greed. He has been referred to as a dictator, as an underminer of American institutions, and as an inciter of class hatred, and as one who would seek the destruction of the courts, and a desire to lead us into war. His answer to these are his acts, which reveal a determination for the preservation of democracy in America. His love for peace, his love for humanity, his knowledge and understanding of the great questions which confront the people of this Nation in this great hour of peril and distress has established him as the greatest leader that has ever occupied the White House.

His 8 years' experience with questions of national and international problems, his gifted qualifications, his service to this Republic at this time, has become a national and international necessity. He is a man of the common people, and whom they gladly hear. They want him, not as a partisan, but as a patriot; not to solely occupy high office, but to lead and direct; and in God's good time, in the council of peace, to help assuage the sorrows and right the wrongs of a distorted world.

It is with this knowledge that the overwhelming majority of the citizens of this Nation are demanding his return to the White House, not for a third term, but as the greatest and grandest leader this Nation has ever had. In common with this overwhelming majority, the Democrats of Oklahoma, this day in convention assembled, do hereby instruct our delegates to the National Democratic Convention, to be held in the city of Chicago on the 15th day of July 1940, to cast their votes for the nomination of the greatest living Democrat, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, as the Democratic candidate for President of the United States; and in the event he refuses the nomination, that the delegates be then instructed, under the unit rule, to so cast their votes for someone in favor of the policies of the present administration as they deem to the best interest of the Nation, the State, and the Democratic Party.

Effect of the Poll Tax Upon Voting in Mississippi Primaries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, following up my remarks last week, I present herewith primary figures for three different election years in Mississippi to show that the poll tax cuts down primary votes as well as election votes. Particularly noteworthy are the facts that:

First. Total votes cast in the average Mississippi primary were 22,199, less than one-fourth of the 106,000 votes cast in the average election in a non-poll-tax district.

Second. Average votes for a successful primary candidate were 13,382. Yet 292 district representatives from non-poll-tax States each received more than three times this number of votes in the 1938 off-year election.

Third. The district with the greatest population (half again as large as normal) averaged the fewest votes both in primary and election. Total primary votes averaged even less than election votes, as in two out of three years the candidate was nominated without opposition and no one came to the polls; and yet in the last election he received only 2,172 votes, fewer than any other candidate in the entire country. In 2 counties in the district, with over 79,000 people, only 163 votes were cast—one-fifth of 1 percent. In the non-poll-tax areas of the country over a third of the population votes—more than 70 times as many as in this Mississippi district.

Fourth. Of the native whites of voting age, 70 percent are disfranchised by the poll tax from even voting in the Democratic primaries.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Nation-wide campaign to help the Allies in every manner short of war, we should face the facts.

War Department figures, as of May 1, 1940, reveal that more critical items of equipment were abandoned by the British in their retreat from Flanders than are now possessed by the United States Army.

That being the case, how in Heaven's name are we to help the Allies without impairing our own defense?

This Congress recently authorized an increase to 400,000 men in our Regular Army. These men must be equipped, as must be 280,000 National Guardsmen.

It might be of passing interest to note here that the Chief of Staff of our Army recently testified before a House committee that there is not a sufficient supply of cloth in the United States to uniform such an army, let alone equipping it with critical items of equipment.

The exact status of critical items of equipment for the preparedness military program of this Nation—official War Department figures as of May 1, 1940—is shown in the following table:

The National-Defense Program

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be unanimous agreement in this country that we should spend for national defense and preparedness as much as may be necessary and adequate to meet the world situation properly. One reservation, however, is made. From the letters I am receiving daily I am convinced that more thought and attention should be given to how we are going to spend the money which we Members of Congress are being asked to appropriate. There seems to be some doubt as to the wisdom of the policy that has been pursued in the expenditure of over $7,000,000,000 during the last few years for that purpose. I have a letter from Mr. Walter H. Wheeler, an outstanding engineer of my city, which points out in one respect just how waste enters the picture and which expresses very succinctly the idea I am making this morning. I read:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1940.

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I note the War and Navy Departments are proposing to let negotiated contracts for new construction.

The excuse offered is to save time by letting contracts before plans are drawn or completed.

I want to protest with all the vigor at my command against this practice. There never was a construction done on which time and money would not have been saved had the plans been fully completed before the construction was started. There is absolutely no excuse for adopting this half-baked method, and there is every opportunity for irregularities, excessive costs, and poorly considered construction.

With all the idle engineers there are in this country who would be glad to prepare plans for the Government, there is not the slightest excuse for this procedure.

Respectfully yours,

WALTER H. WHEELER.

Mr. Speaker, I think Mr. Wheeler is correct in his statement, and I protest against this and all other wasteful methods, and in the name of good government and of our thousands of idle engineers I call on the Government to cease and desist from this policy.

The Cummings Sugar Bill (H. R. 9654) To Extend to December 31, 1941, the Provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE LEWIS
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, vitally important to our State of Colorado, and to 16 other States producing beet sugar, is the bill (H. R. 9654) to extend to December 31, 1941, the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937. Tomorrow, Tuesday, June 18, this bill will be brought before the House under a special rule.

There are 70,000 sugar-beet growers in 17 States, and the production of beets requires the employment of 100,000 field workers annually. Ninety-four beet-sugar factories give employment to about 10,000 men—no women or children are employed—on an annual average throughout every year. In addition, there are thousands of men in coal mines and limestone quarries, part of whose employment is directly dependent on this beet-sugar industry. In 1939 every acre of beets grown in the United States resulted in $35 of revenue for the railroads. Moreover, there are many hundreds engaged in the fattening of cattle and sheep on beet pulp—and others in stockyards whose continued employment is dependent upon the passage of this bill. An instance of the importance of these feeding activities is the fact that the byproducts of 13 of the 18 beet-sugar factories in Colorado are used to feed 22 percent of all the lambs and 11 percent of all cattle dry-lot fed in the United States.

As in some other States, raising and processing of sugar beets, with the numerous dependent industries, constitute one of the most important bases of the economic structure of Colorado.

Failure to enact this legislation at this session would deal a disastrous blow to the welfare of several States. On behalf of the delegation from Colorado I earnestly request all our friends be present tomorrow in order to help adopt the rule and insure passage of H. R. 9654.

Location of the 94 beet-sugar factories in 17 States is shown on the following tabulation:

Foreign Situation and Possibility of Formation of Third Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON
OF COLORADO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON, OF COLORADO

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, on Saturday evening, June 15, I had the privilege of delivering an address over a Nation-wide hook-up from the Mutual Broadcasting Co.'s studio, Station WOL, in Washington. Since I dealt with a subject of widespread interest and importance, I ask that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A THIRD PARTY MAY BE THE ANSWER

I thank the Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee for this opportunity.

If the $14,000,000,000 investment represented in the war debts had been invested in antiaircraft guns and pursuit planes, our democracy would be safe from every potential invader today, which proves conclusively that the place to save our democracy is not on the Rhine or the English Channel but right here on our own liberty-inspired soil. The suggestion of the Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee that these debts be liquidated by the cession of certain strategically valuable territory in the Western Hemisphere now held by England and France is both sound and reasonable. Desperately, we need an air base in Newfoundland to protect the North Atlantic; desperately, we need Bermuda as the first line of defense on the Atlantic coast; and certain French and English territory in the West Indies would serve us a good purpose in the defense of Panama.

On this particular anniversary of their due date there is not much point, however, in quibbling about the unpaid war debts of England and France except firmly to resolve that the United States shall never finance another war in Europe. Such a stand is merely ordinary, good, common sense, and yet the temptation today to repeat our error of 25 years ago is very real indeed.

Tonight the French and the English with tears in their voices are pleading for our help. It is not easy to refuse old friends with their backs to the wall, fighting a losing war even though stupid statesmanship largely determined their unfortunate plight.

EASY TO GET INTO WAR

It would be easy for America to get into this war. Cunning British diplomacy which began with the colorful visit of the King and Queen of England to the White House, the clever use of propaganda on the screen and in the press appealing to our emotions, and the economic temptation to American capitalists to take the short cut to prosperity via war are powerful influences urging us in; and it will take all the common sense and sound judgment which we can muster to escape. It is hard to subject ourselves to the discipline which impartial neutrality prescribes as prudent; and, yet, if we but weigh the matter and count the costs, we must shrink from that raging holocaust as we would shrink from the dripping jaws of a prehistoric monster.

COST OF AMERICAN WAR IN EUROPE STAGGERING

It would cost the United States the lives of 5,000,000 men and $100,000,000,000 of borrowed money for this Republic to defeat Germany in Europe, and our economic system would be thrown so completely out of gear by such an ill-advised adventure that it could never be righted under our present form of government. The day we enter this war we pass from a democracy to a dictatorship from which we have small chance to emerge. We would like to help the Allies determine the real-estate boundaries of Europe, but in doing that our own boundaries will disappear. We would like to preserve the so-called democracies over there, imperfect as they are, but in accomplishing that more or less worthy objective, the greatest and best democracy of all human history must give up its life. Our resolve to remain a neutral requires no apology, for it is based upon the highest ethical and humanitarian conceptions and considerations. To go in is to betray civilization, democracy, and decency and not to preserve them.

AMERICAN INTERVENTION WOULD BE FUTILE

If our entrance into the war on the side of the Allies would assure an Allied victory, and if an Allied victory would assure a just, lasting, and equitable peace, if it would assure a substitution of cooperation for force in the family of nations, and if it would assure a spiritual awakening to replace the damnable materialistic philosophy spreading throughout Europe today, America might be justified in intervening; but none of these things can be assured. Unfortunately they are not even remotely likely.

Each and every one of the belligerents has spurned the conference table. Each has hissed words of hate and violence at the other, boasting that he is waging a war to the finish in which quarter will neither be asked nor given. Each of them is bent upon utterly crushing the other. There is no thought of negotiated or equitable peace by either side. The odds against establishing world peace by American success on European battlefields are tremendous, while a program to achieve world peace by American precept is bound in the end to succeed. National defense does not consist alone of ships and men. That they are vital goes without saying, but the most important defense abides in the morale, the enlightenment, and the happiness of American citizens and our domestic problems should be solved as the very essence of a good national defense.

AN IMPORTANT LESSON

In recent weeks we have seen two great nations rich in manpower and rich in natural resources badly defeated on the field of battle by another power comparatively inferior in these essentials, but far superior in the modern armaments of war. Unless we grasp the lesson of these significant disclosures we shall also perish. The undisputed fact that we are the richest Nation on earth in natural resources adds to our dangers; nor will our superiority in the field of industry and science and the ready alertness and superb courage of our manpower alone save us. These things are not enough in themselves. We must also have military power, and at once, and time is the essence of its success.

MONROE DOCTRINE LOADED WITH DYNAMITE

The Monroe Doctrine entails a tremendous responsibility upon the United States and in itself is the greatest threat to our peace with which we must contend. Under it, we assume the obligation of protecting the territory of every government in the Western Hemisphere against all political penetration from Europe regardless of the wishes or conduct of such American governments. Canada, without any consideration whatsoever of us, has recently declared war on two powerful European governments and the United States is bound to fight to protect this warring neighbor should her war in Europe spread to Canadian territory. This illustrates the dangers to which the Monroe Doctrine exposes us.

Since one nation alone can plunge the world into war, the outlook for world peace is exceedingly discouraging and difficult; but the darker the prospect, the greater the effort to achieve peace should be. This Nation cannot by itself insure world peace, since world peace depends upon the cooperation of all nations; but it can and must insure its own peace if it would live.

MAKE THE UNITED STATES IMPREGNABLE

In spite of the dismal outlook abroad, America can be made impregnable against any known method of warfare and against any known force or combination of forces now existing and that, indeed, is heartening. San Francisco Harbor has been declared absolutely impregnable by the greatest military experts of the day. No enemy would be so foolish as to launch an attack upon it. Naval and military experts repeatedly have been assigned the problem of theoretically overcoming its defenses and all have failed. What has been done for that harbor can be done for every mile of our coast.

PEACE COSTS MONEY

There are some things which money will not buy, but peace is not one of them. If our billions for defense be spent wisely, peace will be assured. The time to provide a defense is before we need a defense—before we face the crisis of war—for then likely we will never be called upon to defend ourselves. Modern war symbolized by the "blitzkrieg" strikes suddenly and will give us no opportunity to gird our loins after it once begins. I do not believe that America is likely to be invaded soon, neither do I believe that assurance can be given that we will not be attacked, since we hold out the richest loot in all the world to tempt the covetous and predacious conqueror whose vaulting ambitions appear to reach the stars. If Hitler wins this war his foreign policy must determine the extent and nature of our defenses. It will suffice to say that they must be strong enough to convince every potential enemy that it will not pay him to invade our territory. If we keep out of war, but prepare for war on whatever gigantic scale is made necessary by the threat of potential foes, we will preserve our democracy and the lives of our youth and become a powerful and constructive influence for righteousness and justice in the family of nations. There is no other course, regardless of the evil propaganda to the contrary.

FOREIGN POLICIES VITAL

Foreign policies are the most vital functions of government and they must be formulated by the rule of reason and not by the rule of hate or favoritism. We can hardly censure belligerents for making a desperate effort to drag us into the conflict on their side. That should be perfectly understandable. Neither can we condemn belligerents from clothing themselves in the pure white robes of lofty ideals and grandiose moral aims. Why should they not place their bloody struggle upon the highest pedestal of purity within the grasp of their own fevered imagination? We can sympathize with their purpose in selling the idea that their war is a holy war in defense of civilization and democracy and decency, but why should a people at peace swallow that propaganda without misgivings and doubt?

NO ONE FIGHTS OUR WARS

France and England are either fighting our war, or they are not fighting our war. Our peace and liberty are either dependent upon an allied victory, or they are not. If it is our war, we belong over there fighting and dying side by side with the patriots of France and England. If we are justified in aiding the Allies, we ought to do it like men, with men, openly and aboveboard, not like some whimpering, craven creature lacking the courage of his convictions. No one other than ourselves is deceived by such a contemptuous policy. Hundreds of letters reach my desk urging credit, ships, planes, treasure, guns—everything except men for the Allies. What an utterly contemptible cowardly suggestion. Of course, many who advocate such a despicable policy are not sincere. They know that men must follow treasure. They know that we must be edged into war an inch at a time. If it is our war, every resource and every man at our command should be in France. But it is not our war by any stretch of the imagination, and therefore, and for that reason only, we ought to keep completely out of it, and maintain a strict neutrality instead of becoming a nonbelligerent.

Measures short of war are ignoble and unworthy of a great power. Imagine a Washington, a Jackson, a Cleveland, a Theodore Roosevelt talking about such sissy things as "steps just short of war" or of being a nonbelligerent. You cannot get halfway into a war and not slide all the way in. Italy tried that and now she is an active belligerent.

NONBELLIGERENCY UNLAWFUL

I am awed by the bold, reckless, idealistic spirit of the President, which fired him with sufficient enthusiasm to change the status of his country overnight from a neutral to a nonbelligerent. However, I cannot approve this ill-advised and extremely dangerous action. His strategy was neither sanctioned by the laws of this Republic nor supported by the approval of its citizens. Congress has the sole constitutional power to declare war, but of what avail when the President, who directs and administers the foreign policy of this Government, has converted the United States from a neutral into a nonbelligerent without the authority of Congress. A formal declaration of war is no longer deemed essential.

TWO THINGS ARE KEEPING US OUT

I am forced to believe against my will that the two considerations which are keeping the administration out of the European War are, first, the election to be held in November and, second, the pitiable state of our implements of war. Perhaps it is a good thing for us that we do not have 50,000 airplanes and 10,000 tanks today and that this is an election year, otherwise we might be in the European war right now as an active belligerent instead of being in it as a nonbelligerent.

ISOLATE WAR—NOT IDEALS

The President holds up to utter scorn anyone who dares to think in terms of the United States minding its own business. He calls that isolation. Perhaps he is justified in his bitterness if he speaks of the isolation of ideas, but every sincere Christian believes in world-wide brotherhood and cooperation with all of his heart. No one wants to make a jail out of this country. No one wants an isolation of spiritual things. No one wants to withhold one single, solitary beneficial thing, spiritual or material, from the rest of the world. And no one wants to keep one good thing out of this country. However, many patriotic Americans want to keep Europe's wars out, and for that we are contemptuously sneered at as isolationists. Fate has bestowed natural advantages upon the United States which are not lessened by Presidential sneers. Geography has separated us from the aggressors of Asia by 5,000 miles and from the aggressors of Europe by 3,000 miles. It will be a long time before Omaha will need to buy gas masks for its children or enforce the black-out, as was hinted in the President's recent address to Congress. Our citizens, mentally and physically, are far above the average. In science and art we excel. Our economy is practically self-contained. Our situation, natural, economic, and political, is not remotely approached by any nation on earth.

AN INTERVENTIONIST WILL NOT DO

The most important election ever to be held in the history of the world will occur in the United States of America in November. In a few days the Republicans will name their candidate at Philadelphia, and a little later the Democrats will meet in Chicago to name their candidate. I am not indulging in threats or idle talk or personal opinion, but unless one or the other of these great parties names a candidate who is not an interventionist, the millions of peace-loving people of this Nation will form a third party that will nominate such a candidate. A fair open referendum on the question of peace versus intervention must be had in November for it is the overshadowing political issue of the generation. Each of these conventions will adopt party planks in their platforms which will pay lip service to peace, but will not be worth the paper upon which they are written. The past record of the candidate and his known predilections are all that will count in November. Pledges made by candidates with fingers crossed will not fool the people this time. The political party that nominates an interventionist in the approaching conventions will go down to ignominious defeat. The mothers and fathers of America, the youth of America who have no desire to die in the war of imperialism abroad, the patriots who served in the last war and who have no flag other than the Stars and Stripes to serve, the members of organized labor who would be regimented like cattle should a European war come, are in a majority in America, and they will rise in their wrath against any interventionist or anyone suspected of being an interventionist who dares to run for President in 1940. The politicians of the two great parties do have a monopoly on convention delegates, but thank God they have no monopoly on the votes of the people, and the people will not remain inarticulate in this momentous crisis. Naturally, I hope and pray that the Democratic Party will be the peace party. Naturally, I pray that it will name a candidate in whose hands the peace of this Republic will not be in doubt, but if the Democratic Party fails to do its duty and makes the mistake of nominating an interventionist for the office of President, so far as I am concerned, my country will come before my party.

WEAKLINGS GO TO WAR

It is easy to get into war, just as it is easy to indulge in any other evil thing. To keep out of war is a nobler and more difficult task. The road to war is served well by weaklings, while the road to peace requires strong, courageous men. A third-rate statesman can involve his country in war, while a navigator of the first magnitude is required to steer the ship of state safely through the dangerous shoals into the deep, calm, tranquil waters of peace. We need to be strong in spirit, strong in patriotism, strong in our love of freedom, strong in the machinery of war; and we need to be so strong in our moral fiber that we will be able to put the evil temptation of intervention and European meddling—the curse of this administration—behind us forever.

In spite of all the evidence to the contrary, I still believe in the philosophy that man, with God's help, will yet succeed in his efforts to become master of his own destiny. I refuse to subscribe to the doctrine that man in the end will deliberately destroy himself. When war becomes sufficiently destructive, mankind must adopt peace for self-preservation, if for no better reason; and we must proceed on the basis that when humanity really wants peace, humanity will have peace.

The So-Called Dempsey Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

STATEMENT BY HENRY H. COLLINS, JR.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made before the Senate Immigration Committee in the hearings on H. R. 4860 by Henry H. Collins, Jr. Mr. Collins is chairman of the legislative committee of the Descendants of the American Revolution, and his statement is a very concise and impressive argument against the proposed legislation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the subcommittee, I should like briefly on behalf of our other chapters and the national organization to supplement the testimony previously given before your committee by the president of our local chapter, Mr. Hunt. The descendants of the American Revolution is an organization devoted to carrying out in practice today those principles for which our forefathers fought 165 years ago. For this reason we are wholeheartedly opposed to this present bill (H. R. 4860).

Among those principles were hospitality to immigrants who joined with citizens in settling the country, and freedom of speech for immigrant and citizen alike. Remember the language of the first amendment: "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." The term used is "people" not citizens.

The Dempsey bill violates both of these principles. It divides the residents of this country into two classes (1) aliens and (2) citizens, and it denies to the first of these classes the right of free speech. Since the Constitution guarantees free speech to citizens and aliens alike it is clear, either that the bill is unconstitutional, or else that a fundamental right that today would be taken from the alien might tomorrow be withdrawn from the citizen.

Objection is often made to allowing strangers within our gates to advocate changes in the structure of the house that shelters them; but the visitor of yesterday is the resident of today and the citizen of tomorrow, and from the beginning of our country's history citizen and alien alike have joined to advocate those changes in our Government which have made it the more perfect instrument it is today.

Others have cited the gagged mouths and minds that must result from invoking a cloture on civic thought and making belief in an improvement in our form of government a basis for deportation. The reorganization bill, woman suffrage, the child-labor amendment in our day, the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the very Constitution itself in the days of our forefathers—belief in or advocacy of any one of these would have been punishable by deportation had the Dempsey bill been then in effect. How many of our grandfathers and grandmothers would have been sent back under its provisions to the lands of terror and tyranny from which they had fled to our shores? Two of mine would, or I would not now be eligible for membership in this organization which I represent.

It is sometimes said that those who advocate overthrow of the Government by force and violence should be punished. But Justice Brandeis, I believe, set it forth that unless this advocacy constituted a "clear and present" danger to organized society, it was neither treasonable nor contrary to the Bill of Rights. Indeed, common sense informs us that it is far better to have dissident groups working in the open, where their views, if erroneous, may be combated and corrected in the full light of publicity and criticism, than to have them thrust underground into illegality. Once forced into hiding and secrecy, the most fantastic theories will luxuriate and gain converts in the dark atmosphere of conspiracy—theories that exposed to the open view and study of mankind might soon wither and lose all public support.

Surely no one in this room thinks that, in spite of recent military adventures, the Government of the German Reich is more stable than our own. Yet in Germany no criticism of the form of government is tolerated—an outward uniformity of opinion prevails under the swish of the rubber hose and the shadow of the executioner's axe. But everyone knows that the core of the Fascist state is rotten, and that dissension, intrigue have already nourished a hydra of underground opposition.

In our country, on the other hand, one would think that nothing but criticism of the Government was allowed. On any newsstand three journals attack the Government where one supports it and all forms of minority opinion are allowed to wield such influence as their ideas can command. Yet who would say that contrasted with that of Germany our Government is not infinitely more stable, rooted as it is in the masses of the American people, and with its various branches flourishing or withering under the alternate sunshine or storms of the public will.

Finally, let us remember that we make a mistake in ever singling out one group of our people as culprits. Aliens found, founded, and built up this country. Von Steuben, Pulaski, and Lafayette fought for its independence. We, descendants of the Revolution in which they strove, cannot go back on the memory of their comrades-in-arms. Let us therefore defeat this bill so that we may still say, as does the bronze invitation on the Statue of Liberty:

"Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses, yearning to breathe free, the wretched refuse of your teeming shores. Send these the homeless, tempest-tossed to me. I lift my lamp beside the golden door."

The Fight for Liberty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY PRESTON DELANO AT HOT SPRINGS, VA.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I was much encouraged by reading a speech delivered by the Comptroller of the Currency which shows that the banking system of the United States is in very sound condition. The speech was delivered before the District of Columbia Bankers' Association on June 7, 1940. I ask that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is a very different world from the one we lived in when we met here a year ago, and somehow it seems quite futile to engage in any extended discussion of matters which so interested us on the occasion of that last meeting. The year has brought us face to face with realities, sharp and terrible realities, which have shocked us beyond measure and rudely aroused us from that comfortable sense of security in which we took our ease. The issue which is faced today by the free peoples of the world far overshadows most of our domestic problems. It so dwarfs our petty quarrels and rivalries that one has no patience with those who would sap our strength in such unimportant sham battles.

The great issue is, of course, whether we are to have a free economy, whether personal initiative and personal liberty are still to play their primary roles in the development of civilization. In the face of such a challenge there is little else that matters. The ordinary business of living must go on—the office of the Comptroller of the Currency must continue its job of chartering and supervising the national and district banks, but underlying this routine is our deep concern for the preservation of the American way of life. It has been said that in order to successfully resist those forces which seek to regiment the world—those forces which seek to deny man his rights of assembly, free speech, free press, and private property, it may be necessary to give up all, or almost all, of these precious things; in other words, that we may have to regiment ourselves in order to successfully resist regimentation.

It is at this last barricade that democracy must show its strength. We can, and we must prove that a free economy, working with all those rights which are inherent in the word "liberty," can successfully gird itself to resist the onslaught of a perfectly organized tyranny. If we fail, all the years since Magna Carta have been lost and we are no longer free men.

For a democracy and free economy successfully to do this job, its members must all willingly and gladly do their share. Whether engaged in industry, agriculture, in banking, or in any of the other multifarious activities which make up our economy, we must be certain that our obligations to the general welfare—or to society, if you please—are fully and generously discharged. In other words, each integral part of this vast machine must do its work well, not only for its own advantage but also for the sake of preserving its liberty and that of its fellows.

I think I may say that the men who are responsible for the destinies of the 5,200 national banks appreciate the importance of this cause, and, for their part, are ready to take up the challenge. The national banking system has never been stronger. The resources of its banks now total more than $35,000,000,000. Its assets are in the best condition in its history and there is liquidity to meet any emergency or to provide for any necessary expansion. The last 10 years have tested the mettle of bank management, largely eliminated the unfit, and left us a veteran and seasoned personnel capable of meeting any crisis. There may be a grave trial ahead of us. There may be suffering and distress, but I feel certain that the bankers of the United States are ready, as once before in a dark hour their forefathers were ready, to pledge to the service of this Republic their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

Let's Stop This Insane Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Sunday, June 16, entitled "Let's Stop This Insane Business."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 16, 1940]

LET'S STOP THIS INSANE BUSINESS

Has Roosevelt half declared war? The answer, we think, is yes; and this country is in danger of going all the way unless Congress, heeding the voice of the people, calls a halt to his present course.

In violation of The Hague treaties on neutrality and international usage, the administration has already made existing supplies of the American Army available for use by the Allies.

By a careful reading of the news and the articles of the columnists who have access to White House sources, we can discover the other steps by which the administration will, if the course of the war and public opinion permit, lead us closer and closer to open participation in the hostilities.

Already New York shipping heads are conferring with official Washington over proposals to repeal the Cash and Carry Act so as to allow American ships to carry war supplies abroad. They are quoted as saying that "President Roosevelt's pledge of aid would be pointless unless vessels were available to transport the goods."

The significance of this should be fully weighed by everyone who is interested in keeping this country out of the war. The administration is discussing the possibility of allowing American merchantmen to try to run the submarine and air blockade of allied ports, when to do so would obviously be an act of war.

Such a course makes no sense whatever except as a palpable invitation to the inevitable sinkings which would become the pretext of our declaring war on Germany.

Another version of this proposal is that the American Navy be used to convoy supply ships to Britain and France. Still another form is the ingenious suggestion, made by a columnist close to President Roosevelt, that the United States might send clothing, food, and other nonmilitary necessities in unconvoyed ships bearing the insignia of the Red Cross, with the warning that the torpedoing or bombing of any of them would bring us into the war as an acknowledged belligerent.

Accompanying each such tendentious action would be a new fusillade of denunciations of Germany and Italy by ranking members of the administration, such as the statement of Secretary Wallace yesterday that Hitler is "determined to subjugate the world," and that the Germans look upon this hemisphere as their "eventual happy hunting ground."

Whether Adolf Hitler's ambition includes the hope of dominating the Western Hemisphere remains to be seen, but in any event it is—as Landon points out—the part of strength and courage to "tread softly until the big job of preparedness is well under way."

The decisive battles in Europe will be fought—if indeed they have not already been fought—before America will be in position to rush to Europe enough planes and tanks and antiaircraft artillery to decide the issue.

Premier Reynaud says that France must have thousands of tanks and clouds of planes instantly. America simply does not have them to send.

Our job is national self-defense. We must lose no time in preparing to defend democracy on these shores. We will be better able to summon the stern consecration which this task requires if we frankly recognize our limitations with respect to the struggle abroad.

The American people are unanimous in supporting the Allies by "methods short of war," but they do not interpret this familiar phrase to include methods which deliberately violate the accepted rules of neutrality and place this country in the same relative position to the Allies that Italy occupied toward Germany before it formally entered the war.

Let us not deceive ourselves and let us not permit Roosevelt to deceive us. As long ago as last January, Major Eliot said that there is "a good deal of loose talk going around about eventual American participation in the present war by all means short of the actual dispatch of an expeditionary Army to France; that is, by naval, aerial, economic, and financial means. I call this sort of thing 'loose talk,' because it is plain that unless its originators are either ignorant or dishonest, they have failed to think their proposition through."

Major Eliot then proceeded, in a devastating analysis, to knock the loose talk into a cocked hat. He showed that, so far as naval participation goes, it is both "useless and dangerous" to talk about naval help for the Allies unless we and the Allies are prepared to abandon the Pacific to Japan. Furthermore, Eliot questioned the value of this naval help, as well he might, in view of the subsequent fact that the British Navy in the present war failed in the one vital arena where it might have been expected to function effectively—the German invasion of Norway.

As for supplying an air force, Eliot pointed out that we would also have to establish our own air bases, as for "obvious technical reasons" we could not use British and French bases even if they had bases to spare. Our air force would be subject to the British and French high command, unless we also sent an expeditionary force, which Eliot says we would do, just as we did in 1917. Eliot said:

"We might remind ourselves that our history and national character do not incline us toward half measures, do not indicate that we are likely to make half a war. We might, therefore, usefully reflect not only upon the nature of the propositions now being bruited about, but also on the certainty that unless we wish to get into this war all the way we will do well to avoid taking the first steps in that direction."

Trading on the deep sympathy which Americans instinctively feel for the French and British, and for the ideals of justice and liberty which we passionately adhere to, our reckless, jingoistic President has already taken the first steps which Eliot warned against last January.

Roosevelt has put us halfway into this war without the consent of Congress, without the consent of the American people, despite the fact that he knows the American people—as shown by the Fortune and Gallup polls—do not want to enter this war. He has put us halfway in even though we are not prepared to furnish the aid which the Allies really need—tanks and modern airplanes. Potent as Roosevelt's oratory is, it cannot prevail against 80-ton tanks and giant bombing planes.

And oratory is about all Roosevelt has got. Let us quit this insane half-war stuff and buckle down to the job of defending our own undefended country.

Our Course Is Clear

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Chicago Daily News of June 11, 1940. As is well known, Col. Frank Knox, who was the Republican Vice-Presidential candidate in 1936, is the editor of the Chicago Daily News.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily News of June 11, 1940]

OUR COURSE IS CLEAR

When the Italian dictator, from the balcony of his Roman palace, announced Italy's fateful decision to enter the war against France and England, the last frail hope of circumscribing the conflict to western Europe vanished. That hope began to fade when Stalin attacked the Finns; it grew less when Hitler invaded Denmark and Norway. Then came the Low Countries—Holland and Belgium—with their ghastly lesson of what "total war" really meant. And now Italy's entrance completes the bloody prelude to world war on a scale we have never known.

Virtually all of Europe is now involved, from the Arctic North to the Mediterranean. Soon the flames will leap that intervening sea to sear and torture Africa. Wherever British drums may roll out their summons or French bugles call to the colors men will turn from peace to war—Egypt, India, South Africa, Morocco, Tunisia, Australia, New Zealand, the Dutch East Indies, French Indo-China. Everywhere the tocsin sounds for a struggle for survival, which has already cost hundreds of thousands of lives and which will cost millions.

We have said "everywhere." Not quite everywhere. Save for Canada, the Western Hemisphere is as yet at peace. It is a precarious peace. In stern reality only a seeming peace. For this New World of ours knows Hitler and Mussolini and Stalin for the enemies they are of everything we cherish, just as they are the foes of those they now threaten by the force of arms. We know our freedoms, and our institutions that make those freedoms possible, cannot survive in a world where the Hitlers, the Mussolinis, and the Stalins rule.

Loving peace, and with no national aspirations that clash with others' rights, we have, as a people, been slow to believe that our institutions, or our security, were really threatened. It seemed simply incredible that the madness that had engulfed western Europe in a holocaust of flaming, ruthless, blinding hate could cross the ocean and encompass us in its deadly flames. We comforted ourselves with the earnest hope that the fire in Europe would burn itself out before our national house itself caught fire.

Unless we be fools we will no longer build on such vain hopes. How vain they are we are told by Mussolini himself, for he said as he led his Fascist legions into battle:

"We shall take the field against the plutocratic and reactionary democracies of the west, who have at all times obstructed the march of the Italian people."

The "democracies of the west." Can there still be men so blind, so fatuous, so fearful, that they will not include the greatest democracy of the west within the scope of the objectives of the Berlin-Rome axis? If there be such, their numbers are negligible, and they must be thrust aside by men of sterner stuff who know a challenge when they hear it, and are not afraid to meet it when it means defense of things that are far more precious than life itself.

The American people, not forgetting their heritage come down from the battlefields whereon our liberties were won, will, with one accord, lift up their hearts and voices with the President of of the United States as he prays to Almighty God for "those beyond the seas who are maintaining with magnificent valor their battle for freedom."

And with the President, in a spirit of national unity which the grave danger of the hour creates, we will join in the pledge he gave the world yesterday to "pursue two obvious and simultaneous courses; we will extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this Nation and, at the same time, we will harness and speed up the use of those resources in order that we ourselves in the Americas may have equipment and training equal to the task of any emergency and every defense."

This is the voice of America, speaking through Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

It will ring through the land, stilling the puny voices of partisanship, silencing the quibblings of critics, rousing the patriotism and the united cooperation of every American who worthily enjoys the privilege of citizenship.

Here is no qualified declaration; here is no limited pledge of assistance to those who are fighting the battle of freedom. All that we have that they need to win that fight will be given. And we ourselves will swiftly prepare for any emergency and every defense.

This is the kind of leadership the hour demands.

The Tax Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM BALTIMORE SUN

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Baltimore Sun of June 16, 1940, entitled "The Tax Bill Made Better But Still Not the Best."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of June 16, 1940]

THE TAX BILL MADE BETTER BUT STILL NOT BEST

True to expectation, the Senate Finance Committee has tacked onto the revenue bill to raise additional funds for national defense the Byrd amendment calling for a 10-percent cut in all items of nonmilitary expenditure. In a surprise move the committee also incorporated in its draft the provisions of Senator TOWNSEND'S useful bill to forbid further purchases of foreign silver.

Both amendments are to be regarded with the highest favor. If accepted by both the Senate and the House—and sentiment in its favor seems to be dominant in both Chambers—the Byrd amendment will release an added half billion dollars of revenues for use in the purchase or maintenance of the armaments for which some $4,600,000,000 in appropriations are about to be made. Such a saving is an essential step in any program of financial preparedness. When the Nation is confronted with the necessity of spending three billion a year more than it had planned to spend for defense, it is foolhardy to carry on with other outlays as if nothing had happened.

The Townsend plan to stop the buying of foreign silver serves the same general purpose of financial preparedness. Our purchases of silver abroad have represented little more than a subsidy to exports. The silver we have been getting in return for goods is worthless to us, and to continue to exchange American products for worthless silver at a time like this is to tilt at windmills. Our situation is far too serious for such dissipation of our resources. The Senate has already recognized the force of these considerations by adopting the Townsend bill, but the House has refused to consider it, basing its refusal on the ground that because the bill served certain revenue purposes it could not constitutionally originate in the Senate. Its incorporation in the tax bill meets this technical objection, and it may be hoped that the House will have the good sense to accept it, now that the way to consideration in that Chamber has been opened.

These two changes aside, the Finance Committee accepted the bill largely as it came from the House. Contrary to its usual practice, it did not revise the tax schedules in any extensive way. It eliminated the provision for increased levies on tobacco and substituted a graduated tax on admissions to bring in an equivalent amount, a change which, on the whole, seems advisable. But there was no real effort to revise the House bill in a way that would have enlarged the yield of the new imposts. Senator BYRD'S plan for a retroactive application of the 10-percent supertax—which the Senate euphemistically called a defense tax—seems not to have been considered at all. This is to be regretted. The revenue bill as it came from the House did not go far enough. Even with the Byrd economy amendment it does not go far enough. To insure real financial preparedness it will be necessary to secure additional revenue and to work toward still more decisive economies.

It may have been the Finance Committee's intention to let these more decisive steps await the formation of a fundamental tax and expenditure program, such as Senator BYRD has called for. If so, the preparation of such a program ought to be initiated at once. The more quickly we come to grips with the fundamental job of paying for our security the more secure we shall be.

Col. Charles A. Lindbergh

REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD KNUTSON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday evening Col. Charles A. Lindbergh delivered over a national hook-up a defense talk that will long stand as a most timely and thoughtful contribution to American statesmanship. Would that we had more men of his high type in public life.

Colonel Lindbergh comes from a fine American family, and in his veins flow the best blood in all the world. For 10 years his distinguished father served with fidelity and distinction in this body as a Representative from the State of Minnesota. Colonel Lindbergh inherited from his able father great qualities of courage, loyalty, and sanity. One of the replies made to his talk on the following evening was an insult to our intelligence. Unlike Colonel Lindbergh's talk, which was calm, sound, constructive, and deliberate, the reply was abusive, shallow, and altogether partisan. [Applause.]

I have asked to speak to you again tonight because I believe that we, in America, are drifting toward a position of far greater seriousness to our future than even this present war. There is an attempt to becloud the issue that confronts us. It is not alone an issue of building an adequate defense for our country. That must and can be done. Our people are solidly behind an adequate military preparedness, and no one believes in it more than I.

But we must not confuse the question of national defense with the question of entering a European war, and it is just as important not to confuse this present war with the type of war we would have to wage if we fought against Germany. Arming for the defense of America is compatible with normal life, commerce, and culture. It is an integral part of the destiny of our Nation. But arming to attack the Continent of Europe would necessitate that the lives and thoughts of every man, woman, and child in this country be directed toward war for the next generation—probably for the next several generations.

TRAP OF WAR BAITED

We cannot continue for long to follow the course our Government has taken without becoming involved in war with Germany. There are some who already advocate our entry into such a war. There are many perfectly sincere men and women who believe that we can send weapons to kill people in Europe without becoming involved in war with those people. Still others believe that by gestures and applause we can assist France and England to win without danger to our own country.

In addition to these, however, there are men among us of less honesty who advocate stepping closer and closer to war, knowing well that a point exists beyond which there can be no turning back. They have baited the trap of war with requests for modest assistance. This latter group is meeting with success at the moment.

NO DABBLING WITH DEATH

There is a saying that grew in the old West to the effect that a man who enjoys life should never touch his gun unless he means business; that he should never draw unless he is ready to shoot, and that he should never shoot unless he is ready to kill.

Those old pioneers of ours knew from long experience that there can be no successful dabbling with death. But the red-blooded wisdom of the old West is gone from American politics today. Our present danger results from making gestures with an empty gun after we have already lost the draw. Fortunately the wide wall of the Atlantic stands between us and the shooting that is going on.

This dabbling we have been doing in European affairs can lead only to failure in the future, as it has in the past. It is not a policy that we can continue to follow and remain a great nation.

INFLUENCE OF LEADERS LOST

Let us look at our position today. Our leaders have lost the influence we could have exerted as the world's greatest neutral nation. The driblets of munitions we have sold to England and France have had a negligible effect on the trend of the war, and we have not sufficient military strength available to change that trend. We demand that foreign nations refrain from interfering in our hemisphere, yet we constantly interfere in theirs. And while we have been taking an ineffective part in the war abroad, we have inexcusably neglected our defenses at home. In fact, we have let our own affairs drift along until we have not even a plan of defense for the Continent of North America. We have been doing to England and France what they did to Abyssinia, to Czechoslovakia, to Poland, to Finland, and to Norway—we have encouraged them to hope for help we cannot send.

Yet with these examples before us, we still continue in this course, the same course that led England to failure abroad and weakness at home; a course that will lead us, also, to a disastrous and unsuccessful war if we persist in following it.

CONFLICT OF HEMISPHERES

When the subject of our participation in war is discussed, most people visualize the war that is now going on in Europe. They think of sending more arms, and possibly some soldiers. There is still very little understanding of what our entrance into European war would mean. When we talk of such a war, we must realize that we are considering the greatest struggle the world has yet known—a conflict between hemispheres, one-half of the white race against the other half.

Before allowing ourselves to become further involved, we should consider the conditions which may exist by the time we are ready for military action. If we enter war at all, we should prepare to meet the worst conditions rather than the best.

It is useless to talk of sending American troops to Europe now, for we would need months of preparation before we could train and equip even a small army, and small efforts do not effect great movements—witness Norway, Holland, and Belgium.

START AT DISADVANTAGE

We must face the fact, regardless of how disagreeable it is to us, that before we can take effective action in an European war the German armies may have brought all Europe under their control. In that case Europe will be dominated by the strongest military nation the world has ever known, controlling a population far larger than our own. If we decide to enter war, we must be prepared to attack that nation. We must prepare to invade a continent which it controls.

No people ever had a greater decision to make. We hold our children's future in our hands as we deliberate, for if we turn to war the battles will be hard fought and the outcome is not likely to be decided in our lifetime. This is a question of mortgaging the lives of our children and our grandchildren. Every family in the land would have its wounded and its dead.

We start at a disadvantage because we are not a military nation. Ours is not a land of guns and marching men. If we decide to fight then the United States must prepare for war for many years to come, and on a scale unprecedented in all history. In that case we must turn to a dictatorial government, for there is no military efficiency to be lost. We should start to build an army of several million men. We will need several hundred thousand airplanes before the battling is over. And we must have a navy large enough to transport this force across the sea.

DEFENSE PLAN FIRST NEED

This war we are asked to enter would not be a repetition of the last war. It would be more comparable to the struggle which took place between Athens and Sparta, or Rome and Carthage. It would involve the destiny of America and of western civilization as far into the future as we can see.

But whatever our decision may be in regard to Europe, we must start now to build our own defenses. We must stop these gestures with an empty gun. In this, we are a united Nation. The only question that arises concerns how our defense can best be built. We must first construct a clear-cut plan of defense, and have the cooperation of all American countries in carrying it out.

We must insist upon military bases being placed wherever they are needed for our safety, regardless of who owns the territory involved. We must be willing to do more than pay taxes and make appropriations. Military strength cannot be purchased by money alone. Strength is a thing of spirit, of preparation, and of sacrifice extending over years of time.

The men of our country must be willing to give a year of their lives to military training—more if necessary. And our capitalists as well as our soldiers should be willing to serve without personal profit. We must have a Nation ready to give whatever is required for its future welfare and leaders who are more interested in their country than in their own advancement.

OUR ADVANTAGE IN DEFENSE

With an adequate defense, no foreign army can invade us. Our advantage in defending America is as great as our disadvantage would be in attacking Europe. From a military geographical standpoint, we are the most fortunate country in the world. There is no other nation in this hemisphere strong enough to even consider attacking us, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans separate us from the warring armies of Europe and Asia.

If the British Navy could not support an invasion of Norway against the German air force, there is little reason for us to worry about an invasion of America as long as our own air force is adequately maintained.

As far as invasion by air is concerned, it is impossible for any existing air force to attack effectively across the ocean. In the Arctic regions the severe climate and ruggedness of terrain counteract the vulnerability of shorter distances between land. With our geographical position, nothing but the gross neglect of our military forces or quarreling between American countries themselves could make possible an invasion by foreign armies.

AMERICA AT CROSSROADS

America stands today where the road divides, at the signpost of war and peace. Now that we have become one of the world's greatest nations, shall we throw away the independent American destiny which our forefathers gave their lives to win? Shall we submerge our future in the endless wars of the Old World? Or shall we build our own defenses and leave European war to European countries?

Shall we continue this suicidal conflict between western nations and white races, or shall we learn from history as well as from modern Europe that a civilization cannot be preserved by conflict among its own peoples, regardless of how different their ideologies may be?

"ORGANIZED MINORITY" HIT

You men and women of America who believe that our destiny lies in building strength at home and not in war abroad—to you I say that we must act now to stop this trend toward war. An organized minority in this country is flooding our Congress and our press with propaganda for war. They are spending large sums of money in advertisements. They are telegraphing, writing, and talking every hour of the day, pushing us closer and closer to the edge. Some are even now demanding a declaration of war.

If you believe that we should not enter a European war, you must support those of us who oppose such action. We cannot stop this trend alone. Some of your representatives in Washington are already considering a declaration of war, but they are responsible to you for the action they take. Let them know how you feel about this. Speak to your friends and organize in your community. Nothing but a determined effort on the part of every one of us will prevent the disaster toward which our Nation is now heading.

The American Flag in Every Home, Proposed by Oregon Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, last week we celebrated the one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of the making of our national flag, the Stars and Stripes. At this time, when the whole world is in a shambles by reason of the devastation of war and when the loyalty of certain active groups in almost every nation is being questioned, it is particularly appropriate that we renew our allegiance to our own country and to the flag which is the symbol of the liberties we cherish in America and which were purchased at a great cost through sacrifice and life itself. We have been aroused by the knowledge that there are within our own household subversive groups who are pledged to undermine the foundations of the structure of American liberty. With every resource of our Nation being called into use in arming America for defense in a world at war it behooves us to make certain that no fifth columns are permitted to function here. It is time that every American renew his allegiance by putting into effect the American Creed, written by Wm. Tyler Page, former Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, in 1917 and accepted by the House on behalf of the people April 3, 1918:

I believe in the United States of America as a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies.

I am particularly proud of my fellow Americans in Oregon, members of Federal Post No. 7, American Legion, who have initiated a movement to put an American flag in every home. Their patriotic effort at this particular time is worthy of our highest commendation. The Christian Science Monitor, under date of June 14, 1940, had this to say with reference to the Oregon plan, which I ask leave to include as a part of my remarks:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of June 14, 1940]

AMERICAN FLAG IN EVERY HOME PROPOSED BY OREGON VETERANS

PORTLAND, Oreg.—As an ever-present symbol of gratitude for Americans' blessings, as a reminder of the solidarity and unity on which the Nation was founded, Federal Post, No. 7, American Legion, proposes to make the American flag an active member of every household—and office staff—throughout the land.

The particular flag the post would popularize as a household fixture is an ultra-brilliant banner of silk, about 7 by 9 inches in measurement, mounted on a shiny brass staff that stands about 18 inches high. The brass staff is mounted on a three-tiered circular base of rich brown wood.

On the center tier of the wooden base is a copper plaque which says, in bold black letters, "God Bless America," and, in smaller letters, "The flag of the three Americans: you, me, and the other fellow."

DRAWS WIDE ATTENTION

Presentation of the little flags to several persons in Portland has already drawn widespread attention to the Post's purpose.

"We have already started our campaign here, and from the several hundred already placed the reaction has been gratifying and enthusiastic. We are hoping it may spread to a wide area—even nationally," says C. J. Womack, campaign manager for Federal Post.

A flag has been received by the Christian Science Monitor from the Legion as an expression of appreciation for a special edition relating to democracy last year.

"We believe if these flags can be widely distributed a very wholesome effect may accrue in greater loyalty and cooperation," says Mr. Womack, "and should have a tendency as well to discourage subversive thinking which seems to have taken root in some localities. The display of these flags in thousands of places is bound to create much favorable thinking and discussion, and will present the thought of solidarity and unity which now appear to be lacking to some extent."

DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

The purposes of the flag campaign are set forth vividly in a declaration from the Post itself, which says:

To a fellow American: We are confident of the destiny of America and should all be willing to do our individual part toward realizing it and protecting our country's ideals.

"What if the little raindrops should say,
So small a drop as I,
Can ne'er refresh a drooping earth,
I'll tarry in the sky."

Americanism is an individual problem and calls for individual cooperation. The spirit of America is one of confidence and courage.

The basis of our Constitution is the Golden Rule, the honesty, wisdom, and fair dealing of the average man. There was no fear in the minds of our forefathers. Our present doubts, malicious class hatreds, fears of "isms" and dictators is not American, but we must be alert. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." America lives in our hearts—in our mutual confidence that tolerance, justice, equality, freedom, and the courage to maintain them are unconquerable and always shall be.

CAUSE FOR GRATITUDE

We are grateful regardless of our ancestry, our church, our politics, our wealth, or our lack of wealth. We meet on a common ground as Americans, and we are grateful that the American spirit is one of peaceful compromise, of give and take, of live and let live.

Let us revive the inspiration of those first Americans who risked their lives, their property, and pledged their sacred honor that we might enjoy America. The destiny in which they were so confident has proved to be the greatest in the history of mankind. Our destiny will have an equally glorious future for our children to enjoy.

Let us all devote our talents and resources to the reawakening and strengthening of the ties that make America the great country that it is—the land of freedom.

The display of this miniature flag in your home or office is a silent expression of your love for America and its ideals, its kindly cooperation and good will to all, and it will serve as a constant reminder of the blessings America holds for us all.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from an address delivered by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] at Sedalia, Mo., on the evening of June 15, at a public reception in honor of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN].

There being no objection the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I greatly appreciate the invitation to attend this Democratic meeting at Sedalia with my friend HARRY TRUMAN. I fully understand that you have a political campaign under way in Missouri. I have no desire as an outsider to unduly inject myself into it. Certainly, nothing I say should be construed to reflect upon either of the candidates opposing Senator TRUMAN. I not only have no desire to do so but I know it would be improper for me to attempt to do so.

However, for the last 6 years, I have known Senator TRUMAN intimately as a member of the body to which we both belong. I do think that I can with propriety tell the Democrats of Missouri the position he occupies in that body and the attitude of the other Members toward him.

First, let me say that there has been no more loyal supporter or better friend of President Roosevelt in the United States Senate than HARRY TRUMAN. He has never been known to fail when his help was needed. Those of us in the Senate who have presented the program and the proposals of the President always knew that HARRY TRUMAN could be relied upon.

I need not tell you that HARRY TRUMAN is not an orator. He can demonstrate that for himself. However, he has so gained the confidence and respect of the Members of the Senate that when he speaks his words are listened to and respected even though he speaks quietly.

It seems to me it should be of particular interest to the people of Missouri to know of the peculiar way in which HARRY TRUMAN will fit into the solution of the very serious problems of the next few years. World conditions make necessary the launching of an urgent defense program. That defense program has the support of everyone. We will need men in the Senate whose experience peculiarly fits them for the consideration of these problems. No man in the Senate today has experience which will better fit him for the handling of these problems than does HARRY TRUMAN. To my mind there are three most important elements involved in the success of the program. Senator TRUMAN has detailed knowledge concerning each of them.

First, the problem of military preparedness itself. Senator TRUMAN'S experience as an actual combat officer in France during the World War and his close contact with the United States Army since that time fit him probably better than anyone else in the Senate to deal with this problem. It is fortunate, also, that he is a member of the Military Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee, which has direct charge of appropriations along this line.

Second, the development of the airplane and aviation is of extreme importance. Since coming to the Senate HARRY TRUMAN has specialized upon that problem and is one of the Senate's outstanding authorities upon it.

Third, the problem of transportation. If we are to succeed in our defense, mobility is of supreme importance. Our railroads and our other means of transportation must be placed in a position as near perfection as possible. As a member of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce HARRY TRUMAN, next to the chairman of that committee, has a wider knowledge of the transportation problems of the country than any other Member of our body.

We face a time of severe crisis when the problems will be difficult of solution. I think the people of Missouri should be grateful that they have two great Senators representing them in Washington. I do not think at this time they would care to make a change.

Hon. Jonathan Bourne, Jr., Thinks Congress Lax

REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, Hon. Jonathan Bourne, Jr., Senator from Oregon from 1907 to 1913, still living here in Washington, was born in Massachusetts more than 85 years ago, a member of a family distinguished for ability. He went to Oregon more than 60 years ago and had much influence on the political history of that State. He was elected Senator from Oregon in 1906, during the pivotal struggle resulting in the national provision for popular election of United States Senators. What is known as the Oregon system of popular government was adopted largely due to his influence and political power. The system provided for the initiative, the referendum, and recall, and direct election of United States Senators. As an observer and participant in those events in the far-off past, I feel safe in asserting that, without the influence of former Senator Bourne, the Oregon system of popular government would not have been adopted and made an integral part of the law of Oregon.

When a Member of the Senate, Senator Bourne continued his advocacy of popular government and expressions of his fear of bureaucracy. His address on the subject, which was made in 1916 and widely distributed, was reprinted in the RECORD by Senator Frederick Steiwer, of Oregon, on April 2, 1935.

Recent events have called forth from him another statement on this subject in a letter to the New York Herald Tribune. I now ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, including this letter of June 4 and ask that the letter, together with my remarks, be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The matter referred to follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 6, 1940]

THINKS CONGRESS LAX—EX-SENATOR BOURNE CONDEMNS SURRENDER OF POWERS

To the New York Herald Tribune:

Some 30 years ago, while a Member of the United States Senate, I was impressed by the slowly but steadily growing power of the executive branch of the Government, and took frequent occasion to voice the opinion that in accordance with the manifest intent of the framers of our Constitution, Congress should be the dominant branch. In the passing of time and the parade of events, I have seen no reason to change that view. On the contrary, recent trends in governmental affairs not only confirm my earlier judgment but convince me of the importance of a close adherence to the spirit of our system of three-branch Government.

If we have not a dictatorship, in effect, already, all that is lacking is the enactment of demanded legislation and adjournment of Congress, a procedure which would complete the transformation for all practical purposes.

In 1932, when Franklin D. Roosevelt was a candidate for President and was warning the American people of the dangers inherent in the growing bureaucracy and assuring them that no one man was wise enough or good enough to govern a nation, I heartily agreed with him and threw my small influence to the aid of his election. I stand today by the principles I advocated in 1912 and 1932.

The Constitution, which every Member of either House of Congress took an oath to support, imposes upon the legislative branch certain specific duties coincident with powers conferred. If Congress has forfeited a large measure of the respect of the American people, the reason can be found in its own loss of self-respect as evidenced by its shirking of duty and abdication of power. Every such abdication is one more acknowledgment of both individual and collective incapacity and an added blow at the foundations of popular government.

How absurd to grow hysterical over the possibility of a "fifth column" threatening our material resources necessary to national defense and shut our eyes to the plainly evident, aggressive, and persistent effort to transform our Republic by destroying the absolutely essential system of checks and balances.

The strength of character that could exact a Magna Carta from King John at Runnymede came down through generations to a band of valiant leaders who challenged King George at Independence Hall. Humiliating, indeed, must it be, if the virile blood of such an ancestry has been so thinned by habitual indifference that no effective effort will be made to preserve the liberties so hardly won. Too long, I fear, our public schools have neglected the teaching of that inspiring poem in which we were told that not high-raised battlements (nor submarines nor airplanes) constitute a state, but "men, high-minded men, who know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain."

The history that is being written in blood on the battlefields of Europe is of far less consequence to us than the history that is being written in ink in the Halls of Congress. The next few weeks may transform the map of Europe—and the Government of these United States.

Bonuses to Law Violators

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say I am wholeheartedly opposed to the passage of this bill, S. 3237, which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to pay a premium to a selected list of sugar-plantation exploiters of children who knowingly violated our law in their exploitation of American child life.

It seems almost unbelievable that at a time when we are laying onerous taxes on the law-abiding citizens of our country to pay for much-needed national defense, the Congress should even consider the passage of S. 3237. In substance, the bill directs the Secretary of Agriculture to pay a sum of money, probably in excess of a million dollars, to these sugar planters who knowingly and brazenly violated the provisions of our protective laws in order to secure a few extra pennies in profit.

The inconsistency of this action is found in today's issue of the Washington Times-Herald, wherein a dispatch states that the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor has just instituted a suit in the State of Louisiana to enforce the child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and has just announced that it has secured a permanent injunction against a New Orleans cannery operator who is in violation.

Surely we cannot expect the citizenry of our country to comply with our laws, when we find large financial interests not only brazenly violating the law but then prevailing upon the Congress of the United States to authorize or direct the payment of large sums of money to several sugar-producing exploiters of labor. And when I say large sums of money, I mean large sums. The Department of Agriculture cites one case wherein $250,000 will be split between 2 violators. In another case $220,000 will be paid to one violator. And in some 39 cases in Louisiana, a total of almost three-quarter million dollars alone will be paid. For what? For exploiting child labor.

Similar happenings have taken place to a lesser extent in the sugar-beet area. These cases are now being investigated, I understand.

It is true that these gentlemen, if the House should pass this bill this afternoon, will repay to the Treasury of the United States a sum estimated to be something like $15,000.

Of course, the sugar planters have collected millions of dollars from the Treasury in sugar benefits, yet they are not satisfied.

In order that there may be no doubt of the accuracy of these statements, I made a direct inquiry of the officials of the Sugar Division of the Department of Agriculture. The following correspondence is self-explanatory:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Hon. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CONNERY: In the absence of Mr. Laguardia from the city, I wish to acknowledge your letter of May 25, 1940, regarding S. 3237, now pending before the House.

We are glad to enclose for your information a copy of this Department's letter of March 19, 1940, to the Honorable E. D. SMITH, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. This report on S. 3236 and S. 3237 was formally transmitted through the Bureau of the Budget.

Transcripts of the stenographic record of hearings held in October and November 1939, by a board of officials of this Department on cases alleged noncompliance with section 301 (a) of the Sugar Act of 1937 are in this Department and are available for reference at any time. A typical transcript contains over 40 pages of testimony, with exhibits in addition, and in many cases supplementary briefs have been filed by interested parties. If it is inconvenient for you to visit the Department to consult these transcripts, we would be glad to bring up to you a few of the transcripts. However, you will readily appreciate that since these cases are under review by the Department and no decision has yet been handed down by the Board or by the Secretary on these cases, it would not be proper for the Department to list the individuals involved under the governmental procedure generally applicable to such cases.

The statistical data which you requested are as follows:

LOUISIANA SUGARCANE PROGRAM

Number of producers involved

1937	25
1938	37
1939	15

SUGAR-BEET PROGRAM

Field investigations are being conducted at this time with respect to the beet program. No payments have been held up with respect to 1937 or 1938 crops because of noncompliance with section 301 (a) of the Sugar Act. However, subsequent investigation may develop such cases in which case the names of the producers involved will be placed on the refund register in connection with future payments.

Accurate data on the total amount of money withheld from producers pending the clearing up of these cases cannot be determined at this time, but an effort will be made to obtain this figure for you as soon as possible.

Sincerely yours,

JOSHUA BERNHARDT, Chief.

The following is the text of Secretary Wallace's report to Senator ELLISON D. SMITH, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, containing the Department's views on S. 3236 and S. 3237, introduced in the Senate by Senator ELLENDER, of Louisiana, on February 1, 1940.

MARCH 19, 1940.

Hon. ELLISON D. SMITH,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SMITH: Reference is made to your request for the views of this Department on S. 3236 and S. 3237, introduced in the Senate by Senator ELLENDER, of Louisiana, on February 1, 1940. These bills, which are alternative measures, would amend section 301 (a) of the Sugar Act of 1937, which provides, as one of the conditions of payments to growers, "That no child under the age of 14 years shall have been employed or permitted to work on the farm, whether for gain to such child or any other person, in the production, cultivation, or harvesting of a crop of sugar beets or sugarcane with respect to which application for payment is made, except a member of the immediately family of a person who was the legal owner of not less than 40 percent of the crop at the time such work was performed; and that no child between the ages of 14 and 16 years shall have been employed or permitted to do such work, whether for gain to such child or any other person, for a longer period than 8 hours in any one day, except a member of the immediate family of a person who was the legal owner of not less than 40 percent of the crop at the time such work was performed."

In administering the act a number of cases have been found in which children under age were employed or permitted to work on farms, although the producers apparently did not know that the children were under age and used reasonable precautions to ascertain the facts. In the opinion of the Department, the law now requires that payment be denied to such a case, although the producer has met all other conditions for payment provided in the act. These conditions require the payment of wages determined by the Secretary to be fair and reasonable; the carrying out of soil practices which the Secretary prescribes for preserving and improving the fertility of the soil; the holding of sugarcane or sugarbeet marketings within the limitations of the proportionate share for the farm; and, in the case of producers who are also processors, the payment of prices for sugarcane and sugar beets which the Secretary determines to be fair and reasonable. Producers who have met these conditions of the act undoubtedly suffer a hardship by reason of the withholding of payments because of inadvertent child-labor violations.

In view of the foregoing, the Department has no objection to a suitable clarification of section 301 (a) of the Sugar Act of 1937. However, it is the view of the Department that S. 3236 and S. 3237 are subject to a number of objections as now worded.

S. 3236 provides for only a nominal penalty of $5 for each violation, which amount is not regarded as sufficient to achieve the purpose sought by the child-labor provision of the present act. It is believed that the minimum penalty for each violation should be $10. Furthermore, it might be argued, in a case where two or more children worked on a farm during the same day, that only a single penalty could be imposed under the wording of S. 3236. It is believed that a separate penalty should clearly be applicable for each child in such a case.

S. 3237, if enacted, would make it virtually impossible, in our opinion, to carry out the intent of Congress to prevent the employment of children on sugar-beet and sugarcane farms. It would leave to administrative discretion the definition of employment by the producer and the determination of responsibility of overseers and contractors. In an industry where overseers and contractors are used to a large extent, this would constitute a serious administrative problem and might cause considerable delay in making payments. It would prove very difficult for local officials administering the program in the field to determine whether the child was employed "without the knowledge or consent of the producer." It would also be difficult to determine whether "such producer in good faith attempted to comply with the provisions * * *." The bill also provides that a producer unacquainted with the provisions of the legislation should not be deemed out of compliance. It would be an almost impossible administrative job to determine this fact.

The Department, therefore, recommends that the first section of S. 3237 be changed to read as follows:

"That subsection (a) of section 301 of the Sugar Act of 1937 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: 'The Secretary is authorized to make payments, notwithstanding a failure to comply with the conditions provided in this subsection, but the payments made with respect to any crop shall be subject to a deduction of $10 for each child for each day, or a portion of a day, during which such child was employed or permitted to work contrary to the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the 1937, 1938, and 1939 crops.'"

Pursuant to the provisions of Budget Bureau Circular 344, this matter was referred to the Bureau of the Budget, and under date of March 15, 1940, the Department of Agriculture was advised by the Assistant Director thereof that there would be no objection on the part of that office to the submission of this report to Congress.

Sincerely,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
SUGAR DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1940.

Hon. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CONNERY: Acknowledgment is made of your letter of June 7, 1940, with reference to S. 3237.

You quote the following sentence from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, dated March 19, 1940, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture: "S. 3237, if enacted, would make it virtually impossible, in our opinion, to carry out the intent of Congress to prevent the employment of children on sugar-beet and sugarcane farms." You have evidently assumed that the text of bill S. 3237, now pending before the House, is the same as that to which the foregoing objection was made. The fact, however, is that the bill as passed by the Senate and now pending before the House incorporates the Department's recommendations given in the letter of March 19, 1940, of the Secretary.

You refer to our asking the Congress "to make of themselves a hypocritical body by asking for an extension of the present Sugar Act." We do not understand the statement. The fact is that the House Committee on Agriculture almost unanimously recommended the continuing resolution for 1 year. (See Rept. No. 2080.)

You also refer to "violators" in 1937, 1938, and 1939, whose cases are still under review. The fact is that the investigations were made in 1939 and covered retroactively all crops to that date. In some cases the 1938 crop payment, instead of being paid in 1939, as would normally be the case, was deferred pending the outcome of the investigation with respect to the alleged noncompliance in the 1937 crop, in accordance with the usual "offset" policy of the Department.

Please be assured of our appreciation of your interest in the problems involved in administering the Sugar Act and of our willingness to assist you by giving you all information which it is permissible for us to give you. In this connection, as we have stated previously, transcripts of the stenographic record of the hearings held in October and November 1939 by a board of officials of this Department of the cases of alleged noncompliance are available for your reference at any time. The opinion of the Solicitor of this Department on the matter (dated December 21, 1939) has also been made public.

Sincerely yours,

JOSHUA BERNHARDT, Chief.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, D. C., December 21, 1939.

Memorandum for Dr. Bernhardt, Chief, Sugar Division.

DEAR DR. BERNHARDT: Reference is made to your memorandum requesting the opinion of this office as to which, if any, of the following classes of cases may be paid under the Sugar Act of 1937, assuming that all other conditions for payment have been met:

(1) The producer employed adults only and took reasonable precautions to prevent the employment of children, but the adults brought along children under the age specified in the act to assist with the work, without the knowledge or consent of the producer;

(2) The producer or his agent employed children to work on the farm without any knowledge that they were under age and only after investigation leading to the reasonable conclusion that the children were not under age; and

(3) The producer employed children for a negligible amount of work without any knowledge of the provision of the act in question and discontinued the practice when informed of the provision of the act.

Subsection (a) of section 301 of the act provides as a condition for payment:

"(a) That no child under the age of 14 years shall have been employed or permitted to work on the farm, whether for gain to such child or any other person, in the production, cultivation, or harvesting of a crop of sugar beets or sugarcane with respect to which application for payment is made, except a member of the immediate family of a person who was the legal owner of not less than 40 percent of the crop at the time such work was performed; and that no child between the ages of 14 and 16 years shall have been employed or permitted to do such work, whether for gain to such child or any other person, for a longer period than 8 hours in any 1 day, except a member of the immediate family of a person who was the legal owner of not less than 40 percent of the crop at the time such work was performed."

The words "employed or permitted to work" in the foregoing provision of the act appear to have the ordinary meaning and significance which they bear in common usage. The term "employ," according to Funk & Wagnalls New Standard Dictionary, means "to engage, have, or keep for or in service or duty; procure or retain the services of; set or keep at work; furnish work or occupation for; as, to employ an agent." As stated in United States v. Morris (39 U. S. 464, 475):

"To be 'employed' in anything means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it; to be under contract or orders to do it."

The term "permit," as defined in Funk & Wagnalls New Standard Dictionary, means "(1) To allow by tacit consent or by not hindering; take no steps to prevent; consent tacitly to; suffer; as, to permit oneself to be wronged. (2) To grant leave to by express consent or authorization; empower expressly; * * *." When used in a statute, the courts have held that the word necessarily implies knowledge. Armstrong's Administrator v. Sumne & Ratterman Co. (278 S. W. (Ky.) 111); La Belle v. Powers Mercantile Co. (114 N. W. (Minn.) 1131); Gregory v. United States (10 Fed. Cas. 1195); MacFarlane v. Mosier and Summers (79 Misc. Rep. 460, 141 N. Y. S. 143). Thus in a case involving a question of violation of a statute providing that no child under a specified age should be "employed, permitted, or suffered to work" in any gainful occupation, the court said:

"It cannot be said, however, that the proprietor has 'permitted or suffered a child to work' in his business when he has no knowledge that the child is engaged in his service. The words 'suffer' and 'permit' necessarily imply knowledge." Clover Creamery Co. v. Kanode (129 S. E. (Va.) 222, 223).

It is, therefore, the opinion of this office that the cases referred to in paragraph (1) of your request are eligible for payment under the act. The children obviously were not employed by the producer, nor were they "permitted to work" within the meaning of the provision of the act in question.

The principle that ignorance of the law excuses no one (ignorantia legis neminem excusat) is generally recognized and is applicable to the cases referred to in paragraph (3) of your request. In Barlow v. United States (7 Peters 404, 411) the Court said:

"It is a common maxim, familiar to all minds, that ignorance of the law will not excuse any person, either civilly or criminally; * * *."

It follows that ignorance of the law does not excuse an applicant for the payment under the act from meeting the conditions upon which those payments are authorized. Accordingly, it is the opinion of this office that the cases referred to in paragraph (3) of your request are not eligible to receive payments under the act.

Although there are two possible views with respect to the cases referred to in paragraph (2) of your request, it is the opinion of this office that, for the reasons set out below, the producers are not eligible for payments under the act.

It may be contended, for example, that, although the language of the provision in question is clear, there is doubt as to whether Congress intended that payments should be denied in cases where children were employed or permitted to work on the farm without any knowledge on the part of the producer that the children were under age and after reasonable efforts on the part of the producer to ascertain that fact. In other words, it may be contended that there is ambiguity as to the scope and meaning of the statute, and that such ambiguity necessarily calls for the applications of the rules of statutory construction. Thus, it may be argued, on the basis of the legislative history of the present act and its predecessor, the Jones-Costigan amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, that it was the general spirit and purpose of the provision to prevent the exploitation of children for the strenuous work in the sugar beet and sugarcane fields, and that the provision was not intended to apply to cases of accidental violation. This view would have the support of decisions holding that, in construing or considering the application of a statute, it is permissible to look to the general spirit and purpose as well as to the strict letter of the law; that the strict letter of the law must yield to its evident spirit and purpose when necessary to give effect to the intent of Congress; that unjust or absurd consequences are, if possible, to be avoided; that general terms should be limited in their application so as not to lead to oppression, injustice, or absurd consequences; that it will always be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character; that the reason of the law should prevail over its letter; and that constructions of statutes are to be made according to the intention of the makers, and sometimes are to be expounded against the letter to preserve the intent. (See Fleischmann Construction Co. v. United States, 270 U. S. 349, 360; Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U. S. 457, 458–459[1]; McKee v. United States, 164 U. S. 287, 293; Lineberger v. Rouss, 76 U. S. 468, 475; United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 486; and Mankel v. United States, 19 Ct. Cls. 295, 300).

It is the opinion of this office, however, that the provision of the act in question is clear and unambiguous and that the statute must be interpreted as written. It is a well-settled rule of statutory interpretation that "where a law is expressed in plain and unambiguous terms, whether those terms are general or limited, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction." (Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 670–71). As was stated by Mr. Justice Brown in Hamilton v. Rathbone (175 U. S. 414, 421):

"Indeed, the cases are so numerous in this court, to the effect that the province of construction lies wholly within the domain of ambiguity, that an extended review of them is quite unnecessary."

The cases cited in the second preceding paragraph, holding that a statute should be interpreted and construed according to its evident spirit and purpose, that unjust or absurd consequences are to be avoided, if possible, that general terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to oppression, injustice, or absurd consequences, etc., are cases in which there was ambiguity as to the meaning of the statute. These are principles of statutory construction which are applicable only to ambiguous statutes. If, therefore, the language of the statute is clear and unambiguous and the intention plain, it is the duty of the court to expound the statute as it stands, even if the consequence is a hardship or injustice. Folsom v. United States, 160 U. S. 121, 127.

There is, undoubtedly, hardship involved in denial of payments in the cases to which you refer. There are a number of conditions in the act which must be met in order for the producer to be eligible for payments thereunder. These conditions require the payment of wages determined by the Secretary to be fair and reasonable; the carrying out of soil practices which the Secretary prescribes for preserving and improving the fertility of the soil; the holding of sugarcane or sugar beet marketings within the limitations of the proportionate share for the farm; and, in the case of producers who are also processors, the payment of prices for sugar beets and sugarcane which the Secretary determines to be fair and reasonable. Compliance with all of these conditions involves an outlay of money substantially in excess of that necessary to produce an ordinary crop. Therefore, producers who have met the other conditions of the act with respect to payments will undoubtedly suffer a hardship if payments are denied because of accidental child-labor violations. But the rule applicable to these cases is stated in Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. United States, 181 U. S. 584, 589, as follows:

"Yet this apparent hardship will not authorize us to do violence to the clear language of the statute. If the law afford him an imperfect relief, his remedy is by application to Congress for additional legislation, and not to the judicial power for a strained interpretation of the law already in force."

If a child, who is, in fact, under 14 years of age, is "employed or permitted to work" by the producer or his agent, or if a child, who is, in fact, between the ages of 14 and 16, is "employed or permitted to do such work * * * for a longer period than 8 hours in any one day" by the producer or his agent, then, under the clear language of subsection (a) of section 301 of the Sugar Act of 1937,

---

[1] The Court held that an act of Congress "to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories and the District of Columbia," did not apply to a contract between an alien residing outside the United States and the Church of the Holy Trinity, an incorporated religious society, under which the alien was to remove to the city of New York and enter into the service of the church as rector and minister. Speaking for a unanimous Court, Mr. Justice Brewer said: "It must be conceded that the act of the corporation is within the letter of this section, for the relation of rector to his church is one of service, and implies labor on the one side with compensation on the other. Not only are the general words labor and service both used, but also, as it were to guard against any narrow interpretation and emphasize a breadth of meaning, to them is added 'of any kind'; and, further, as noticed by the circuit judge in his opinion, the fifth section, which makes specific exceptions, among them professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, and domestic servants, strengthens the idea that every other kind of labor and service was intended to be reached by the first section. While there is great force to this reasoning, we cannot think Congress intended to denounce with penalties a transaction like that in the present case. It is a familiar rule that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit, nor within the intention of its makers. This has often been asserted, and the reports are full of cases illustrating its application. This is not the substitution of the will of the judge for that of the legislator, for frequently words of general meaning are used in a statute, words broad enough to include an act in question, and yet a consideration of the whole legislation, or of the circumstances surrounding its enactment, or of the absurd results which follow from giving such broad meaning to the words, makes it unreasonable to believe that the legislator intended to include the particular act" (pp. 458–459).

previously quoted, payment to the producer must be denied. The fact that the producer or his agent was ignorant of the child's true age, or reasonably believed the child's age to be over 14 or over 16, as the case may be, would not justify the making of payment to such producer, in our judgment.

It is, therefore, the opinion of this office that the cases referred to in paragraph 2 of your request are ineligible to receive payments under the act.

Very truly yours,

MASTIN G. WHITE,
Solicitor.

Mr. Speaker, these same gentlemen, who admit they have violated the child-labor provisions of the Sugar Act, have exploited American child life, and now hope to prevail upon the Congress of the United States to exploit the Treasury of the United States. I regret to say they seek also to deprive American citizens, paid decent wages in our American sugar refineries, of employment opportunities which they so badly need. But at the same time these exploiters of child life demand for themselves the payment of continued benefits at the expense of our taxpayers.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that the House of Representatives, in its wisdom, will reject this unusual procedure, will defeat this measure, and will permit the Treasury of the United States to invest this million or more dollars in much needed national defense. I sincerely feel that a vote for this bill would be an endorsement of child labor in this country, and this body should never acquiesce in such endorsement.

Bridges Deportation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an editorial from the Washington Post.

The editorial follows:

By a vote of 330 to 42 the House has approved a bill ordering the Attorney General to deport Harry R. Bridges, west coast labor leader. No charges were brought against Mr. Bridges other than general accusations that he is a "troublemaker," and an "undesirable" alien with communistic leanings.

Mr. Bridges has already been absolved of charges that he has been agitating for the overthrow of our form of government. After long and exhaustive open hearings James M. Landis, dean of the Harvard Law School, concluded that Mr. Bridges was neither a member of, nor affiliated with, the Communist Party and that his activities as a labor leader were in accord with democratic principles.

Not only did the House ignore these official findings but the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization did not even accord the accused man a hearing before reporting favorably upon the bill for his deportation. In the course of the debate it was said that this is the first time a bill aimed exclusively at the punishment of one man has come before Congress. That is not surprising, since our Government is supposed to be one of laws.

What is almost past belief, however, is that a legislative body sworn to uphold democratic principles should be so misguided as to approve a measure subversive of the fundamental principles upon which our constitutional form of government rests.

There was difference of opinion among Members of the House as to whether the deportation bill could be regarded as a bill of attainder, banned under the Constitution of the United States. Legal hairsplitting on this issue can be left to the lawyers. But patriotic citizens will hope that if this bill is enacted, the Supreme Court will quickly sweep aside the legal casuistry by which its supporters seek to deny law-abiding aliens rights guaranteed to them as "persons" under the Constitution.

The bill to deport Mr. Bridges is, in any case, an example of the kind of legislation the founding fathers sought to prohibit in banning bills of attainder. What Justice Story has to say on the subject is enlightening. Bills of attainder (i. e., legislative acts which inflict punishment without judicial trial) "have been most usually passed," he says, "in times of rebellion or of gross subservience to the Crown or of violent political excitements, periods in which all nations are most liable * * * to forget their duties and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."

Those words have a prophetic ring. For the House, in its zeal to safeguard cherished institutions, has voted to trample upon individual rights and liberties. The fact that the prospective victim is an alien is no excuse for such conduct.

If emulation is the sincerest form of flattery, then Hitler and Mussolini should extract great satisfaction from the unprecedented action of the House. For the Congressmen who voted to deport Mr. Bridges, after he had been cleared of charges of being illegally in this country, are certainly following totalitarian methods of ridding the state of "undesirables."

A number of Congressmen maintained that they might deport an alien simply because they did not like the color of his eyes or his hair. If that view is accepted, how long will it be before Congress extends its purge to eliminate citizens who, for any reason or for no reason, have become objectionable?

Much more than the wholly unimportant future of Harry Bridges is at stake in the present instance. His foes as well as his friends can meet on common ground to oppose an action which is utterly repugnant to everything for which America is supposed to stand.

The Undeveloped Strength of American Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 17, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT H. JACKSON

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a most remarkable address delivered by the Honorable Robert H. Jackson, Attorney General of the United States, on June 14, 1940, at Charlottesville, Va., before the Institute of Public Affairs.

This address is entitled "The Undeveloped Strength of American Democracy," and it summarizes our growth through the years as a nation, then analyzes present-day conditions in a masterful way, and then it goes on to point out with courage, clearness, and vision the road we must travel in order to maintain our cherished democracy and continue to set an example to the rest of the world that is so rapidly losing its liberty and democracy. The address follows:

In a world that is moving so fast, prophecy is dangerous, and it is too early to draw more than tentative and contingent inferences as to the future. But prudence requires us to consider the possibility that after this war our Nation will find itself in a reordered and less friendly environment. Unless we are to adopt a policy of nonresistance and comfort ourselves with the theory that virtue is its own reward, we cannot ignore the possibility that some decisive test of military strength may be forced upon us. Or we may face a long period of narrowing encirclement, accompanied by steady reduction of our friendly buffer states. In that event our trial, instead of being one of sudden striking power in war, may be a test of sustained staying power in peace. In either case the United States will run great risks if it cannot muster its maximum collective strength to meet any supreme challenge to its survival.

In appraising any country's strength for the long pull, it is folly to measure military strength merely by such factors as numbers of tanks, speed of airplanes, or naval-power ratings. The potency of weapons still depends ultimately upon the judgment, the courage, and the devotion of the men who wield them. And the economic machine which supplies an army and the social system which backs its morale are most vital parts of any defense system.

The characteristic strength of the totalitarian systems is that they overcame an inferiority of resources by a better utilization of them. They hurl themselves with great impact because they are so closely organized. Their effective power is great because they have eliminated lost motion, debating time, and friction by meshing their political system, their military power, their cultural institutions, and their economic system into one total machine. Quick decision, an external appearance of unity because dissent is suppressed, and rapid execution of orders is a characteristic strength of dictatorship. Its characteristic weakness is the slowly disappearing individual initiative which results from ruthless suppressions and regimentation.

The characteristic weakness of a democracy in contrast, however, shows up at the very beginning. It is confusion of tongues, conflict in objectives and methods, and lack of unity. Even if freedom does develop men of greater individual initiative and strength, if they forever pull in opposite directions there is no collective strength. Two strong men who cancel each other are not equal to two dumb men who pull together. It is only after a free government has time to collect itself, to let events lead to a voluntary unification of purposes and opinions, that democracy can put forth its latent power. In speed it is always doomed to defeat—in endurance it has generally won.

But it is plain that the democracies of the world need something more than victory if they are to survive. Only 20 years ago they had victory in full measure. In 2 decades the fruits of victory have vanished. It is not a happy prospect if all the sacrifice of a World War will buy peace for only part of a generation. This failure to keep advantages so lately won gives dictators and their American sycophants an opportunity to revive the old monarchical sneers at democracy—Napoleon's wisecrack about "government by chatter" and the philosophy that democracy is a "cult of incompetence."

The question that concerns America is not whether our democracy has been inefficient, wasteful, and negligent, but whether it must continue to be so. The power—at least on a sudden trial—of totalitarianism lies in the pattern of its organization. Can we, without sacrificing our essentially democratic qualities, achieve a pattern of organization that will get from free men and free enterprise an efficiency roughly equivalent to that which totalitarians achieve by compulsion?

I am one who believes that our representative democracy can be made vastly more efficient than it is without sacrificing its essential and basic liberties. I also believe that the only way we can remain democratic is to achieve a greater effectiveness. Moreover, I believe we have laid some solid foundation for such a program in the last 3 years.

II

This faith forces me to take issue with those who now are proclaiming that government has become too big, too powerful, and too concentrated, and who now are proposing a program of reducing governmental ability to control and regulate the business enterprises which flourish under its protection.

In some quarters it is claimed that the strengthening of our economy cannot be helped by governmental action at all, but that it must be done only on the initiative of those in private industry. For generations we have proceeded on the assumption that the energies of a free people could be divided into thousands of self-directed ventures, and that somehow these would add up to a public good. No large business enterprise can succeed if it is not well planned, but there are those who insist that our total economy must be allowed to run with no planning for the good of the whole. It is precisely this anarchy among the democracies which has been their weakness.

Certainly democracy must utilize the profit motive to produce initiative for private enterprise. But it cannot accept a doctrine that anything is allowable if only it produces someone a profit. For example, we cannot tolerate even a profitable traffic in scrap iron or oil or machine tools to arm a potential enemy. We cannot safely allow private enterprise for profit's sake to centralize essential industries into targets for potential enemies such as the rubber industry at Akron, an automobile industry in Detroit, a steel industry at Pittsburgh, or a brass industry at Bridgeport. The private-profit opportunity must yield to a defense motive, and, as Dorothy Thompson and Henry Luce have pointed out, the tendency of private business to do whatever is profitable has been affirmatively counted on by Hitler as a weakness of democracy.

It seems, therefore, to me elementary that if democracy is to rearm and at the same time is to avoid the depression of its basic standards of living, it must consciously, to a much greater degree than heretofore, plan its economic order. It must eliminate unnecessary luxuries—and among them the luxury of friction, unnecessary service, and ineptitude. It must keep the profit motive as a reward for service to society.

Business itself cannot perfect this organization, because no private enterprise can be entrusted with the power to coerce minorities. And in any more effective organization of industry, some dissenting minorities must be brought into line, some conduct which interferes with the accomplishment of the objective must be punished, and some freedoms prevented. These powers can only be left to a democratically chosen government.

If we are to strengthen the organization of democracy, it seems obvious that we in America can do so only through the Federal Government. Forty-eight separate State organizations—no one of which is an economic unit, each of which is more or less in competition with every other—cannot be the means to a strengthened American organization.

The strongest opposition to this necessary centralization of governmental power is proceeding largely from those who have been assiduously piling private corporation on top of private corporation to build Nation-wide empires of concentrated wealth within our democracy. If capital is to collectivize itself into great integrated industries and into great holding-company systems, and if labor is to join itself into powerful Nation-wide organizations, then, clearly, government, if it is to govern effectively, must be bigger than any of the governed. I do not propose any degree of governmental concentration that is not made necessary by the concentrations in the economy which underlies the Government. But the greatest power in any country must be its government, and no people can ever present a united front unless the government is greater than any of its parts.

III

How are we to preserve liberty if we strengthen authority, you may rightly ask? How shall we reconcile greater power with our freedoms?

The essence of democracy, it seems to me, is not the absence of effective government. The essence of democracy is the control of government by the consent and will of the governed as expressed by its majorities. In order to preserve the reality of that consent and to provide it a basis for intelligent decision, a minority must continue to have the right to struggle to become a majority, to offer its ideas in competition, to debate, to question the government, to propagandize through speech and print, and the right to assemble and petition government. And our machinery for the registration of the consent, that is, our elections, must always remain free, and the results must be accepted. All of this takes time. All of it produces an impression of a divided people. All of it emphasizes our differences of opinion and objectives and all of its steps are capable of abuse both at the hands of temporary majorities and at the hands of extreme and intemperate minorities. But it is an indispensable condition of free government that the process of opinion making remain free and uncontrolled by either public government or private power. Hence we cannot really strengthen the hand of government unless we preserve these liberties which give it vitality. Any plan which strikes at these freedoms would not strengthen democracy but would abandon it.

Where then can we strengthen democracy? Once a decision is democratically arrived at, I see no reason why it would not be consistent with democracy to provide means to execute that decision with as much expedition and efficiency as the decision of a dictator. After we have preserved the democratic way in which opinion may form and Congress and the President settle its policy, I do not see the wisdom of allowing a multitude of ways in which private vested interest may stall its execution.

A deadly and endless legalism has been the weapon by which private interests have kept the power of a democratic leadership tied up. The Democratic Gulliver has been tied to the ground with legal red tape in the hands of a multitude of minor private interests. Witness the efforts of a sovereign democracy to fix utility rates. The most conspicuous example of legalism is the Kansas City Stockyard case, in which the Secretary of Agriculture was authorized by statute to fix the rates of commission men. He did so in 1933. For 7 years since the case has been in the courts, four times heard in district court, and four times argued in the Supreme Court, and never yet has there been a decision by that Court in anything except questions of how to proceed. And the case is on its way there again. The way we lawyers stall everything while we debate how to proceed reminds me of the old verse:

"The centipede was happy, quite,
Until the frog for fun
Said, 'Pray which foot comes after which,'
Which wrought his mind to such a pitch
He lay distracted in the ditch,
Considering how to run."

So the Government is always thrown into the ditch by lawyers asking which foot comes after which—only they don't ask it for fun.

We started out on a plan of national industrial recovery and it took 2 years of litigation to find out it was all legally wrong.

We started out to aid agriculture and, after 3 years, learned that, too, was all legally wrong.

We passed a law to enable debt-ridden tax districts to reorganize their debt, as private corporations have long been allowed to do. It took a few years' litigation to learn it was all legally wrong and a few years more to learn it was all legally right.

We began in 1935 to organize the demoralized bituminous-coal industry, and only last month got a final decision sustaining constitutional power to do so.

I could go on indefinitely to recite the steps by which a whole recovery and reform program, supported by the people at the polls as no other program ever was, has been battered to pieces or delayed for years by legal proceedings. And this at a period when Hitler was teaching the bitter lesson of the value of time.

I am not proposing that we deny "due process of law" to persons or to property. That too is an essential of government by law. But we cannot afford to stall the administration of important policies while private interests obtain "undue process of law."

IV

I do not think there is present need to add to the constitutional powers of the Federal Government. Reasonably interpreted there is at present adequate constitutional power, at least until administrative and legislative experience catches up with the concept embodied in recent court decisions. In 1933 we were not a Nation—that is judicially speaking—we were 48 nations and our Federal power has been interpreted away until the Constitution was but little stronger than the old Articles of Confederation which our forefathers found inadequate a century and a half ago. The restoration of Federal power is a subject on which I speak with some assurance for it has been my special task.

Our representative democracy has been made a nation in the last 4 years. If it is able to organize its economy to support its defense today, it is in no small measure due to the greater liberty of action won in little-publicized court decisions too technical perhaps for complete public understanding. The National Government has won its long fight to free itself of unwarranted limitations which gave an unwholesome dominance to the vested private interest as against the public welfare.

Let us hastily review the implications of these steps.

1. We have replaced the old doctrine of dual federalism with the doctrine of cooperative federalism. This was accomplished by the unemployment compensation decision. The old school insisted that the Federal Government and State governments could not enter into a combination by which the Federal Government furnished the protection of its taxing power and the State the advantages of its local administration in carrying out a common purpose to relieve unemployment. Counsel for the old order correctly anticipated the effect of the contentions of the Government when he exclaimed to the Court: "If this is constitutional, then no more will the clash of sovereignties ring out." But the Court didn't seem to think there was any purpose in having a clash of sovereignties ringing out, and it expressly approved the practice of a new cooperative federalism. Also, after it had once refused to do so, it finally approved the municipal bankruptcy law by which the Federal Government extended the aid of Federal courts and of the Federal bankruptcy power to debt-ridden municipalities, a relief which had long been extended to private corporations. But the old school thought its aid should not be extended to subdivisions of the States, for it held that State and Nation were sentenced to perpetual antagonism. By grants in aid to financially weak localities it has been possible to keep our economic and social system on a fairly uniform policy and capacity to handle problems of relief, unemployment, health, and social service. Thus we have today the greatest degree of power in the history of the country to cooperate and are carrying out the greatest practical plans of cooperation between municipality, State, and Nation. This is of great significance in any plan for strengthening our defenses and unifying our efforts.

2. We have also sustained the right to develop in peacetime American defense resources without waiting for war. You remember the wartime development of Muscle Shoals and the building of Wilson Dam, one of the country's great power projects, to aid production of adequate war materials. When peace came, a long struggle of private interests to obtain possession of this power development began. When this administration began its public-power program, private-power interests, although purchasing power from that source, denied the right of the Government to sell power created at Wilson Dam direct to consumers. They lost, but returned to the attack, because under the Tennessee Valley Authority other hydropower developments had been built, but not in wartime, and the utilities challenged the right of the Government to make these projects self-sustaining in whole or in part by selling the resulting power to the public. Here again they were defeated, and the Federal power sustained. Today this Nation may develop its power resources and may extend its system of flood control. It is not obliged to wait until war is upon us to exercise war powers to create an adequate source of cheap energy for Federal defense or industrial purposes. No person who is anxious about American defense today can doubt the importance of the victory over the private interests that sought to deny the right of the Government to develop and place in use America's water-power resources.

3. We have restored the taxing power of the Federal Government, on which had been engrafted special privileges of an insidious kind. Property made a long and successful fight to prevent progressive income taxation. Finally the people adopted the sixteenth amendment to assure the Nation power to tax income "from whatever source derived." But in spite of this constitutional mandate, the courts held that public officers of the States were immune from the Federal tax and Federal officers were immune from the State tax and Federal judges were immune from both taxes.

The immunity of public officers did not have great economic importance, but it was the mask behind whose principles the whole tax exemption to interest on public bonds lurked. Back of the politicians' immunity was the immunity of the millionaire. Vast amounts of wealth took shelter in tax-exempt securities, and is still permitted to escape all burdens of protecting itself. We have struck down the tax immunity to public officers and to judges, and the court has announced the principle that a tax on income is not a tax on the source of that income. The way is thereby opened for a defense program to tax vast reservoirs of hitherto untaxed wealth. It only awaits the action of Congress.

4. The power over interstate commerce has been restored and invigorated. This is one of the most litigated clauses of the Constitution and it was expansive when it denied State power and terribly feeble when the Nation tried to rely on it. But through a series of recent constitutional victories we today have established Federal authority to organize a demoralized industry, like bituminous coal, or to protect agriculture from the depressing effects of marketing surpluses. And the protection of interstate commerce includes the power to prevent labor disputes growing out of unfair labor practices, and includes the right to prescribe wages and hours, and to use the interstate-commerce power to discourage evils like prison-made goods or child labor or other menaces to public health or social well-being. This power is also now held to authorize regulation of aggregations of capital such as the public-utility holding companies which contended that they were constitutionally immune from regulation by both State and Nation.

5. The general welfare as an object for constitutional taxation may be said to have been discovered within the last 4 years, so far as the Supreme Court is concerned. In our constitutional taxing power the forefathers joined together the common defense and the general welfare, but a selfish generation had put them asunder. The philosophy had grown up that the Federal Government had nothing to do with the welfare of the people—except, of course, it could adopt such measures as subsidies and tariffs to aid industries. As late as 1936 the Supreme Court remarked that it had never been obliged to settle the meaning of the general-welfare clause. One of the reasons was that it had been so little used. It was in the Social Security cases that we won from the Court its first interpretation which gave a broad sweep to the general-welfare power and held that this Nation may bring to each fireside and workbench protection against the insecurities that seem inherent in our industrial order.

These are things which make us intellectually and politically a different Nation in 1940 than we were in 1936. These new powers bring with them new responsibilities, but they also bring to the American people of 1940 new possibilities for a program of democracy. The past 7 years have witnessed a struggle to reeducate our people in their concept of our representative democracy. In 1932 the predominant belief was that our democracy was identical with the status quo—a strange amalgam of legalism and money power. Anything which would disturb the privileges of property, the advantages of the vested interest, or which would place new social burdens—or even burdens of government upon them—was antidemocratic and generally unconstitutional. Those who were comfortably established in the existing order sincerely believed that—many of them still do.

That false concept of our democracy has passed away except in a few dark corners. Democratic government is designed, not to prevent change, but to bring about change in orderly and considered fashion. Its purpose is not to entrench an existing policy, but to call it up at periodic elections for reconsideration. Its intent is to prevent violent and revolutionary changes by keeping open a peaceful way to make constant readjustments within the constitutional area, in the rules, the relationships, and the institutions of our social order. This was certainly the teaching of the great philosopher of democracy in whose shadow we meet tonight.

We have restored the vitality of a free government on which a narrow legalism was inflicting a kind of rigor mortis. Now we think of our democracy as a living and dynamic force. The bitter fight to give it virility to combat economic demoralization at home gives it strength to organize against any threat from abroad.

The lines of future liberal policy are clear. We must move at accelerated pace, not merely in equipping naval and military and air power. We must also evolve a greatly improved pattern for economic organization to support both our social system and our military establishments. We must conserve our resources, eliminate our endless wastes and duplications, and bring our scattered and often conflicting energies to the support of common objectives. We have won for peacetime programs powers that in 1917 were felt could be used only in war emergency. Now democracy may under its great charter, not by disregarding it, proceed to place its house in order.

And this task is one that can be accomplished neither by reactionaries nor by revolutionists. It is a task for men who realize and are glad that they live in a changing world, but who believe that there is in us enough intelligence to plan our destiny and enough self-sacrifice to achieve it.

Patriotism or Unionism?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call your attention, and the attention of the country, to the following interesting little threat which appeared in the June 15, 1940, edition of the United Mine Workers Journal:

GO TO IT, HENRY

Henry Ford says his company can produce a thousand airplanes a day. All right, Hank. Your employees will be organized and unionized long before you start making a thousand airplanes a day.

We all know that the United Mine Workers is the parent of John L. Lewis' pet child, the C. I. O., which we know has carried on a relentless war with Mr. Henry Ford and all other automobile companies and many others who now are, or are expected to be, vital cogs in our national-defense machinery.

Apparently now Mr. Lewis intends to subordinate the entire question of national defense to his greedy desire for more power for his union. Mr. Lewis has been continually aided and abetted in his desire for a greater strangle hold on American labor by policies of this administration.

If we are to rapidly repair our defective defense machinery in this country, we must all look to the larger industrial units, of which Mr. Henry Ford is in the foremost ranks.

Are we to understand, Mr. Speaker, that we can have adequate national defense in this country only when and if Mr. John L. Lewis and his demands have been satisfied? Or, perhaps, it is to such threats as this that Mr. Ford recently referred to when he said his company could—within a comparatively short time—easily turn out 1,000 airplanes a day if he were unhampered by Government or other interference.

Roosevelt "Hates War," But Is Doing His Best To Get Us Into It—And Get Us Into It Unprepared

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the President has no right to declare war. Nevertheless he is saying and doing things which lead directly to war.

His pledge at Charlottesville to "extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this Nation," his message to the French that, as long as they continued to fight, materials and supplies would be sent them from the United States "in ever-increasing quantities and kinds" lead to false hopes which are cruel.

Just such statements as these from England and France to Poland, Norway, and Belgium led those countries to resist when resistance was hopeless.

The President has no authority to make any such commitments as he made to France, and no one knows it better than he.

Moreover, the Allies are purchasing and hauling away in their own ships all the materials and supplies which we have been able to furnish.

If the President means to increase our production and use our own ships, then he knows that our ships will be bombed and torpedoed and America will be in the war. He knows, too, that America is unprepared to carry on such a war successfully.

What, then, is his purpose? Does he mean to involve us in a war which inevitably we will lose? Or, if we are to win, must tax our resources and be carried on for years? Is that his purpose?

To win that war does he intend drafting every man and woman for service to the Nation? Or does he intend to draft for the front-line trenches the American farmer boys, the clerks, the professional men, and leave his communistic friends in essential industries in positions where they can sabotage any effective war program?

Knowing that Congress has not the slightest notion of declaring war, the President would do well if he would cease to head the war party in the United States.

The Republican Party stands for peace—for America first, last, and always. Roosevelt is driving toward war, using the war hysteria in an effort to continue himself in power. The new dealers, to perpetuate themselves in power, are trying to draft him, although he is an active candidate for a third term. Draft Roosevelt and he will draft you.

Here is an editorial which concisely states the situation:

[From the Sturgis (Mich.) Daily Journal of June 15, 1940]

OUR NEW "WAR" PARTY

(An editorial)

It should be apparent now to everyone that President Roosevelt is the acknowledged leader of the forces that are striving to involve the United States in the European war. The new dealers have adopted war as their baby. Ever since the President made his provocative quarantine speech in Chicago more than a year ago, the war urge has been the most consistent policy that he has had.

If the country can avoid a formal declaration of war against Germany and Italy until next November, the issue for the Presidential election will be clear cut. President Roosevelt, if nominated for a third term, will head the war party. The Republican candidate, whoever he may be, will be the antiwar candidate. If the people of this country are in favor of again sending millions of American boys to European battlefields they will vote for the war candidate, Mr. Roosevelt. If they are opposed to sending our manpower abroad, they will vote for the antiwar candidate.

Two things can happen in the meantime to upset the above premise. President Roosevelt may force the country into the war before the election can be held, or the German-Italian alliance may win such a decisive victory that the war will be ended before the warmongers can get us into it.

President Roosevelt has assured the country that he "hates war." He has taken a curious way of demonstrating his convictions on the subject. In a similar situation Woodrow Wilson won the close election of 1916 because he took the credit of "keeping us out of war." By the following April he had us in it up to our necks.

Roosevelt insists that he "hates war," but continues to use his influence in every way possible to foment the war spirit. Why? Does anyone doubt that the master politician is fully aware of the new implements of personal power that a subservient Congress would turn over to him to do with as he pleases? If he can succeed in forcing us into the war this summer the election might as well be canceled. Any President, under a wartime dictatorship, can obtain his own reelection.

On his record Roosevelt would make the worst war President the United States ever had. He has most of the instincts and ambitions of a Hitler without any of the German dictator's abilities.

There is one statement in this with which I cannot agree. In the next to the last paragraph we find this sentence:

If he (meaning the President) can succeed in forcing us into the war this summer the election might as well be canceled.

I do agree that, as stated in the editorial:

On his record Roosevelt would make the worst war President the United States ever had. He has most of the instincts and ambitions of a Hitler without any of the German dictator's abilities.

But if Roosevelt gets us into this war before November—and he will if he can—on his shoulders will rest the responsibility for the death of hundreds of thousands of our boys; on his conscience will be the thought that once again the hospitals and the asylums will be filled with the wrecks of humanity, sacrificed on the altar of his ambition.

The American people, knowing those things, if he forces us into this war, will, in my judgment, send him out of office as the betrayer of their confidence.

If you want to keep this country out of war, your boys out of the first-line trenches, begin now and work unceasingly to defeat this war party, headed by Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana:

Whereas, under the Sugar Act of 1937, the growing of sugarcane and the marketing of sugar produced therefrom is so restricted that discrimination results against Louisiana in favor of foreign growers and markets; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Louisiana believes that the continental United States should be preferred in the distribution and allocation of the United States sugar market over foreign countries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded immediately to both Houses of the Congress and to the Senators and Representatives from Louisiana.

The Bridges Deportation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES, THE ST. LOUIS STAR-TIMES, AND THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, because of the time limitation upon the debate prior to the passage of the Harry Bridges deportation bill on June 13 many Members who voted against this extreme and unwise measure were not heard in the debate. Under leave granted, I am including in this extension of remarks editorials from the New York Times, the St. Louis Star-Times, and the Washington Post as being fairly representative of thoughtful opinion upon the action of the House, which I fervently hope will not mark the beginning of a stampede born of hysteria and unreasoning fear and prejudice, to emulate the tactics of the totalitarian governments, in derogation of principles so fundamental in our democracy, and as inimical to the spirit, if not the letter, of our Bill of Rights.

[From the New York Times of June 15, 1940]

A BILL AIMED AT ONE MAN

By the overwhelming vote of 330 to 42 the House has passed a bill the sole declared purpose of which is to deport the labor leader Harry Bridges to Australia. No doubt the House is justified in its suspicion that Mr. Bridges has harmed the shipping industry on the west coast, and it seems probable that on net balance he has done an ill service to labor. But none of this justifies the legislative method used. Wholly apart from the question of whether this particular bill is constitutional, it is difficult to think of a more dangerous precedent than the passage of a measure designed to punish a specific individual by name, and not for the violation of some clearly defined law of general applicability. Democracy is not to be defended by imitating the arbitrary legislative devices of despotism.

[From the Washington Post of June 15, 1940]

SUBVERSIVE ACTION

By a vote of 330 to 42 the House has approved a bill ordering the Attorney General to deport Harry R. Bridges, west coast labor leader. No charges were brought against Mr. Bridges other than general accusations that he is a troublemaker, and an undesirable alien with communistic leanings.

Mr. Bridges has already been absolved of charges that he has been agitating for the overthrow of our form of government. After long and exhaustive open hearings James M. Landis, dean of the Harvard Law School, concluded that Mr. Bridges was neither a member of, nor affiliated with, the Communist Party and that his activities as a labor leader were in accord with democratic principles.

Not only did the House ignore these official findings but the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization did not even accord the accused man a hearing before reporting favorably upon the bill for his deportation. In the course of the debate it was said that this is the first time a bill aimed exclusively at the punishment of one man has come before Congress. That is not surprising, since our Government is supposed to be one of laws.

What is almost past belief, however, is that a legislative body sworn to uphold democratic principles should be so misguided as to approve a measure subversive of the faundamental principles upon which our constitutional form of government rests.

There was difference of opinion among Members of the House as to whether the deportation bill could be regarded as a bill of attainder, banned under the Constitution of the United States. Legal hairsplitting on this issue can be left to the lawyers. But patriotic citizens will hope that if this bill is enacted, the Supreme Court will quickly sweep aside the legal casuistry by which its supporters seek to deny law-abiding aliens rights guaranteed to them as "persons" under the Constitution.

The bill to deport Mr. Bridges is, in any case, an example of the kind of legislation the founding fathers sought to prohibit in banning bills of attainder. What Justice Story has to say on the subject is enlightening. Bills of attainder, i. e., legislative acts which inflict punishment without judicial trial, "have been most usually passed," he says, "in times of rebellion or of gross subservience to the Crown or of violent political excitements, periods in which all nations are most liable * * * to forget their duties and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."

Those words have a prophetic ring. For the House, in its zeal to safeguard cherished institutions, has voted to trample upon individual rights and liberties. The fact that the prospective victim is an alien is no excuse for such conduct.

If emulation is the sincerest form of flattery, then Hitler and Mussolini should extract great satisfaction from the unprecedented action of the House. For the Congressmen who voted to deport Mr. Bridges, after he had been cleared of charges of being illegally in this country, are certainly following totalitarian methods of ridding the state of "undesirables."

A number of Congressmen maintained that they might deport an alien simply because they did not like the color of his eyes or his hair. If that view is accepted, how long will it be before Congress extends its purge to eliminate citizens who, for any reason or for no reason, have become objectionable?

Much more than the wholly unimportant future of Harry Bridges is at stake in the present instance. His foes as well as friends can meet on common ground to oppose an action which is utterly repugnant to everything for which America is supposed to stand.

[From the St. Louis Star-Times]

RAILROADING BRIDGES

Passage by the House of Representatives yesterday of the bill to deport Harry Bridges, C. I. O. leader on the Pacific coast, was an affront to the Constitution, to the dignity of Congress, and to thousands of organized workers who have endorsed and followed Bridges for many years.

It is utterly ignominious and discriminatory for Congressmen to draft special legislation against one man. This Nation has deported men when their presence breached some principle of national policy that could be encompassed in a general law. If aliens, for instance, could be shown to be members of organizations that advocate the violent overthrow of the American form of government, it has been deemed proper to deport them.

But James Landis, dean of the Harvard Law School, spent a whole summer investigating charges of communism against Bridges and reported that there was no adequate evidence to support them. So what does the House do? Since there is no law under which Bridges can be driven from the country, and since there is apparently no principle affecting his case around which a special law could be drafted, it simply votes to deport Harry Bridges.

The House, in its "blitzkrieg" against organized labor at this session, has conducted operations on many fronts—the Smith amendments to the Wagner Labor Act, the strangulation of the Economics Division of the National Labor Relations Board, and now a "bum's rush" against a man labor regards to be one of its most effective leaders.

The issue is not Bridges. His methods may or may not have been bad. What matters is that one of the two great legislative branches of the United States can prostitute legislation by divorcing it from broad principle and reduce it to the unabashed "railroading" of one man. It remains for the Senate to kill the Bridges bill and to read the House a lesson in the American way.

Sacrificing for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIAL BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson:

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

Our effort to build our defenses, if vigorously and intelligently handled, should create much employment and even some kind of an industrial boom. The appropriations we have asked for defense seem tremendous but, if they are really to prove sufficient and effective, we ain't seen nothin' yet. We haven't even made a good start. It has been estimated by the best informed authority that if the World War had extended through 1919, our expenditures for that year would have been $35,000,000,000.

Germany has shattered all military records of conquest. Before she could do that, she had throughout years to shatter all records for work and sacrifice. War, whether offensive or defensive, is now largely a matter of industrial production of arms—Spartan discipline and sacrifice to the single purpose of military efficiency—defensive or offensive, as the case may be.

Mr. William Green has bravely said for labor that there will be no strikes and that this is a time for service but, fairly paraphrased, he added—but not of sacrifice by any changes of wages and hours. In his Charlottesville speech the President promised preparation but not to the restriction of any "social gains"—meaning continuation of Federal hand-outs which have been far greater than enough to have made this Nation powerful beyond the dreams and courage of any possible assailant.

We are to arm, but nobody is to sacrifice anything. This has been so well expressed by one of my favorite columnists, H. I. Phillips, in the New York Sun, that I asked for and received permission to quote it in full. This may look like a dead-beating stunt on a day's work, but I couldn't have done it half so well—and it needed to be done.

"We must be strong as Ajax, with arms and ships galore,
All on the pleasant hours of 8 a. m. to 4.
"We must be proof from blitzkrieg, as proof as proof can be Without the slightest hardship—or much economy.
"We must build fleets of airplanes—fleets wonderful and vast * * * Without a single lapse to the hard work of the past.
"We've got a job colossal, we must prepare for strife * * *
And all without affecting our present way of life!
"The ruthless war in Europe has made our crisis plain * * *
So forward! But it mustn't efface a social gain!
"We see the danger clearly, prepare at any price * * *
But, mind you, not a person must make a sacrifice!
"Grim war may near our seacoast, and from it we'll not flinch * * *
Assuming, in preparing, no one will feel the pinch!
"The world is deep in carnage; prepare now for all frays—
All on the present hours—and maybe with a raise!
"The flames are sweeping closer—get ready's what it means
And all in cozy houses and shiny limousines!
"The world we know seems dying—disaster sweeps this way,
Prepare at once! (Of course, with N. L. R. B.'s o. k.)
"We're hedged about by dangers—prepare to meet each blow
But do not let it lessen the comforts that we know!
"Preparedness is vital—so meet your Nation's call * * *
But do not let it tighten your belts, my boys, at all!"

If we start in this spirit, we shall finish in the soup. This is not time to turn the hands of the clock back on proved and proper advances in social justice. But it is high time to overhaul the whole spending structure. It was conceived in the theory of pump-priming—that spending of itself is a virtue. It therefore moved toward its objectives not with an idea of spending just as little as was absolutely necessary to accomplish a certain purpose, but on the contrary idea of spending as much as could be wrangled from Congress and poured out on the country.

If we prepare properly, there will be no lack of spending to surpass by far even this idea of magnificent sacrifice. A husky part of the cost of the defense program should be financed out of economies in the pump-priming and boondoggling programs. It will provide just as much "recovery and relief."

White-Fringed Beetle Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, when the Department of Agriculture conference report on the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture was before the House some weeks ago, the House refused to recede and concur in the amendment making available $600,000 for the extermination of the white-fringed beetle.

The conferees are still considering this and other amendments still in disagreement. There may be a chance for the House to act again on the amendment, which would probably protect the whole United States against the further invasion of the white-fringed beetle.

For this reason, and because of my conviction that the adverse vote of the House was due to the fact that so many of the Members did not fully appreciate the significance of the issue, I am emboldened to present the facts with regard to this menace and to invite the reconsideration of this problem by my colleagues.

Many of you talked with me after you had cast the adverse vote, and told me that your reason was that you had never seen a white-fringed beetle, had never heard of one in your State, and that you thought the danger was so remote as not to warrant so large an appropriation.

I have never seen a white-fringed beetle. Not one of them has ever been in my district. But I have enough confidence in the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine of our Department of Agriculture to rely upon the testimony of the experts who have made this Bureau so highly esteemed. They say that the white-fringed beetle is worse than any one of the other six of the well-known pests which have attacked agricultural products, and worse than all six of them combined. They say that there is a chance to exterminate—not merely control—the white-fringed beetle. They say that the invasion of the United States by this pest has just begun, and that it can be stopped now before it spreads to the rest of the United States.

The white-fringed beetle destroys all vegetation. The boll weevil simply punctures the cotton boll. The corn borer simply perforates the ears. The pink bollworm simply kills the bolls of cotton in which it hatches. But the white-fringed beetle eats the whole plant—root, stalk, branch, and leaf.

One beetle lays from 600 to 3,000 eggs. Under favorable conditions each egg hatches in about 2 weeks. The little larvae immediately enter the soil, feeding more or less actively on plant roots until they complete their growth. So the longer we postpone intensive action against this pest, the greater the problem will become—it is increasing by arithmetical progression.

Bearing these preliminary observations in mind, I most cordially invite your attention to the following statement with respect to the white-fringed beetle, its economic importance, and methods of control or extermination. It was prepared by Mr. B. M. Gaddis, in charge of Domestic Plant Quarantines, for Dr. Strong.

STATUS OF FUNDS TO COMBAT THE WHITE-FRINGED BEETLE

At the present time funds are available from allotments from the act making appropriations for the control and eradication of incipient and emergency outbreaks of insect pests and plant diseases to enable carrying out of control measures through June 30, 1940. The Budget estimate for white-fringed beetle suppression for the fiscal year, starting July 1, 1940, was rejected by the House of Representatives, restored by the Senate, was in disagreement, in the conference between the two branches of Congress, and the House, on May 14, upheld its first action. This action leaves no funds in sight for white-fringed beetle control work after July 1, 1940. The appropriation for emergency and incipient outbreaks of insect pests is not sufficient to carry on white-fringed beetle control measures during the fiscal year beginning July 1, next.

OBJECTIVES OF CONTROL PROGRAMS AND RESULTS

In view of the limited distribution of the white-fringed beetle, which is known to occur in a total area of approximately 71,000 acres along the Gulf Coast area of the States of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi, and because of its known destructive nature, Federal and State agencies, responsible for pest control activities, determined that it was necessary to undertake control and to prevent the spread of the pest for the purpose of protecting the agricultural resources of the country. At a public hearing held in New Orleans on September 15, 1938, to consider the advisability of enacting a Federal quarantine on account of the white-fringed beetle, State officials, nurserymen, cattlemen, farmers, and other affected individuals unanimously favored establishment of such a quarantine, as well as application of the most intensive type of suppressive measures to combat and, if possible, to eliminate the pest.

Federal and State quarantines have been enacted and are being enforced. Control measures have been conducted in full and active cooperation with the affected States since July 1927. The objectives of such measures are to prevent the spread of the pest to noninfested areas, and to control and, if possible, eradicate it in infested areas to prevent a continued and increasingly serious annual loss to agricultural crops, and to avoid the necessity of the continued annual expenditures necessary to control the pest if crops are to be raised on an economic basis in areas where the pest exists and in areas to which it may otherwise spread.

Since the establishment of the quarantines and the operation of control measures, the spread of the pest is believed to have been checked. Loss and damage to crops in all infested areas has been reduced to a marked degree by the drastic reduction of beetle population. That a continuance of the program may result in ultimate elimination of the pest is indicated by the fact that in five isolated areas of infestation, not a single white-fringed beetle, in a viable stage, has been found since the application of control measures during 1939. The effect of discontinuance of suppressive and regulatory measures would undoubtedly result in a multiplicity of quarantines by States, which would seriously hamper, if not actually embargo, normal commerce of affected materials.

Further information relative to the type of control measures in effect, as well as information concerning the life history and habits of the pest, follows:

GENERAL INFORMATION RE DISTRIBUTION AND ECONOMIC STATUS OF THE WHITE-FRINGED BEETLE

Two species of the white-fringed beetle, Pantomorus leucoloma, Boh., and P. peregrinus, Buch., have in recent years caused considerable damage to crops in some localities of southern Alabama, northwestern Florida, southeastern Louisiana, and southern Mississippi. At the close of the calendar year 1939, the known infested area totaled approximately 71,000 acres in the four affected States. The two species are similar in appearance and habits. They are destructive in both larval and adult stages to a wide range of crops, the most serious injury being caused by the feeding of the larvae on plant roots. Among the crops most severely damaged are corn, cotton, potatoes, peanuts, and other legumes. However, in the absence of favored-host plants, the insects feed upon and cause economic damage to practically all types of succulent vegetation.

The destructive nature of the pest is indicated by the fact that more than 1,200 acres of heavily infested farm lands have been left out of production during the past 2 years in the vicinity of Florala, Ala., because even after two to five plantings, in a given season, crops could not be produced in sufficient quantity to justify harvesting.

While the climatic limitations of the pest are not fully known, it is believed to be capable of establishment in any part of the United States. Larvae have been found in the ground at a depth of 26 inches, indicating probable survival even in northern areas.

Life history: Both species of the white-fringed beetle pass the winter chiefly as larvae in the soil. The larvae are white, grublike worms, about half an inch long when full grown. Most of them become mature in May or June. They pupate in cells in the soil and the adults begin to emerge in late May or early June, the main emergence being between mid-June and late July. The adult beetles are unable to fly and are all females. Individuals have been known to live for almost 6 months, although most of them probably survive a much shorter time under natural conditions. They lay their eggs in small masses which are difficult to find, usually at or just below the surface of the soil in contact with bits of old-plant stem, sticks, or pebbles. A single beetle ordinarily lays 600 or 700 eggs, though individuals have been known to lay over 3,000. In warm weather with plenty of moisture the eggs hatch in about 2 weeks and the little larvae immediately enter the soil where they remain, feeding more or less actively on plant roots until they complete their growth. There is normally one generation a year.

Control measures: Since 1937 the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine of the United States Department of Agriculture, in cooperation with the affected States, has conducted suppressive measures against the white-fringed beetle in all infested areas.

The types of control measures used are based on information obtained from field observation of the life history and habits of the pest and other studies, which show that the pest cannot fly, that it requires green food in order to survive and lay eggs in any appreciable numbers, that its egg-laying capacity is greatly reduced by elimination of favored host plants, and that it is readily killed when exposed to the direct rays of the sun. It is also very susceptible to insecticides such as calcium arsenate and cryolite when applied to host plants. Based on such information, the following suppressive measures are used:

(1) Clean cultivation of infested fields to eliminate all vegetation during the period of adult activity.

(2) Use of an oil-base sodium-arsenite herbicide to eliminate host vegetation on waste and abandoned areas, on railroad yards, and in the vicinity of processing plants and other places from which there is danger of artificial spread of the pest unless it is suppressed.

(3) Use of insecticides such as calcium arsenate and cryolite to destroy adult beetles.

(4) Use of soil fumigants to destroy larvae.

(5) Modification of farm practices in cooperation with farmers to allow more effective use of insecticides by eliminating, insofar as practicable, the planting of certain leguminous crops, especially the interplanting of such crops with corn.

One or more of these suppressive measures, or a combination of them, are applied on all known infested acreage. As a result of such control, there has been a drastic reduction in population of the pest throughout all the infested areas, and the beetle has apparently been eradicated from several of the more isolated areas.

Mr. Speaker, in view of this information and in the hope that this infestation may be completely eradicated, or at least that its spread may be stopped and not continue until it covers the entire United States, I sincerely hope that you may see your way clear to vote for the appropriation, approved by the Budget, earnestly advocated by the Senate conferees, and unopposed by the House conferees, if the issue is again presented for a vote in the House.

Bridges Deportation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABE MURDOCK
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

LETTER BY HON. ABE MURDOCK, OF UTAH

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by me to the Deseret News, of Salt Lake City, Utah:

JUNE 15, 1940.

Mr. M. E. PETERSON,
The Deseret News, Salt Lake City, Utah.

DEAR SIR: I welcome this opportunity to make a statement regarding my vote on the Bridges deportation bill. Fortunately, just before I dictated this statement, I read the splendid editorial contained in the Deseret News of June 12, from which I quote: "Granting that there are sinister subversive elements seeking the overthrow of our institutions, and that these should be unceremoniously rooted out, yet to make any person the object of our wrath, boycott, or contempt, or to ostracize him or her socially simply because of accident of birth, flies in the face of all that we cherish as basic and fundamental in American citizenship." It was in a very similar spirit to that exhibited in your editorial that I cast my vote on the Bridges bill.

I hold no brief for Harry Bridges or any other alien. On coming to Congress, I took an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution provides, emphatically, that Congress shall pass no bill of attainder; that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except in case of war or invasion. The Supreme Court, since John Marshall's day, has held that these constitutional provisions apply to aliens as well as citizens, if they are within the territorial limits of the United States. The question presented to Congress by the Bridges deportation bill was not whether Bridges should stay in the United States, but whether Congress should absolutely disregard the Constitution in an effort to get rid of an alien. Let us admit that he is an undesirable alien. Let us admit that it is for the best interests of the United States to get rid of him. Can we afford, even to accomplish this purpose, to sacrifice and disregard the Constitution? This was the question presented to me in the light of my constitutional oath. I knew what the popular vote was—that was so obvious that a child could see it. The easy thing to do was to vote "aye." If the only test to be applied was, which vote on the bill will get me the most votes on election day, without any hesitancy I would have voted "aye." In 8 years I have never applied this test. I have never voted for any bill simply because it was popular to do so. I have never refrained from voting "no" on a bill simply because it was unpopular to do so. To me, the Bridges deportation bill was purely and simply a bill of attainder. To have voted for a bill of attainder knowingly, would have violated the constitutional oath that I solemnly took. Besides being a bill of attainder, it denied the constitutional right of due process of law. As amended in the House, it suspends the writ of habeas corpus. The question was, and the question still is, Is Congress under any conditions justified in tearing down, destroying, or burning up the great temple of liberty, justice, and freedom—our Federal Constitution, simply to eliminate from within it rats or termites? My answer is emphatically "No." I accord to every man respect for his opinion and the assumption that he is acting in good faith in expressing it. I ask the same concession for myself.

If the Bridges deportation bill is not a bill of attainder, if it does not deny due process of law, if it does not suspend the writ of habeas corpus, then, as a lawyer and a Member of Congress, I have made a mistake. If it is a bill of attainder, if it does deny due process, if it does suspend the writ of habeas corpus, then to vote for it would have been a violation of my constitutional oath, even through such a vote might have been approved by a majority of the good people of Utah. In our 150 years of national history and experience it has no precedent. It is a throw-back to the old alien and sedition laws condemned early in our national life; but in its disregard for the Constitution it is even worse than any of them.

If our present laws with reference to undesirable aliens are not adequate and sufficient—and I do not say that they are—why not, under the Constitution, pass general legislation to exclude such aliens without sacrificing the great democratic principles which are the very foundation of democracy? Democracy is a process, not an end. In the Bridges deportation bill we lose sight of the democratic process to accomplish an end. In other words, we are in reverse.

If supporting the Constitution and maintaining my oath inviolate, as I understand it, causes me to lose every vote in the State of Utah or to be condemned by every person in the State, I must accept the result, but I will do so with a clear conscience. In casting my vote in support of the Constitution, as I understand it, I was joined by many outstanding constitutional lawyers of the House, by men who are famous for their conservatism—Republicans and Democrats alike.

Even in facing a crisis as the Nation now does, we cannot afford to forget the Constitution, which is the foundation of our liberty, justice, and freedom. Some people may be stampeded to do so, but I must refuse, having full confidence that if and when the matter ever reaches the courts, my position will be fully vindicated.

ABE MURDOCK.

Providing Money for the National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. PAT HARRISON, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered last evening over the Columbia Broadcasting System by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on the subject, Providing Money for the National Defense.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When any problem arises which threatens our national safety or well-being, citizens of this country have a peculiar gift for dropping their domestic differences and presenting instantly a united front to any common enemy. In that light, this Congress has acted speedily and wisely to meet the dangers indirectly hurled at the Nation's tranquillity and security by the incessant rumble of the war machine over Europe.

In view of world events, we have moved promptly. Billions have been provided, and billions more are likely to be provided to carry on in this great world crisis. We have adopted a program of "full speed ahead," by expanding every phase of our national defense. The harnessing of our vast resources is under way and I know we stand as a united people, firm and ready to meet any challenge the future might hold. While the war clouds roll steadily onward over Europe and the impact of the conflict is brought more forcibly to our attention daily, I am convinced that this Nation—calm, determined, and courageous—is prepared to go the limit in girding itself to cope with any eventuality which might arise from the hostilities beyond the seas. The strongest national defense possible in this emergency is our objective; that objective we shall attain.

Shortly after the emergency national defense appropriations had been recommended by the President, I gave assurance to the country that the Congress would under no circumstances permit those plans to be handicapped or retarded by failure to provide the necessary funds to finance that program. While tax bills are never attractive subjects, I am sure this Congress has the support of the American people in the passage of a tax bill at this time. In this crisis, the American people have responded magnificently. From coast to coast, from border to border, our citizenship has patriotically voiced its eagerness to meet the issue unflinchingly, and has shown its willingness to assume the tax burden that the defense expenditures will necessitate.

We must all tighten our belts; we must be resolved to face sacrifices. The end of expenditures for national defense is not in sight; therefore, the need for additional taxation later to underwrite those expenditures must be expected.

We do not want war. We all despise war. As for myself, I am unalterably opposed to ever again sending the flower of this country's manhood across the seas. But we shall be ready to defend that which is ours. If that tragic day should ever come, we shall be prepared. Weapons of aggression must be met with equally efficient methods of protection. Our traditions and heritage are too sacred, our liberty and freedom too precious, and our rich and productive country too valuable to permit the taking of any chances under present world conditions. The destruction of a single one of our prosperous coastal cities would entail a loss far greater than the entire cost of a completely adequate defense program.

I want to emphasize that the steps taken by Congress in appropriating billions for the defense and in the House passing a tax bill to finance emergency expenditures is a convincing demonstration that action in a democracy can be as speedy and as impressive as that in a dictatorship. It conclusively demonstrates that a democracy can function effectively in the face of an emergency.

Our defense program has already required and will continue to require the appropriation of large sums of money. In addition, large sums must be available for immediate use. The element of speed in the undertaking and completion of this program is of great importance. Any substantial delay may seriously threaten our national security.

And while we strengthen our own security through immediate expenditures for national-defense expansion, and while industry is being synchronized and men and machines coordinated, other machinery has been put in motion which is speeding, and will continue to speed, our surplus guns, planes, and ammunition to the armies of those countries which love liberty and freedom and despise tyranny.

In normal times our average annual expenditures for national defense are about $700,000,000. Due to the unsettled world conditions, the Budget for the fiscal year 1940 increased the defense expenditures to approximately $1,360,000,000. For defense expenditures during the fiscal year 1941 the Budget submitted to Congress last January requested $1,940,000,000. Since that time the President has submitted requests for additional defense funds of $1,310,000,000, making the total of requests for defense expenditures for the fiscal year 1941, $3,250,000,000.

In response to these requests, there has been included in appropriation bills for direct appropriations and contract authorizations for 1941, for national defense, $4,090,000,000.

More than one-fourth of this huge sum, or about $1,115,000,000, will be used to purchase the most up-to-date airplanes, both bombers and fighters; part of it will go for the construction of warships and submarines, the purchase of new air bases, and the improvement of all air and naval bases now in use. Part of it will be used to procure antiaircraft guns and heavy artillery. Some of it will be expended for tanks, armored cars, and ammunition; and some of it will go for the enlargement and training of our armed forces.

There are, of course, several methods of financing these enormous expenditures necessary to provide for national defense. One is merely to pass legislation increasing the national-debt limit.

Another is to meet this unforeseen expenditure solely through the levying of increased taxes. The third—and the one which in my opinion is the wisest course to follow in this emergency—is a combination of an increase in the limitation of the national debt and the imposition of the necessary taxes to finance those bonds to be issued by the Government under the increased debt limitation. The American people have not hesitated in expressing their willingness to shoulder the burden of increased taxes to accomplish that purpose.

Two weeks ago the Ways and Means Committee of the House began consideration of a tax bill to provide the additional revenue necessary to finance this program. By intensive effort that committee was able to report a well-designed and equitable tax plan on Monday, last. On Tuesday the House debated and passed the measure by the overwhelming vote of 396 to 6. The membership of the House, and particularly of the Committee on Ways and Means, is to be congratulated upon this splendid work.

I believe the plan devised by the House bill and which, at the instance of the Finance Committee of the Senate, I reported to the Senate yesterday, and which will be brought up for consideration in the Senate tomorrow, is the most satisfactory means by which the necessary funds can be secured without unduly burdening business or causing any great hardship.

The bill would give the Treasury authority to issue $4,000,000,000 of short-term public-debt obligations, designated "National Defense Series," with maturing dates of not more than 5 years. To insure the retirement of these obligations, we have increased taxes, so that we will be able to secure in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 annually. Most of this sum will be earmarked as a special fund for the retirement of these obligations. If the special fund is not large enough to retire the obligations, we have made further increases in taxes to be paid into the general fund, which may be also utilized for this purpose. In other words, 5 years after these national-defense obligations are issued, they will be liquidated and paid.

The bill separates the taxes into two special classes—those of a temporary nature which expire at the end of 5 years, and those of a permanent nature.

Of the changes which are of a permanent nature, the principal ones include the reduction of the personal exemptions from $1,000 to $800, in the case of a single person, and from $2,500 to $2,000, in the case of a married person. This will permit a large number of our citizens an opportunity to contribute toward building up a fund for the national defense of our country, and will make them aware that they are playing an important role in this national crisis. Surtaxes also have been increased on incomes in excess of $6,000 and not in excess of $100,000. At that point, our surtax rate reaches 58 percent. The rates on incomes above $100,000 have not been increased as the surtaxes in these upper brackets are at the present time very high, reaching a top of 75 percent. However, the tax actually payable by the people in these higher brackets is materially increased through the increase in surtaxes in the middle brackets and the lowering of the exemptions.

Our corporations have also been required to bear a tax increase over that provided by existing law. The top corporate tax rate is now 18 percent. This has now been increased by 1 percent, and when the temporary 10 percent supertax or defense tax effective only for 5 years is added, the corporate rate will reach a maximum of 20.9 percent. Here it should be pointed out that the supertax is 10 percent of the tax, not 10 percent of the net income. The permanent taxes are estimated to yield approximately $322,000,000 annually. Added to this, we have imposed temporary increases which will yield six hundred and eighty-two millions annually.

These temporary taxes are set aside in a special fund for national defense. By subjecting all of our internal revenue taxes, with minor exceptions, to the increases, we have been able to spread the burden as fairly and equitably as the circumstances will permit at this time.

The bill, for the first time, requires a single person with a gross income of $800 or more, or a married person with a gross income of $2,000 or more, to file an income-tax return. This will add greatly to the number of returns already filed. At the present time there are approximately seven and one-half million returns filed, and this will add another 8,000,000. It is believed that this requirement will add considerably to the revenue, and enable the Government to secure taxes from many people, who through ignorance or otherwise, have failed to pay taxes in the past.

In the case of the income tax, a temporary defense tax of 10 percent is imposed upon the amount of tax payable to the Government. The simplicity of such a tax must appeal to all of us. Thus, if I owe $100 to the Government, I will be required to pay $110, or $10 additional. This plan has been invoked in some of our States to raise money for emergency purposes, and is the plan whereby the Canadians impose their surtax. That is, the surtax in Canada is simply a certain percent of their normal tax.

This 10 percent increase has also been applied to the capital-stock and excess-profits taxes, the estate and gift taxes, and many other miscellaneous taxes, such as the taxes on toilet preparations, radios, mechanical refrigerators, deeds, and playing cards. Certain types of excise taxes have been singled out for greater increase. The tax on gasoline, wine, whisky, and beer has been increased.

We have not increased any social-security taxes.

Anyone who examines the list of increased taxes must realize we have tried to spread the burden as far as possible over our internal-revenue system. It is not expected that these increased taxes will add to the present administrative costs. The Treasury Department believes, and we believe, that the pending tax bill meets the test of a satisfactory revenue measure. It involves no serious administrative difficulties. It produces substantial additional revenue amounting in the total to approximately $1,000,000,000 annually, and distributes the tax burden among practically all of our people.

Too frequent changes in tax structure is not the best policy for business or the Government, but in such times as these, with uncertainties throughout the world, such dislocations, and conditions economically unstable everywhere, we cannot estimate with certainty as to revenue receipts or necessities for enlarged expenditures. We who drafted the present tax bill were forced, because of the exigencies and circumstances of the hour, to do our job with greater speed than we would have ordinarily employed. Undoubtedly there are some problems incident to taxation at this time that must be given further study, in order to find a proper solution, so as to be embodied in future legislation. The House, through the Ways and Means Committee, has promised a comprehensive study and recommendation to the next Congress as to excess-profits taxes and amortization allowances. With that I am in thorough accord, and I am sure every member of the Finance Committee of the Senate holds to the same view. The problem of an excess-profits tax or a tax on production of articles essential to the national defense must be thoroughly studied, with a view to speedy legislation in January.

The defense of our country must not afford opportunities for profiteering. There must be no war millionaires.

Our present situation arises from the patriotic desire of all Americans to become prepared in the event of war. Patriotic Americans, whether rich or poor, must enlist in this program for the country's safety, and they must be content with normal returns on their investments. Such a reasonable law will be passed after it has been carefully studied and expertly prepared and tested. There must be no loopholes, and it must become retroactive to meet this situation.

Coupled with this billion-dollar increased tax bill, the Senate may adopt an amendment, sponsored by Senator BYRD, of Virginia, calling for a 10-percent reduction in the aggregate on appropriations for the fiscal year 1941 passed by this Congress, excluding those required for national defense, the discretion being placed with the President as to where the reductions can more rationally be made without interfering with the orderly functions of the Government.

I believe the tax bill will be passed promptly by the Senate. The enactment of appropriation bills, which are companion pieces of legislation to the tax bill, is under way. The defense program has been given vigorous impetus. Every legislative effort calculated to expedite its rapid completion has been made or is now in its final processes.

We shall show to the world, and particularly to those who would do us harm, that the American people can act with all possible speed and efficiency to cope with any problem which a threat to our national security might raise.

This country's greatness and its future lie in the people themselves. Their resolute will for security should be a warning to all transgressors.

Backing Our Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY O. TALLE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

ADDRESS BY COL. HANFORD MACNIDER

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I submit herewith a notable address delivered by my distinguished constituent Col. Hanford MacNider, of Mason City, Iowa, on the occasion of an enthusiastic mass meeting held by the Young Republican League in Des Moines, Iowa, June 12, 1940.

Colonel MacNider, or "Jack," as his many friends affectionately call him, is not only Iowa's favorite son in the forthcoming contest to nominate a Republican candidate for President; he is the choice of countless friends throughout the length and breadth of the United States.

The problems of this hour demand the services of a Chief Executive who can be depended upon to keep faith with the people; who possesses ability and courage; and who, schooled in the best traditions of American life, will think and act American.

A distinguished soldier in the World War, later Assistant Secretary of War, past national commander of the American Legion, Minister to Canada—he knows the problems of war.

A successful farmer, enterprising manufacturer, and esteemed civic leader—he knows the problems of peace.

Small wonder that his virile personality is being acclaimed from coast to coast and from border to border. In emergency and normalcy he has the sinews and good sense required of the responsible leader of a mighty nation. Speed the day when such a man is chosen to execute the will of the American people.

His address follows:

You young Republicans who form the spearhead, the shock troops of your party's campaigns, are having some very interesting lessons in tactics in these exciting days. The British and French fighting with their backs against the wall could explain to you, if they had time, that a sure way to court disaster is to let a "new deal" get into your system of government or at your defenses. The soldiers of France are today going to their deaths by thousands because French politicians persuaded that unfortunate nation to espouse the doctrines of Russia. While Frenchmen ceased to work in the curious name of social reform, and left their work benches at the call of radical agitators, the preparation for the overthrow of their country went on unabated in Germany and in Italy. And the great British Empire is in very serious trouble because its politicians refused to heed dangers apparent everywhere. If these nations cease to be free, it will not be because the people are no longer brave and capable but because their leadership has failed them. Is it not time that we take stock of our own leadership? To what has it led us?

While the "blitzkrieg" of Herr Hitler goes blasting away at what most of us consider civilization in Europe, the American people have been subjected to an amazing barrage of attacks upon our sense of security and peace of mind right here at home.

As we watched the unhappy headlines or listened anxiously to the news over the air, there came bursting out upon us a panicky home-front bulletin right out of the blue. The President was before the Congress making his unhappy confession that he, the sentry, entrusted with our safety, had been asleep at his post; that we had no competent defenses; that grave danger was upon us. He proceeded on the air waves to drop bombs all over America. He even dropped a few on us—to dynamite the notoriously hard-to-frighten Middle West.

Then came the usual New Deal prescription for salvation. Let's spend a billion dollars. He wasn't quite sure how, but if any man could do it, he was the fellow. Otherwise the bogeyman would get us. A billion dollars would scare him off. Mr. Roosevelt had something there. A billion dollars still scares a few of us. I know it scares me. Thus ended the first episode.

After a shocked and angered Nation had stewed over that for a few days, and some of the more emotional brethren had panicked themselves into suggestions that we give up the ghost as a republic, came a second pronouncement from the New Deal throne.

We were gathered in around the fireside, and calmed and cheered with the news that after all we did have some defenses of a sort—not real ones, of course, but on order, coming up. Now, it seemed that we had the best one-ocean Navy in our history, a perky little Army with some promised guns, a fine land air force with actually a few hundred modern planes. The back-door gang hadn't been interested in that kind of spending up to now. Give him some new blank checks, and he'd put them right at it. The seven-odd billion which the President had been given for defense hadn't gone down the rat hole; it was the rest of the sixty billion that had disappeared somewhere—perhaps someone had come up out of those rat holes and got it.

You suspect, and I suspect, where an awful lot of it went. The gang will all be in Chicago in July. The Hague machine of New Jersey, the Kelly-Nash organization of Chicago, Pendergast "sprung" for the occasion from Leavenworth, Tammany in stripes, Guffey of Pennsylvania, the Olson fellow travelers from California, together with pettier bandits from all over the Union. They'll all be there with bands and rejoicing. They are the third-term movement. And for terms without end as long as gates are ajar in the Federal Treasury.

Then came another message slipped quietly to the Congress to be read this time by a droning clerk, although it was even more devastating than the first. The President had miscalculated. He must have another billion. Sandwiched in between such stupendous figures was the demand that Congress abdicate again—in the early New Deal manner. The President wanted the National Guard for active service to preserve our neutrality. There was a suggestion that the Congress run along home.

It wasn't hard to understand what one might want with a billion dollars. To spend that much money would be fun for any of us. But it isn't fun for our citizen soldiery to be dragged out and made Federal troops in time of peace. That National Guard should not be made a plaything for men who want to create political situations. Its purpose is and always has been the protection of the American home.

Of course, the Guard should have proper training. If that is the purpose of this extraordinary request, let the President say so. We are always ready to believe the best. But the youngsters who have patiotically given up their vacations and their leisure to prepare themselves for our defense in case of disaster should not be expected to give up everything while the rest of us stay at home, if we are not at war.

Or are we at war?

Has the President by any chance committed us to something we haven't been told about as yet? Does he seriously believe that we are in imminent danger of invasion? If he does, why doesn't he tell us where from? Certainly he won't be giving anything away to whoever may be planning such an expedition. Why this "blitzkrieg" of fear he's putting down upon us? I think I know why, and so do you. It's to capitalize European disaster to bring a perpetuation of Franklin Roosevelt upon America.

Most of you heard or read the President's address in Virginia Monday evening. He bluntly announced that the Neutrality Act had been repealed, not in the American way by the Congress, although it was in session, but by him in the way of a dictator. Small wonder, as he said, that the young people of America were wondering again what was to happen to the country they had known.

This might be a proper time to review a little history which you younger Republicans won't remember quite so vividly as those of us who went to the last conflict. Do you recall the steps taken by a Democratic administration preliminary to our participation in the first World War? First, the National Guard was called into active service. We were not at war, yet we were marched and countermarched from home to border and back. Historians tell us now that we had already been committed to the wars overseas.

Just the other day Mr. Roosevelt measured for us by exact hours and minutes the flight of bombers from Mexico to our homes. Now he, in turn, asks the Congress for the right to summon the same National Guard into active service. Then, as now, a Democratic president was running for re-election on his foreign policy. The cry was that he had "kept us out of war." This time the President assures your counterparts, the young Democrats, that they know better than to believe that he would take us to war. But do we? That time the Democratic nominee was elected by a very narrow margin on his promise to maintain peace. A month after he took office he was marching us to the war overseas. Mr. Roosevelt was a member of that administration.

As I look back upon that experience and the course which we are being pushed along now, some oft repeated words of this administration keep echoing in my ears. They are ominous and I don't like them. "We planned it that way."

There is one thing about which there is no dispute. The President has confessed to his neglect of our national protection. We want that remedied at once. We won't quarrel over any extra speed he can put into it. We'll admit with him that he has failed in his duty, but we'll stand for no further failure in the correction of that situation.

Those of us who served overseas and know something of war, not from Cook's tour of naval bases and rear areas but from actual combat experience, came home demanding of deaf ears a proper national defense. We wanted a regular army, swift on its feet and able to meet all emergencies. We asked for a navy second to none. We were called militarists, warmongers, and worse, but we were right. Warmongers are always those who haven't gone to war. The President is wont to say he knows war and hates war. Now it turns out he didn't know one when he saw it. That's why we're late and pitifully unprepared.

Let's have a national defense that can't be questioned. Complete, definite, impregnable defense. Let's cut to the bone every spendthrift activity of this spendthrift administration that we may be able to pay for it and still have credit as a nation. Good credit is the first bulwark of any sound national defense. Ours must be maintained or all talk of protection is useless. I question Mr. Roosevelt's ability to maintain it. And I question it upon his record. We shall have to change administrations to do it.

There is no doubt about the present temper of the American people. They will make such sacrifices as are necessary to safeguard this continent. There is little they would deny those who are battling against totalitarianism overseas. They want to see all dictators whipped and liquidated, and that goes for all dictatorships, here and abroad, which destroy the liberties of men.

There are a lot of hysterical people about who are already crying that we must send American boys into the shambles abroad. You'll find these are folks who have never been to war, who know nothing of war and its tragic uselessness. The role of great war lord apparently appeals to Mr. Roosevelt. This situation may well prove too much for one so anxious for the pages of history. The kind and generous move on our part is to remove that temptation from him and at the same time save ourselves.

There is no need for partisanship in our physical program of preparedness. But there must be a decision by the American people as to what leadership they believe will carry it to success. We still have our choice of how we shall give our effort. Shall we do it as a free people in the free American way, or shall we in order to defeat totalitarianism go totalitarian ourselves? Shall we defeat ourselves before we start? We know the free American system works. It built the greatest Nation in history. We know New Deal regimentation doesn't work. It has defeated 7 years of our effort for recovery.

Does anyone believe this administration capable or willing to proceed any other way? Their first effort—their continued effort has been to regiment us—farmer, business, labor, unemployed, all have been marched in lockstep to the commands of the New Deal drillmasters. If they win this time their dreams will have come true. Nothing will stop them. The next logical step would be a request for the immediate passage of the mobilization legislation, ready and waiting for the psychological moment. We would be clamped into a strait jacket from which under their kind of leadership we would never escape as a free people. They have failed in every peacetime effort. Shall we hand such incompetents or worse the guardianship of our safety in time of our greatest emergency? If we are unprepared to meet it, whose fault is it, but that of Mr. Roosevelt, who under the Constitution is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. For 7 years he had relentlessly pursued a program to break down the best defenses of our Nation. He has spent $60,000,000,000, doubled our national debt, and impaired our national credit. He has crippled industry by excessive and punitive regulation and taxation. He has made it practically impossible for new industries to become established or older industries to expand.

He has destroyed every incentive that would have built up our abilities to be ready for trouble.

He has weakened our national fiber and destroyed in men their stamina and courage, made them dependent upon the state.

He has built up an ugly and un-American class consciousness and disrupted our American team play.

He has ridiculed our attempts to run down elements striving to destroy our form of government, coddled and encouraged Communist-saturated organizations, called the Dies committee names, while his lieutenants have attempted to hamper its activities and stop its appropriations.

Now he warns us of the "fifth columns." Well, he knows who they are. It will mean severing a good many close ties, but if he means it, he will clean out his own official bureaucratic army. Then and then only will we know that he wants to defend America.

If you were to hire a man to run your business would you pick one who has never run a business in his life? Would you pick one who has proven himself helpless to proceed with ordinary American business sense, whose associates and privy counselors execute a pincers movement on him every time he even tends that way? Do you remember the War Resources Board which he disbanded only last November? They had been chosen from American industry to give us suggestions as to our preparedness. We don't know yet what they recommended. Did they suggest a little more money for defense and a little less for squirrel cages?

Would you rehire a man who had broken every promise he made to you when he first asked for a job? Shall I repeat those promises? An immediate reduction of Government expenditures of not less than 25 percent, a Budget annually balanced, a sound currency, and the immediate removal of government from all fields of private enterprise. But more important still, is that the type of man you want to entrust with the future of this Nation, with the lives of your sons and daughters?

Is there or is there not a deliberate campaign under way to stampede the American people into a complete break-down of our traditional policies, precedents, and procedure necessary to maintain our form of government? Has someone planned it this way? Are we being taken for a runaway buggy ride—another romantic rendezvous with destiny—to give the New Deal permanent control of America? Are we being deliberately confused and bewildered to insure a third term for the first man in our history to demand it? Well, if he's not trying to break down that precedent, let him say so. Then until November when we'll reestablish American government, we could still think of this as America.

Yes, you have the right to ask "What is the answer? What can we do to meet these hypothetical attacks from without and these very definite ones from within"?

The answer is that we can stand up like Americans again, and quit cowering in the back of the cage like a bunch of experimental guinea pigs. We can proceed to build up our American defenses with the same vigor which made ours the greatest Nation on earth. Once we start acting like Americans again, no man, crazed and drunk with power though he may be, would think of attacking us.

Our job right now, as Americans and Republicans, is to select and elect a man we can trust on a platform we know will be kept.

I believe America is ready to go American again. Once that happens, there will be no difficulty in defending America from enemies without and from within.

LETTER FROM THE CALIFORNIA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Alex Johnson, secretary of the California Farm Bureau Federation:

CALIFORNIA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Berkeley, Calif., June 12, 1940.

To Members of the California Congressional Delegation:

GENTLEMEN: I am addressing this letter to you jointly to call your attention to a situation which, while not peculiar to California, is possibly of as great importance to California farmers as to farmers of any other State.

The President of the United States has addressed the Congress on the need for a national defense program, and the Congress has seen the necessity for action and has provided tremendous appropriations to be used in this emergency.

We now read daily of preparations on a large scale for warships, airplanes, guns, ammunition, and the training of men to use these munitions of war.

We read nothing of any food-conservation plan in the national defense program.

Men can work in shifts for 24 hours a day for 7 days a week in the manufacture of war materials, but we have to wait on the seasons—and the seasons are not always favorable—for the production of food.

In the war of 1914–18 we had to resort to heroic measures to produce food as a war contribution. After the war we began to try to readjust ourselves to a peacetime normal production, and with very inadequate and painful results.

Today there is no plan for conserving food, and as against that we have lost our foreign markets for much of our usual exports, and growers are working on plans to adjust supply to demand to avoid financial collapse.

Using dried fruit as an illustration, if you will refer to the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Agricultural Economics' mimeograph of October 13, 1939, entitled "Fruits—The World War and the 1939 European War," you will note that in its statistical tables on the production and exports of dried fruits, the last complete year, 1938, shows that the percentage of the production of dried fruits moving into export for that year was:

DRIED FRUIT

	Percent
Apricots	63
Apples	82
Peaches	19
Pears	68
Prunes	45
Raisins	26

Groups of producers of these dried fruits have been meeting to discuss their problem as affected by loss of exports and have been working on the development of programs calculated to balance supply against estimated demand, and in the case of raisins and prunes specific proposals have been developed contemplating the dropping on the ground of that portion of the crop considered as surplus. If it is necessary for the growers to meet this situation to their own advantage, some such program appears to be inevitable. We use this as an illustration of many problems covering different crops.

Are we to face a world situation such as exists today with on the one hand a speed-up of munitions of war and on the other a curtailment of food supplies?

May I urge your consideration of this problem? It appears to me that adequate funds should be placed at the disposal of the administration with which to encourage the harvesting and preparation for market of all crops now growing. That the Government would assure producers that it would be in the market to purchase all the crop not needed for the domestic market at a price to at least repay the growers for producing such crops.

Any plan to accumulate supplies of foodstuffs during an emergency period should give consideration to the disposal of such supplies when the need for the same disappears. If the European war should be terminated in a short time, the food so accumulated would still be needed to feed the starving people in the areas devastated by war. However, at the close of the last war, supplies were dumped back on the market, regardless of the consequence of such action on the producers. Plans for disposal should be carefully considered in advance.

At a time when national defense calls for so much preparation, may I suggest the desirability of the avoidance of conditions contributing to unrest. One great cause of unrest is unemployment. If farmers can be encouraged to harvest all crops, the additional work will make for more employment in the ranks of unskilled workers. If farmers can be assured of a reasonable price for these products, they can pay a satisfactory scale of wages to those employed. This, incidentally, would have its effect on the amount otherwise needed for unemployment relief.

Everything seems to point to the need of a food-conservation plan in the national-defense program.

Everything I see indicates the need for quick action as the harvest time is rapidly approaching and plans must be well considered and effectively executed.

It is possible that the machinery you have already created by legislation is adequate, and the only need is for funds to enable the machine to operate. If such is the case an estimate of the needs of the situation should be made and sufficient funds should be appropriated.

Yours very truly,

CALIFORNIA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
By ALEX JOHNSON,
Secretary.

Mr. Speaker, I believe Mr. Johnson's letter calls attention to a condition that demands the utmost consideration from the Congress. We must not overlook the welfare of the American farmer during the present national emergency.

Speak Softly and Carry a Big Stick

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. BRUCE BARTON, OF NEW YORK

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to me to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by my colleague, Hon. BRUCE BARTON, on Saturday evening, June 15, over the network of the Columbia Broadcasting Co.:

Some people write and ask their Congressmen these days, "Why haven't you denounced the dictators? Why is your voice not raised in shouts of defiance against the forces of evil?"

Speaking as one Member of the House who has done very little denouncing, I can report that in the short time since I came to Congress I have cast my vote for something like $6,000,000,000 worth of national defense. The fact that we have only a few hundred planes, and that our tanks and guns are still in the blueprint stage is not the fault of the Congress, and I am not interested now in assessing blame. This is not a partisan speech.

The point I want to make is that these are days when words are useless, or worse than useless. Only production counts.

If words could win, then the vituperation that Secretary Ickes fired at Hitler last year would have blown him to pieces. If calling names did any good, then Mussolini would have crawled into his hole and died of shame after hearing the President's Charlottesville speech.

Hitler and Mussolini care nothing for words. They know that words are uttered by politicians trying to get themselves reelected.

But Hitler can hear the motor of a bombing plane; he can understand the language of a battleship; he is very good at arithmetic; he knows the difference between a hundred planes and thousands.

A former Roosevelt gave us a foreign policy. Said President Theodore: "Speak softly and carry a big stick."

In recent years we have revised that policy. Our new version has been: "Forget the big stick of national defense. Broadcast loudly, denounce everybody, and then don't follow through."

We write notes in all directions and lecture everybody. In a period of a few weeks last year Secretary Ickes was lecturing Germany; Ambassador Grew was lecturing Japan; and Steve Early, the President's secretary, was lecturing Russia.

And what did all our harsh words accomplish? Did we help the Jews in Germany? Did we help Czechoslovakia, or Poland, or China, or Norway, or Denmark? We merely succeeded in gaining the thinly veiled contempt of the world.

There seems to be some peculiarity about the English language that makes the people who speak it believe that words can dispel actualities and well-chosen phrases erase facts. The French people and the German people use words frequently; but rarely, if ever, do they attempt to make words obliterate a reality.

Letters and telegrams are coming into Washington from many Americans insisting that the United States declare war upon Germany at once. They do not say how we are to fight or with what we are to fight. It seems to be their feeling that the mere declaration will have some power to efface the military gains of Germany and to destroy its military might.

Mr. Chamberlain did something of the same sort in September of 1939. It was then that he said that, because the words of Hitler could not be trusted, "England was going to the assistance of Poland." He did not say how England was going to assist Poland or where or with what. England was merely declaring something which turned out to be war. England was, in effect, passing a resolution but the words bore no relation to the existent facts nor to those which could be easily forecast.

Poland was ruined almost before Mr. Chamberlain had ceased talking, and the war which Mr. Chamberlain declared in words is being fought with men and materials of which Germany has the tragic advantage in both.

Our American belief in words has caused us to talk of 50,000 fighting aircraft until we almost believe that we have them. It has caused us to talk and toss appropriations of billions of dollars around until we are beginning to act as though the goods were on hand or on order when they are neither.

Perhaps the simplest procedure consistent with the idea that strong words can win a war would be to pass a law: Be it enacted that the German Armies are immediately to withdraw from France, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Poland, and all territories which they did not occupy prior to January 1, 1937.

Why bother about the machinery for enforcement of this law? Why bother with what we will do about the status quo ante once the war is resolved? If words can take care of one, words can take care of the other and we have plenty of words. Are we not the greatest and most powerful Nation in the world? Let the dictators tremble and cease their depredations. If not, we should give them a severe talking to. This is the way people talk who believe in words.

I was one of the Members of Congress who voted against lifting the embargo and was widely criticized by citizens of high intelligence and patriotism, including many of my close friends. Only history will show whether that was or was not a wise vote. I knew well enough it was a bad political vote; I was not thinking of politics. I was thinking of the people of England and France as well as our own people. I believed then and I believe now that our administration, through Ambassador Bullitt, had encouraged the Allies to take on a war for which they had no plans, no preparation, no adequate equipment, and no leadership. I believed then and I believe now that the repeal of the embargo would be and has been interpreted by them as a first step on our part toward war and a guaranty of our eventual participation not only with munitions and money but with men. I believed then and still believe that the only chance for the Allies was to continue to seek peace and accept it even at a sacrifice of national pride, until they had time to get themselves prepared. I believed then, and the present tragic state of Europe is evidence, that if they fought Hitler unprepared they had every chance of losing their freedom, their empires, and the civilization of Europe, if not of the world.

People denounced this as the attitude of a coward. They think a politician is very brave when he makes violent speeches. No courage is required to stand in a safe air-cooled radio station and denounce a dictator 3,000 miles away. They derided the idea that the repeal of the embargo was a first step to war. The same people, less than 10 months later, are writing to demand that we vote for war.

They said that the mere changing of our law would stop Hitler. But Hitler knew exactly how unprepared and weak we were. Every nation in Europe knew how unprepared we were. The President knew it. Everybody knew it except the people of the United States. The people thought we were a big, strong Nation, so strong that our words could stop a war.

Our critics denied that the three steps to war are munitions, money, and men. They denied that we would ever be called on for money. "The Allies have plenty of money," they said. Now they are demanding the repeal of the Johnson Act and the Neutrality Act. But the fact is that the Allies do have plenty of money. They have billions in this country. Their expenditures up to the present have been trivial. How much do you think Great Britain, including Canada, spent for munitions in the United States during the 4 months of January–April 1940, inclusive—the 4 months in which we were appropriating billions? I have before me the report of the National Munitions Control Board for the 4 months of January–April. This Board is required by law to give a license for every bit of munitions delivered to the agents of any foreign power. In those 4 months the licenses granted for shipments to England and Canada together amounted to a total of only a little more than $31,000,000.

The year 1939 was a year when everybody in Europe expected war, and in September it came. There was no embargo for the first 9 months, and none after it was repealed. The English had 10 months out of the 12 months to buy the planes, munitions, and war materials that they said they so much needed. How much did they buy? The fourth annual report of the National Munitions Control Board shows licenses issued for munition shipments to Great Britain in 1939 totaling $20,991,125.05. About enough to keep the war going for 15 minutes.

The Control Board's figures for May and June of this year, not yet completed, will show greatly increased purchases, running into the tens of millions. But the decisions of England came 8 months too late.

It is neither money nor credit that the Allies need. They have plenty of both. Credit will not help them any more than words.

Other critics write demanding that we send our men. But we have no guns, no uniforms, no tanks, no surgical supplies. To send our boys against Hitler today would be like sending a baby into the ring to fight Joe Louis.

It is easy to make speeches; it is easy to vote away the money of the American people. But neither words nor money are the present need. That need, as I said before, is production.

I hate all dictators.

I have agreed with the President that any and all materials we can send, including planes, without jeopardizing our national defense, should be dispatched at once. I have voted for every single item of national defense.

But the point I am emphasizing is that we are not prepared today to fight even a fourth-class war. I cannot yet see any circumstances under which I would vote to have this country, unprepared and unequipped, go into a foreign war. Our present job is not denunciation but production. The less we talk and the harder we work the better Hitler will understand. Distrust inflammatory speeches, my friends, and do everything you can to hurry the making of planes and more planes, ships and more ships, guns and more guns. The less Hitler hears from our politicians and the more he hears from our factories the better. Weapons are the only language he can understand.

ADDRESS OF HON. LOUIS JOHNSON, THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Honorable Louis Johnson, the Assistant Secretary of War, before the Harvard Business School Alumni Association, Eliot House, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., Friday, June 14, 1940:

LESSONS FROM ABROAD

Alumni of the Harvard School of Business Administration, I bring you greetings from your 46 Army alumni on duty in Washington, 11 of whom are serving on my own immediate staff. I am delighted to report that it is the consensus of opinion among Army leaders that the Government's policy in educating officers at this distinguished institution is indeed sound. The investment has brought rich dividends in national defense. The system will be continued.

The policy of sending officers to the Harvard School of Business Administration was inaugurated in 1924. Its purpose was to build up within the supply branches of the Army a pool of officers with special training in industrial methods and relations. In the last 15 years 110 Army officers have been graduated from the school.

Many of these officers, in turn, have served as instructors to their colleagues in the supply arms and services. They are the nucleus of the faculty at the Army Industrial College. In this school 50 to 60 officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps are annually assigned for a course of study to prepare them to deal with industry in the procurement of war supplies. This college follows not only the Harvard Business School approach to industrial problems, but also has the advantage of lectures and critcism from the Harvard faculty. Your school, in turn, has been influenced by the industrial-college curriculum. I am gratified to note that your far-seeing Dean Donham is taking steps to modify some of your courses to embody aspects of national defense as they affect business.

The principal duty of your Army alumni is to work on plans that will utilize to best advantage in an emergency the industrial resources of America. As far back as 1920, the importance of such planning was recognized by the Congress when it directed the Assistant Secretary of War to do the job. Studies were begun at once. Tentative plans were drawn up. Army graduates of the Harvard School of Business Administration and the Army Industrial College were put to work to edit, revise, and keep the plans up to date. Slowly there evolved a comprehensive plan designed to avoid the pitfalls of the past and prepare for the contingencies of the morrow.

Every year the plans have been subjected to the scrutiny of industrialists, labor leaders, college teachers, magazine writers, and Regular and Reserve officers of the Army and Navy, both of the line and staff. All comments, favorable and unfavorable, have been taken at face value. Time and again, the plans have been amended and have shaped themselves to changing conditions. They may not be perfect, but what human plan is? At any rate, all of the plans have been predicated on sound principles of business and government consistent with American traditions.

Let us analyze some of these principles. First, is an insistence upon the American way of doing things. Cooperation, not coercion, is the byword. While the right to self-preservation, inherent in all government, includes the power to compel obedience to the sovereign will, we always recognized that the resort to force in any form is a clear implication that methods have proved faulty. The power to compel existed in 1917–18, but it was used most sparingly. Industry cooperated then. Industry is cooperating now. There is no reason to feel that the cordial relationship built up between industry and the armed forces in the intervening years, especially with the aid of your Army alumni, who learned here the language and the psychology of business, would be destroyed in an emergency. The Army has full faith in industry's eagerness and readiness to cooperate in national defense. It has stricken out the possibility of compulsion except for most extreme cases.

The second principle is to disturb the peace economy as little as possible. We can meet the needs of a wartime program without extensive curtailment of all activities not immediately related to the production of munitions. Our plans consider not only Army and Navy needs but also those of the civilian behind the lines whose morale must be maintained. They do not propose wholesale sudden changes in our national economy. The 10,000 plants which will be called upon to carry the principal load of producing difficult military items have known for several years what is expected of them. There would be few surprises and sudden changes in their assignments. The transition from peace to war production industry will be able to make without explosive changes in its machinery and in its plants.

A third principle is to minimize additions to existing machinery of government. Every plan is predicated on the idea that existing Government agencies must be utilized to their fullest potentialities. Duplication is waste and waste is the enemy of efficient organization.

There are other principles which we followed in planning. The important point to note is that we have planned ahead of time. The European democracies did not. Germany did. When the war broke out England and France were not mobilized on the industrial front. Hitler's factories were. Let us hope that if an emergency is forced upon us we will be ready on the production line.

There is our most important lesson from abroad. A nation must have plans of campaign not only on the military but on the industrial front and they must be consistent with the temperament and the institutions of the country. We have a plan. May we never have to use it, but until an M day comes we must keep up our studies and our investigations with a view toward improving it. When the guns begin to shoot is a poor time for revision. Now is the time to declare a "blitzkrieg" on all bottle necks in the production of munitions and break them before any emergency is upon us. An America prepared on the industrial front will do more to discourage attack against us than perhaps any other single factor in our preparedness program.

England and France were not prepared to produce planes in quantity. Germany was. And in that fact alone we find the principal reason for heartbreaking defeats to one side and astounding victories for the other. In the field of aviation, both on the firing and on the assembly line, America has a very important lesson to learn from recent developments in Europe. Of its portents we have been forewarned for many years.

Thirty years ago James Allen, the chief signal officer of the Army, issued this warning to the American people:

"Military aviation is a subject which we must seriously consider whether we wish it or not, and the sooner this fact is accepted the better it will be for national defense."

In 1910 there were few, indeed, to heed such warning. Today there are none to question the influence of air power on national security.

As far back as 1917 many of the earlier war birds saw the future of aviation in its present development. They looked to a day when America would have an Air Corps second to none, backed by a strong civilian industry, capable of giving our armed forces what they need, when they need it, and in the full quantity desired. Today we are determined to achieve that very objective.

During the World War we gave a demonstration of what we can do on short notice. We began with 55 planes and ended with 22,000. We started with practically no engine capacity and wound up with 33,000. We entered the war with 35 pilots and had 35,000 pilots at the Armistice.

These developments were not accomplished without headaches and heartaches and many bitter disappointments. The American industrialist of that era was perhaps a bit overconfident about his capabilities. He felt that there was no job under the sun that he could not do and do efficiently in record time. All he asked for was money and a green light to go ahead.

In 1917 he got both. The staggering sum for those days—$640,000,000—was appropriated for the development of aircraft. Industry promised planes in short order. The American people began to look to the skies for prompt deliveries. The fighting men at the front prepared to receive them in great numbers. Tragic disillusionment followed. Days, weeks, months, and almost a full year went by before the appropriations were translated into fighting planes, trained pilots, engines, and accessories. It was only in the last months of the war that our aviation industry and our Air Service came to play an important role in battle.

On the other hand, that World War accomplishment should not be taken too lightly. To expand for an annual production of 50 planes per year to that of 23,000 is no mean achievement. What industry did in 1917–18 it can do now, and in much better time.

In 1917 the aircraft industry was in its youthful, struggling stage. Since then great progress has been made in plant expansion, in the training of skilled workmen, and in experiment and research. Despite the fact that the aircraft industry in this country in the intervening years has produced only about 46,000 airplanes, I, for one, am unwilling to say that the great aeronautical industry, supported by the ardent desire and enthusiastic effort of all our people and with the safety of our Nation at stake, cannot fill, in the immediate future, the order of the President of the United States. It may be tripling or quadrupling present capacity, but it can be done.

How to get up speed is largely a matter for the industry itself to work out, but I hasten to assure you that our Government is eager and ready to cooperate. Yes, it will take more machinery, more floor space, more skilled and semiskilled labor, but it will also take greater freedom in the negotiation of contracts between the armed forces and industry and more flexibility in the expenditure of funds. In the latter essentials toward speed-up, the Government itself must lead the way, and I assure you that we in the War Department will do all in our power to simplify and accelerate procurement procedure.

The chief impetus to speed-up must come from the continuous use of the tools and machinery already available in our factories. There are limits to the endurance of human beings but machines do not wear out readily. We must prepare to put on two shifts and even three shifts a day to the full 24-hour maximum and 7 days a week, 365 days a year.

Many of you read in public print a few days ago that Mr. Henry Ford stated he could produce 1,000 airplanes a day. Is that fantastic? Bear this in mind: In 1918 one airplane company had contracted with our Government to deliver 100 airplanes a day—100 planes a day 22 years ago. But, he added, it would be necessary, of course, to put airplane production on a standardized basis and employ automobile production methods. Obviously, if we are to produce airplanes in any such quantity, it is necessary for us to standardize our types and depart from the old system of hand-made aircraft. Standardization implies, of course, a freezing of design which may retard development but the point here is capacity to produce in mass; and no one familiar with the industrial history of our country would interpose a doubt about our possibilities in the aviation field.

It is no criticism to say that in the past airplanes have been largely hand-made. The orders which the civil air lines, the military services, and the flying public gave to the aircraft industry were not sufficient in number to make it profitable for the aircraft industry to tool up for automobile or mass-production methods. A production of 50,000 airplanes per annum will still be a small quantity as compared to the annual automobile requirements of this country. But, the leaders of the industry tell me that 50,000 planes will permit them to tool efficiently and economically for quantity production. And that is all that is required.

In Germany today, airplane production has passed the mark of 4,000 per month. Within the next 3 months it hopes to achieve a figure of 6,000 per month. Think of that—72,000 planes a year. Will any intelligent patriotic American tell me that we, in the United States, cannot equal Germany's effort? We have raw materials readily at hand far in excess of those obtainable by Germany. We have quantities of the critical items constituent to aircraft and engines in excess of those which Germany has been able to command. I believe that we have the skill in our workmen, the intelligence in our engineers and sufficient in quantity of both to attain a production exceeding Germany's maximum effort. Again, I repeat, we can reach the capacity demanded by the President and, moreover, we must do it.

Let me issue this warning. It is my firm conviction, after serious thought and study of what has taken place abroad in recent times, that if we cannot do it, the safety of this country indeed is in jeopardy. Airplanes have proven themselves engines of destruction far beyond expectation. Air forces have proven themselves in recent months to be controlling factors in the fortunes of war; and the fortunes of war, at the present stage in civilization, determine the freedom of nations.

The airplane is playing a dominant role on the battle front. Less than 2 years ago at Munich the full potentialities of air power were merely talked about. In Poland, less than a year ago, it became a deadly factor on the battlefield. In Norway, a few months ago, it came face to face with land and sea opposition and won a smashing victory over both. Today, on the Western Front, Germany's mighty air armada is pounding allied defenses and spreading havoc in all directions.

Air power may control our destiny. We must build our planes and train our men accordingly.

The training program that we expect to establish may be worthy of special consideration at this time. At present we are preparing to train 2,400 pilots in 2 years. This may not appear to be a very large figure but in all fairness it should be said that it is a fourfold expansion of the training program prior to 1939. The new program which we are planning today aims to reach an annual productive capacity of 7,000 pilots a year.

How shall we attain this objective?

1. We expect to expand the existing civilian schools to their full capacity and double their number.

2. We want to establish additional training centers similar to the one now at Randolph Field for basic and advanced flying training.

3. We hope to enlist approximately 12,000 cadets. This project involves the examination probably of 60,000 to 75,000 prospective candidates.

4. We intend to add and train 7,000 enlisted men to maintain the planes at the new Army training centers.

Finally we will be on the market for 800 primary-training planes, 800 basic-training planes, and 600 advance-training planes.

The training for the pilots will be divided into four phases and will cover a period of 36 weeks, as follows:

Ten weeks elementary training at civilian flying schools;

Ten weeks at the basic course;

Ten weeks for advanced training; and

Five weeks for specialized courses, leaving 1 week for travel between the various schools.

Concurrently with the training of military pilots, schools for bombardiers and navigators to the number of 3,600 will be maintained. Bombardiers will be salvaged from pilot training for one reason or another. It is generally expected that of the 5,000 candidates normally eliminated, 3,600 will voluntarily sign up for the bombardier's or navigator's course. These bombardiers and navigators will receive 10 weeks' instruction. Present plans are to commission them as second lieutenants after their classmates have received their commissions as pilots.

Classes entering the civilian elementary schools on May 18, 1940, we increased from 396 to 466. The class to enter on June 26 will be 605. The class to enter August 3 will go up to 900, and the complete military pilot training as outlined will begin with this class. The plan necessarily will require increases in instructors at both the civilian and military schools. It will require very little new construction for the training centers, as it is planned to use stations now occupied by units which will be moved to stations in the field. The high physical and mental standards required of flying cadets will, in the early stages, not be lowered. Traveling examining boards will visit all sections of the United States to examine applicants.

This program, of course, will cost money, and, based on our own history, more than any previous military expansion. It must be remembered, however, that, compared to other countries, we have only begun to build up our sinews of men and supplies.

What is an appropriation of approximately $4,000,000,000 to our American economy, which is running above $70,000,000,000 today? Contrast it, for instance, with what Germany is spending on its munitions. It is estimated that before 1939, 80 percent of her $40,000,000,000 economy went into the production of munitions.

Since then she has added the munitions of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Holland, Belgium, and their productive facilities, including such extensive works as the Skoda in Czechoslovakia.

Preparedness is the most important challenge to America today. We must achieve it at whatever cost is necessary. Extensive as our program may be today, it might become but a drop in the bucket with what we may have to pay if we do not utilize our brains, our energy, and our resources toward getting ready now.

It is unfortunate, indeed, that the airplane, with its promise of greater happiness and enjoyment to civilization, has now become perverted principally to a machine of destruction. There is nothing we can do about it, however, but to be prepared to meet its challenge, if ever it comes, with equal power of resistance.

Despite the emphasis I have just placed on aviation, I do not desire to give you the impression that it, and it alone, can achieve victory. We must not neglect any phase of our defense. We must strengthen ourselves on land, on sea, and in the air. We must get the best of weapons and equipment and train our men to use them to the best advantage.

In the last analysis, there is no substitute for the trained leader who can get the most out of his men and machines. Germany had a large number of highly disciplined men trained to handle their weapons and equipment under any and all circumstances. The Allies did not; and there is another reason for the difference in results.

We must not be led to believe that planes in mass or tanks in volume of their own accord will spell victory in battle. The men at the controls dominate the employment of the machines, and we must have enough of them among our professional Regular Army men fully trained for any emergency.

I have talked of lessons from abroad and I trust that the laboratory will always remain abroad—3,000 miles away. I hope no Harvard men nor any other American men will ever be called upon to take up arms in defense of our country, but if such a contingency arises, I know you will respond with characteristic patriotism.

For myself, I pray that the alumni and the undergraduates of Harvard and of all other colleges be saved for service for the betterment of American life and the perpetuation of American ideals under conditions of peace and prosperity.

The American Alien

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY FRANCIS BIDDLE, SOLICITOR GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Francis Biddle, Solicitor General of the United States, broadcast over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co., station WRC, from Washington, D. C., Sunday, June 16, 1940:

I am glad to have this opportunity tonight of speaking directly to my fellow Americans, to those who are citizens of the United States because they inherited that right by birth, or who have become citizens of this country by their own free choice. And I want to speak to people of other nationalities who are living among us, whom for lack of a better word we call aliens. I shall call them American aliens, foreigners who are making their homes here, but who are potential Americans.

Under our Constitution and laws the control of naturalization and immigration to this country is vested in the United States Government. Until recently those duties have been under the direction of the Department of Labor—probably because immigrants to this country were considered largely in relation to labor problems. The first great masses of people who came here from overseas were manual workers. They helped to build our highways, our railroads, and our cities.

For some time, as you know, President Roosevelt has been sending to Congress various plans calling for the reorganization of different branches of the Government. On May 22 he submitted a plan transferring to the Department of Justice the Immigration and Naturalization Services, including the border patrol. In a message explaining this transfer he said (I quote):

"The startling sequence of international events which has occurred * * * has necessitated a review of the measures required for the Nation's safety. * * * I am convinced that under existing conditions the immigration and naturalization activities can best contribute to the national well-being only if they are closely integrated with the activities of the Department of Justice."

This order of transfer was duly approved by Congress and took effect on June 14. The Attorney General of the United States has directed me to coordinate this work with other services of the Department of Justice—primarily the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Civil Liberties Bureau, and the recently organized Neutrality Unit. Lemuel B. Schofield, a major of infantry during the World War, and former Assistant District Attorney and Director of Public Safety in Philadelphia, has been appointed as a Special Assistant to the Attorney General to be administrative head of immigration and naturalization.

The Federal laws against espionage and sabotage apply alike to aliens and citizens. The Department of Justice is charged with the duty of detecting and apprehending all violators of those laws, whether citizens or aliens, and of prosecuting violators. In the case of a citizen, arrest and prosecution are the remedies. When aliens abuse our hospitality, there is a further remedy—deportation. The reorganization plan will enable the Government to deal more effectively and more promptly with alien violators of our laws because it will integrate all activities dealing with aliens in the Department of Justice, whose duty it is to enforce the law. The work of the border patrol, the immigrant inspectors, and the naturalization officers will be brought together but not merged, with the two Department of Justice units concerned with subversive activities—the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Neutrality Unit—which enforce the law and deal with lawbreakers, and with the Civil Liberties Division, which sees to it that the rights of individuals are not violated.

In the administration of the Immigration and Naturalization Service the policies of the Department of Justice will be dominated by two major objectives—the vigorous and effective enforcement of our laws and the full protection of the civil rights of all persons in the United States. Both these objectives were clearly recognized by the President. He said of this plan (I quote):

"While it is designed to afford more effective control over aliens, this proposal does not reflect any intention to deprive them of their civil liberties or otherwise to impair their legal status. This reorganization will enable the Government to deal quickly with those aliens who conduct themselves in a manner that conflicts with the public interest."

The tragedy to western civilization through which we have been living during these last terrible days has made us alive to the threat of espionage and treason within our democracy—a feared danger which we cannot see, but which we must be alert to discover and destroy before it is too late. The individual citizen, of course, feels powerless to combat this subversive evil, and the fear of "fifth column" activities has naturally made some sections of our population hysterical.

One form that this hysteria has taken is the wholesale denunciation of all aliens living in America—a confession of fear and weakness that sees a spy behind every foreign accent. Where individuals have taken the law into their own hands there have been instances of mob violence. A religious sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses, have been repeatedly set upon and beaten. They had committed no crime; but the mob adjudged they had, and meted out mob punishment. The Attorney General has ordered an immediate investigation of these outrages.

There is no cause for mass hysteria, no justification for mob violence. As a peaceful Nation we have, perhaps, been slow to realize the danger. But today we are all of us alive to the immediate threat. The Department of Justice is well equipped to recognize the real danger spots and to deal with them vigorously. With the cooperation of the American people the Justice Department will root out espionage and sabotage wherever it threatens. The people must be alert and watchful, and above all cool and sane. Since mob violence will make the Government's task infinitely more difficult, it will not be tolerated. We shall not defeat the Nazi evil by emulating its methods. As Thomas Jefferson said:

"I have ever deemed it more honorable and profitable too, to set a good example than to follow a bad one."

We are equipped to meet all dangers that come from within. Our laws are adequate to cope with those dangers, and if there is any point at which they prove inadequate we shall ask the Congress to strengthen them. For the enforcement of those laws the Federal Bureau of Investigation has a competent group of trained men. It has the cooperation of State and local police agencies throughout the country. In adequate laws and competent, loyal officers to administer them the American people place their reliance.

This transfer of immigration and naturalization activities to the Department of Justice has raised the question in the minds of a good many noncitizens as to whether it was effected with a view of making far more drastic the regulations governing their status in the United States. I have in mind particularly those refugees who have sought shelter with us from the horror of war and persecution in their own countries. Our policy must, of course, be worked out to fit the needs of a rapidly changing world, but I want to assure you that we shall not abandon the fundamental principles of American democracy which include a generous and just treatment to innocent sufferers from any country who have sought refuge with us.

The "footprints of the Trojan horse" are first found in the treacherous propaganda which leads to the ruthless persecution of minorities, and thereafter their purpose is to make us break down our American democratic insistence on freedom of speech, religious worship, and freedom of assembly by stirring up religious and racial hatred within the United States. Let me speak one familiar word of warning to all Americans. Remember, "a house divided against itself cannot stand." Do not let the subtle propaganda of race hatred turn you against any group in this country as a group. Remember that internal dissension is what the would-be "fifth column" hopes for. It weakens our inner strength.

Let me, in closing, return once more to what I said at the beginning. I do not like the sound of the word "alien." It is like a brand on the law-abiding foreigners who have come to America as the land of justice and opportunity for all. I prefer to think of them as American aliens, those people who have lived here in peace, whose children, born on our soil, are American citizens today. There is no necessary relationship between the length of time a man has been here and his loyalty to American institutions. A survey made recently in one of our States showed that 70 percent of the people belonging to families headed by aliens were American citizens. As one writer has put it, "Ellis Island is beginning to share honors with Plymouth Rock."

These American aliens have helped with their strength to build the physical and spiritual greatness of our Nation. They have shared with us the good and bad days of prosperity and poverty. The old people may speak only the language of their fatherland, they feel and dream our American aspirations. They are the Slavic-Americans who have created our empire of steel—rail and bridge and skyscraper, the Scandinavian-Americans whose industry and honesty have built up the great Northwest, the German-Americans whose ancient gentle culture still preserved here on our shores, the Italian-American stonemason, skilled artisan, artist—and those Italian-Americans, who, with torn hearts, have recently had courage to denounce the acts of a totalitarian dictatorship which they hate; the countless other races who have become a very part of it. It was of them, and others like them, that President Wilson said on May 10, 1915, in the early stages of the other Great War, when feelings were running high in this country, as they now are, addressing 5,000 of them who had been newly naturalized:

"This is the only country in the world which experiences this constant and repeated rebirth. * * * This country is constantly drinking strength out of new sources by the voluntary association with it of great bodies of strong men and forward looking women out of other lands. And so by the gift of the free will of independent people it is constantly being renewed from generation to generation by the same process from which it was originally created. It is as if humanity had determined to see to it that this great Nation, founded for the benefit of humanity, should not lack for the allegiance of the people of the world * * *."

The Department of Justice is dedicated to its name—to the task of justice. It is here to see that the rights of free speech, free worship, free assembly are not violated. It is here to apprehend those who would undermine our national life and security and destroy those rights. It is your safeguard of democracy.

Let's Keep Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 17 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY EDDIE RICKENBACKER

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker published in the June number of the American Legion magazine entitled "Let's Keep Out."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Legion Magazine for June 1940]

LET'S KEEP OUT

(By Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker)

With Denmark and Norway drawn into the spreading European war, which, as I write, seems also likely to engulf Belgium, Holland, Sweden, as well as other countries, there looms before us Americans the greatest question we, as a people, have faced since 1917.

Shall we go in?

Taking into account every known angle of the confused and complex situation in which the world finds itself today, we must still refuse, as we refused last September, to be dragged into this war—unless our national safety is imperiled.

Only 23 years ago we Americans entered the World War with a profound conviction that we were fighting for the preservation of democracy.

The close of the World War and subsequent events during these past 23 years have brought about the disillusionment and realization that the winner and the loser of such a conflict must suffer the consequences alike.

Our penalty, the same as that of other nations, was the complete disruption of our economic machinery, bringing about 10 years of depression—correctly named but grossly misunderstood.

There are millions still unemployed; billions of dollars are being paid in additional taxes; hospitals are still filled with thousands of veterans, wrecked mentally and physically, all of them once the flower of American manhood, someone's father, brother, or sweetheart, but each one of them some mother's son.

The cost to the world approximated $250,000,000,000. With this staggering sum we could have built homes, costing $2,500 each, on 5-acre plots of ground costing $100 an acre.

We could have equipped each of those homes with a thousand dollars worth of furniture and given such a home to every family in Russia, Italy, France, Belgium, Germany, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, England, Australia, Holland, and the United States of America.

In those lands we could have given to every community of 40,000 people or more a $2,000,000 library, a $3,000,000 hospital, and a $10,000,000 university.

And if we could have invested the balance that would have been left in a way that would have brought a rate of 5 percent annually, there would have been sufficient to pay an annual salary, of $1,000 each, to 125,000 school teachers and 125,000 nurses.

The cost to these United States—direct and indirect, continued up to date—has totaled approximately $47,000,000,000.

If we had placed this staggering sum into peacetime circulation we would not now have millions of unemployed, plus the direct loss of 50,000 men, and approximately 250,000 casualties.

Well could we rid ourselves, with this vast sum, of the slums of our great cities—the misery and poverty that go with them.

Well could we multiply our opportunities of education and culture, through additional, better, and larger institutions of learning.

Well could we afford, not one, but several airports in every large city.

Well could we rid ourselves of the inadequate highways, narrow streets, and the constant congestion in every city, large or small.

Well could we multiply our airways, expediting the transportation of mail, people, and merchandise to and from every hamlet in this country.

Well may we remember the forgotten statistics of the World War. Seventy-four million men mobilized; 10,000,000 killed; 3,000,000 maimed; 19,000,000 wounded; 10,000,000 disabled or incapacitated for the balance of their lives; 9,000,000 orphans; 5,000,000 widows.

In view of these startling facts, who could wish for our participation in another World War.

Certainly, it could not be the mothers with babes in their arms—nor the fathers, wrinkled and withered with age. Certainly, it could not be the middle-aged men and women with their vivid memories of 1914 to 1918. No; but it can be the lack of knowledge and understanding on the part of our youth, coupled with the selfishness and greed of a few.

Let us not permit our boys and girls to be regimented into uniforms, carrying wooden guns, almost from the time they leave the cradle, but preserve for them the game of marbles on the street corner.

Preserve for them the baseball game on the commons after school hours.

Preserve for them the opportunity for developing model airplanes and other happy pursuits.

Then, and then alone, need we never fear for men and women of character to carry on.

Let us realize a few more pertinent facts that have been forgotten or smothered by insidious propaganda, from those people in the old world and their agents in our land. There is no difference in the lack of reason for the war of today in the old world, than that which caused wars of past centuries.

The same selfish reasons of greed and hate are responsible for the present catastrophe. These same reasons—selfishness, hate, and greed—can well be responsible for our being involved again, in a war of destruction of property and mankind.

Certainly I feel no ill will toward the people of any of the belligerent countries, and my heart bleeds with sympathy for all of them. But this can be no justification to me for our involvement again, with its horrible consequences of the probable loss of millions of our young men and billions of our wealth.

In view of my record during the World War, such a statement may well be questioned.

But it was the very nature of my experiences that has brought to me the realization that American soldiers and billions of American dollars have no place on foreign soil. However, should this country ever be threatened with invasion by a foreign nation, or nations, I shall gladly offer my services, my two sons, and any worldly goods I may possess, to protect and guard our institutions.

It must further be remembered that, if this Nation becomes involved in the present European conflict, we should go into it with the full understanding that to be of any benefit it will mean keeping a standing army in the Old World for the next hundred years, as a military police force, to prevent a repetition of the 1914–18 war and the present one.

I am convinced, with this further understanding, that the people of the United States would never consent to such an additional penalty for their participation.

I am not a pacifist in any sense of the word. I believe in preparedness to insure against foreign invasion, by having, primarily, a peacetime aviation industry, developed through peacetime service, that will give us an adequate military aviation reserve, for defensive purposes only.

Regardless of who proves to be the victor in the present war overseas—remember always, both victor and vanquished will have completed their economic ruin for years to come. Consequently, we need never fear an early attack on our shores. In the meantime, it behooves the United States to establish her home defense.

With a strong navy and an air force of 50,000 pilots and 100,000 planes, no foreign government dare even think in terms of war against us, and if they should be so foolish, our people need have no fear of invasion.

With the moral fabric of the people of the Old World having collapsed, there can be only one result from this present conflict at its conclusion—no matter who wins.

With millions of the flower of their lands having been blown to bits or wrecked for life, with billions of dollars worth of their property having been destroyed, revolution and revolution alone will follow.

Wars are the stamping grounds for revolutions, and revolutions are the stamping grounds of communism. Let us guard against that happening here. With the vast improvement in destructive weapons, men, women, and children are being, and will be, destroyed 10 times as fast as during the World War. We, in America, in view of these prospects, may well recognize that our frontiers lie in the western hemisphere.

Let us develop our social, political, and commercial intercourse between our neighbors of the 21 republics to the south of us, for the best interest of all concerned.

Let us guard against our economic structure being keyed up through promises of false prosperity.

Let us recognize that selfishness, greed, and hate might well develop an unsound economic structure—the collapse of which no democracy can survive.

Let those who profit through the development of such unsound economic structures, and at the expense of other people's misery and mistakes—be they capitalists, politicians, or wage earners—bear in mind, that they are in a minority.

Let us maintain a sense of balance, in thought and activity, even though it may mean for the moment, less in worldly belongings.

Or, even let us keep in mind that we can well afford, through the maintenance of our absolute neutrality, to suffer even the consequences of lowering our standard of living, for a short period of time, to prevent happening here what is happening in the Old World.

Let us realize that the obligation of our leadership, be it capitalistic, political, or social rests heavily on our shoulders in these trying times.

We, who live in the land of abundance and liberty, should be willing, through peacetime service and accomplishment, to maintain these liberties and independence—to prevent bankruptcy and starvation here.

Today this country stands united, with few exceptions, in the major issue that is before us, namely—

KEEP US OUT OF THIS WAR

Our true obligation is not only the destiny of our own children, but all the children of America, who will be set back a hundred years in their opportunities, as well as the growth of American life, if we participate in this war in Europe.

And we of the general public have a right to call upon our statesmen—regardless of party or creed—to hold this country resolute to the one great issue, of keeping us out of this war.

Some ask, "Why this war of words and nerves?" as compared with the war of 1914–18. It must be remembered that for years prior to 1914 both sides knew whose side who was on, with very few exceptions. In other words, both sides had their duplicate ducks in a row. That was not true in September 1939 and it is not true today but it probably will be soon. The war may well see mankind and property destroyed on a scale unknown in history.

For years past the totalitarian states have thought only in terms of building up their military and economic reserves to be prepared for the day.

This is evidenced by the fact that all belligerents are limiting their purchases throughout the world to a degree that makes them insignificant by comparison with the squandering of billions during 1914–16 for military supplies.

How fortunate are we that this is true, for it has prevented the mushrooming of our industries and commerce on a foundation of stilts and sand.

Blessed are we that this Nation still has most of the generation of industrialists, financial and business men living and in business, who suffered the penalty of greed and selfishness during the early days of the last war.

They have not forgotten the price they paid during 1920–21, and particularly from 1929 to date for that greed and selfishness.

This fact, I implore the leaders of this Nation—financial, industrial, and commercial, as well as political—to well remember. It is the most practical asset we have in keeping out of this war.

Fortunate are we to have most of that generation of mothers, wives, sweethearts, and sisters still with us who suffered the heartaches and headaches of seeing their men—the flower of youth—torn from their bosoms—never expecting to see them again.

May I implore them to remember those deadly days of 1916, 1917, and 1918? Here, too, we have a great asset—an emotional asset—of untold value that must help to keep us out of this war.

To you leaders of finance and industry, well may you remember that this country's national debt was only $1,000,000,000 at the start of the World War, and well may you remember that today we have a national debt of approximately $50,000,000,000.

The war of 1914–18 cost this Nation $47,000,000,000, and due to the improved deadliness of methods and weapons since the World War, the rapidity of destruction of both mankind and property will be many times greater—meaning that should this Nation be forced into this war it would cost us another $100,000,000,000.

This will leave us with a national debt of $150,000,000,000 when peace is declared, all of which means the dollar will be worth very little and the clothes on your back may be your only assets.

Particularly will this be true in view of the fact that all the belligerents were financially stable at the start of the World War, whereas by comparison they are bankrupt today.

Bear in mind when peace is declared (and that day is as sure as death and taxes), with forty to fifty millions of men being thrown back into productive effort, and their countries' treasuries and pantries being empty, men will become serfs and slaves for the sake of three meals a day, and a place to rest their weary bodies at night.

This will mean one simple fact—that their ability to produce commodities and products for export at prices so low it will eliminate the possibility of this Nation having even a semblance of our present export trade left.

It will bring about a depression in this country that will jar our teeth loose and make the depression of 1929 to date a mimic affair by comparison.

Who dare say with a debt of $150,000,000,000 that the youth of this Nation will accept such obligations in the future for the mistakes of the past?

Inflation, and inflation alone, will follow as it did in Germany during those disastrous years from 1921 to 1926.

We have heard some of our experts—in spite of the facts—still belittle the deadliness and the possibilities of aviation in wartime. The facts should make all of us cringe with horror, even though this new weapon of destruction has only been experimented with to date.

Realize, that, in spite of the Polish air force, which was considered relatively good, the superior air force of Germany was able to ruin it within 48 hours, after hostilities started in the undeclared war.

Wave after wave of German bombers destroyed airdromes, hangars, and reserves, and blotted out the eyes of their Army in the trenches. Then it was a simple matter for the Germans to cut the arteries of supplies and communications behind the armies at the front by destroying highways, railroads, and bridges, shutting off reserve troops—ammunition, food, and medical supplies for those at the front. Warsaw and many other cities have been ruined for years to come.

Witness what has happened to that gallant little nation of Finland by those hordes of Russian eagles. Cities were wiped out for all time to come and today, what was a little land of happy people is a nation of misery.

When war in the air is started in reality between the major belligerents, I doubt whether you and I, who have seen Paris, Berlin, London, and many other centers of interest and culture in the Old World, will be able to recognize them the next time we see them.

The startling fact is, that even though this new weapon has been used only experimentally as a feeler of each other's defenses, that so many of those trying have reached their objectives.

With waves of 100 to 200 bombers protected by high-speed pursuit planes attacking their objectives every hour of the day and night, the carnage and destruction will be horrible.

With high explosive bombs, incendiary bombs, and gas bombs being dropped on those large centers by the hundreds of thousands, those cities may well be destroyed and burnt up.

With the destruction of the water system of large cities, the heat, light, power, gas, and sewerage systems, disease and pestilence will cause plagues beyond our imagination.

With thousands of planes and pilots on both sides by comparison with a few hundred during the World War, and three or four times as deadly and effective—with hundreds of thousands of anti-aircraft guns by comparison with a few hundred and many times more accurate than those used during the World War, the mortality rate in aerial warfare will be terrific.

And in my opinion, within 90 days after warfare in the air truly starts, the reserve of planes and pilots on both sides will be exhaused, meaning that the belligerents, whose productive capacity of planes and, primarily, of pilots is the best, eventually will be the victor.

But, in the meantime, they will revert to the trench and dugout warfare resulting in a war of attrition.

So I say to you, no matter what the price may be that this Nation has to pay to stay out of this war, it can never be too big, because no matter how large it may be, in economic, social, and political warfare, to say nothing of our so-called national honor, it would be only an infinitesimal part of the price we would have to pay if we should participate.

In closing, may I utter this fervent prayer?—that this generation, in its wisdom and mature consideration of this question of absolute neutrality, will prevent posterity or future generations, from condemning or indicting us, as having legalized wholesale slaughter, murdered the flower of our youth, and massacred democracy.

False Hopes Are Cruel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of the Allies who are fighting so valiantly, false hopes may well cause the death of many of their brave soldiers and citizens and the destruction of their cities and countrysides. False hopes already created may have already done so. From our own standpoint the creation of these false hopes and their subsequent unfulfillment can only cause a great animosity toward us on the part of the Allies who see that these glittering generalities, which high officials of our Government have uttered, are totally devoid of content and meaning. We cannot justly criticize France and Great Britain for resenting the fact that they may have been pawns in the third-term "blitzkrieg." We cannot criticize our friends across the seas if they bitterly resent the public and private pronouncements by our Chief Executive of a policy of redoubled help which his own inefficiency has rendered physically impossible of execution at this time.

The editorial from the Washington Post, June 17, 1940, follows:

FALSE HOPES ARE CRUEL

The administration's policy regarding the war in Europe was clarified in some degree by President Roosevelt's reply to Premier Reynaud of France. At Charlottesville the President had pledged the United States to "extend to the opponents of force the material resources of his Nation." His message to M. Reynaud was even more emphatic in promising aid to the Allies. But he also pointed out that his statement carried "no implication of military commitments."

Two purposes appear to have inspired this safeguarding clause. No doubt the President wished to allay the fears of critics who believe that he is leading the United States close to the brink of war. And he probably wished to warn the French against expecting unlimited aid from the United States. It is questionable, however, whether his message accomplished either purpose.

Taken as a whole, the cable to M. Reynaud gives assurance to the French that, as long as they continue to fight, "materials and supplies will be sent them from the United States in ever increasing quantities and kinds." Actually the President has no authority to make such commitments. American ships are forbidden by the Neutrality Act to carry supplies to belligerents. Should Allied shipping prove inadequate to the task of transporting American war supplies abroad, the President's pledge would break down.

It is well to remember that the Allies are now purchasing and hauling away in their own ships all the supplies obtained from the United States. When and if their cash is exhausted this supply of American equipment will be cut off, unless Congress modifies the Johnson Act. President Roosevelt's message to the French premier might easily be interpreted as a pledge to grant the Allies credit when and if they need it. Here again his promise appears to have outrun his authority.

Loose assertions of this sort do not serve the interests of either the United States or the Allies. On the one hand, they encourage opposition to the American policy of permitting the Allies to obtain valuable war materials here. The American people are overwhelmingly in sympathy with the allied cause. But they are also overwhelmingly opposed to participation in the war. There is real danger that vague commitments on the part of the President, which seems to ignore this other facet of American policy, may retard the program of aiding the Allies within the framework of legislation now on the books or on the way toward approval.

Last week former Governor Landon criticized the implication in Mr. Roosevelt's Charlottesville speech that recent events have brought this country nearer to a state of belligerency. "It would be cruel, indeed," he said, "to arouse false hopes in nations that are fighting for their existence." On Saturday night Colonel Lindbergh sharpened the point by saying: "We have been doing to England and France what they did to Abyssinia, to Czechoslovakia, to Poland, to Finland, and to Norway. We have encouraged them to hope for help we cannot send."

The plain truth, of course, is in accord with Mr. Landon's statement that "Congress has not the slightest notion of declaring war." Natural sympathy, as the Republican leader says, is wholly with the Allies. Public opinion also favors "going the limit for national defense." But it would be very misleading to conclude from this conjunction that any sizable or important element is actively favoring American entry into the war.

The last Gallup poll on the subject, released the end of May, showed a 13-to-1 majority against this course. If there has been any pronounced change in the attitude then revealed it has not reflected itself in any clear-cut congressional action. Opinion in that body certainly favors all aid to the Allies which is not fundamentally inconsistent with maintenance of neutrality. But more than that cannot be claimed.

The Allies' predicament today stems from overindulgence in false hopes. Certainly the United States cannot ease the distress of other democratic countries by extending the fog of illusions. It is time to look realities in the face. And that requires a clearer distinction than has yet been drawn between the material aid we are able to give the Allies and any thought of American participation in the war.

Congress Should Stay On the Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS D. WINTER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, there perhaps has never been a more critical time in the life of our Nation than the present. With civilization in the Old World tottering on the brink of destruction, with war hysteria rapidly engulfing the New World, and with our own Nation suffering with a bad case of the "jitters," we, who have been chosen to represent the people of this Nation, should keep our feet firmly on the ground and not lose sight of the fact that our responsibility at this time is just as great as that of the President's; that the fate of many lives and the future security of this Nation rests in our hands, and depends almost entirely on the action this Congress takes; and we should remain in session and refuse to further abdicate our constitutional rights and obligations to the Chief Executive. And I, for one, consider the President's statement that the situation did not require Congress to remain in session except for the laudable goal of delivering speeches as a direct insult to the constituents whom I represent.

Mr. Speaker, my constituents do not want Congress to stay in session for the "laudable goal of making speeches," but they insist that Congress stay in session for the sacred purpose of keeping the United States out of war and for the further purpose of preventing the New Deal dictator, who has arrogated to himself nearly all the prerogatives of the Congress, from playing politics with our national-defense program.

The President's desire to have Congress adjourn can mean only that having obtained all the authority and money he thinks he needs he should not be hampered or bothered with the legislative branch of the Government, the direct representatives of the people of the Nation, interfering with his hope to gain a free hand to use his almost unlimited emergency powers as he alone sees fit and, incidentally, to obtain such political advantage as may be had by getting rid of Congress.

Freed of congressional restraint, there is hardly anything the President cannot do, short of declaring war, under the vast emergency powers already given him. Few persons realize how far-reaching is the authority now held by the President. Early in the Roosevelt administration Congress began delegating emergency powers to the Chief Executive, not one of which has ever been relinquished.

The President now wants Congress to delegate to him the power to mobilize the National Guard, if the present Congress is not in session, and in his opinion an emergency exists. Article I, section 8, clause 15, of the Constitution of the United States specifically states that—

> The Congress shall have the power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion.

If an emergency now exists which is so great that it has caused the President to feel that Congress should surrender to him its constitutional power and authority to call our reserve forces to the colors, why does the President desire that Congress adjourn?

Could it be a desire to capitalize on the effects of the war in an effort to cover up the failure of the New Deal to solve our acute domestic problems, or does the Chief Executive feel that the people of the Nation, who sent us here and are paying our salaries, are not entitled to have their representatives on the job to question his wisdom should the occasion demand.

Why, in the face of the present war crisis, fancied or real, should Congress adjourn? The answer is plain. Regardless of the President's desire, Congress should not adjourn until the emergency has passed. Congress is more than ever before needed on the job, and adjournment now would mean that Congress could not again meet until the next regular session of the Seventy-seventh Congress unless the Chief Executive saw fit to call the Seventy-sixth Congress into extraordinary session. And, in the light of the President's attitude on adjournment and his disposition to ignore Congress whenever possible, we cannot expect to be called into extraordinary session except to authorize some new legislation which the President might personally seek or unless it becomes necessary to consider a war resolution.

Practically every Congressman's mail is heavy with demands from the people back home, to whom we are responsible, to remain in session and do all in our power to keep the United States out of war, and how can we do this job by adjourning and deserting our posts merely to bow to the will of the Chief Executive?

Adjournment by Congress at this critical time can only be regarded by our constituents as a false betrayal of the responsibility and trust placed in us by the American people. Only a few weeks ago, in his message to Congress on national defense, the President stated that Congress and the Chief Executive constituted a team pulling together for the security of America. With unforeseen emergencies certain to arise from the war in Europe to which our Government must of necessity instantly adjust itself that team should not be unhitched and the congressional half turned into the pasture of adjournment.

Harrison-Colmer Bill Should Pass Before Congress Adjourns

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, World War developments should not cause us to overlook domestic problems. There is much talk about adjournment or recess of Congress. I am opposed to such procedure. I think the administration needs the advice and help of Congress in the development of a national-defense program. Congress also needs to give attention to many domestic conditions that require action at this session.

Pending before the House and the Senate are the Harrison bill (S. 1717) and its companion bill in the House, the Colmer bill (H. R. 4833). Let me urge Members of Congress to study these measures. They are fully explained in the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, Congressman COLMER, which appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 27, 1939. In connection with these remarks there is a table showing numerous congressional districts to be interested in these bills. A study of these tables, prepared by Paul W. Nelson, County Auditor of Lake County, Two Harbors, Minn., will show exactly the way the bills would operate if enacted into law.

REASONS FOR RELIEF

The traditional policy of the United States Government is to pay no taxes on lands it acquires for its own use. Such land is removed from the local tax rolls, and the revenue lost to the local municipalities. This rule applies to lands bought by the United States Forest Service. For years the United States Forest Service has been acquiring large acreages of land all over the United States wherever a national forest was located.

In my district there are two national forests, and without going into details, let me say that this policy of the Government has almost ruined several municipalities. The more land the United States Forest Service buys, the less revenue the municipalities have to carry on local government. All school officials will show that this Government policy makes it difficult for them to carry on educational work. Other municipal officials who have to administer local government, including the building and upkeep of roads, tell the same story. It can probably be called humor, for the United States Government gets the use and benefit of these very roads.

PURPOSE OF LEGISLATION

The Harrison-Colmer bills are intended to adopt a new policy on the part of our Government. They substitute for the old policy, that the Government pays no taxes, a new program which requires the Government to contribute to the local municipalities certain payments to replace the taxes that have been lost. It is high time that we recognize this new principle. There is no valid reason why the Government should not make contributions. Briefly, this legislation requires that the Government pay a sum equal to 3 percent of the purchase price of the land acquired by the Government. This would bring revenue to the local treasuries to replace that lost when the Forest Service took land off the tax rolls.

From time to time Members of Congress from different sections have introduced legislation along similar lines. Their bills would accomplish the same results as the Harrison-Colmer bills. All of us should support the bill that has had study by the United States Forest Service and to which the least objections can be made. I support the Harrison-Colmer bill for that reason.

Responsibility for the failure of this legislation will rest squarely upon the Secretary of Agriculture and the administration. The administration is in control, both in the House and in the Senate. They have the votes to pass the bill. There is no excuse for the long delay. I hope that before adjournment the administration will get a different viewpoint and help us to obtain needed relief for various counties and districts, including our northern Minnesota municipalities.

Our Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WEST VIRGINIAN

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, as an extension of my remarks, I herewith include an article printed in the West Virginian, of Fairmont, W. Va., under date of June 14, 1940:

OUR FLAG

(By Harry E. Leeper)

"The oppressed of the earth to that standard shall fly
Wherever its folds shall be spread;
And the exile shall feel 'tis his own native sky,
Where its stars shall float over his head;
And those stars shall increase till the fullness of time
Its millions of cycles has run;
Till the world shall have welcomed its mission sublime,
And the nations of earth shall be one."

—George Washington Cutter.

In this time of world-shaking events it is the patriotic duty of every American citizen to uphold to the fullest extent the American ideals of democracy. Our flag is the symbol of national unity, "One nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

The following tribute by an eminent West Virginian, Benjamin Butcher of Wood County, epitomizes what every real American thinks of his flag, his symbol of democracy:

"There floats over your head the American flag, your flag and my flag, our country's flag—that flag that stands for liberty everywhere, for every home and fireside in the land. It is the most beautiful flag ever fashioned by mortal hands. Its stripes—red as patriot blood could paint them, white as woman's tears could wash them; its field as blue as Heaven's own arch that bends above us, and set with its galaxy of brilliant stars, one single star that glitters to the sovereignty of each State in this Union and 48 stars glittering all together for the glory of this Republic, and I wouldn't trade it for all the flags of all the monarchies that ever existed since the world began."

It is the duty of every American citizen to respect his flag and the ideals which it symbolizes. And if necessary defend it with his life.

How England Has Scrapped Treaties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN, NEW YORK, JUNE 1, 1940

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a recent editorial published in the Gaelic American, of New York City, under the title, "How England Has Scrapped Treaties." I commend this editorial to the Members of the present Congress in view of the hysteria now spreading throughout the country, that we ought strip our national defense by giving unlimited aid to the Allies, so-called, especially Great Britain, now that France has surrendered in the present European war.

[From the Gaelic American, New York, June 1, 1940]

HOW ENGLAND HAS SCRAPPED TREATIES

A great deal has been said and written recently on broken treaties between nations. The breaking of treaties is, however, nothing new, as the world is strewn with their corpses. The breaking of the Washington Naval Treaty, the scrapping of the Nine-Power Treaty by Japan, and the violation of the Balfour Declaration have been denounced in all the moods and tenses. As long as human nature is what it is treaties will be regarded as mere scraps of paper. It is a truism that treaties are made with the intention of repudiating them when the opportunity presents itself.

America, before she became a world power, had at various times accused England of her disregard of solemn treaties between the infant republic and the monarchy. Because of her disregard of treaties, England has been called "perfidious Albion." She never kept any treaty longer than it was to her advantage to ignore or denounce it. Her various treaties with the Irish were regarded by her as mere scraps of paper.

Americans are pretty well informed on England's disregard of treaties. She broke so many solemn agreements between herself and the United States when she found it to her advantage to violate the signed pact that the Americans regard her with suspicion. John Bigelow's Breaches of Anglo-American Treaties, published in 1917, refers as follows to treaty violations by England:

During the 130 years between 1783 and 1913, about 30 separate and distinct compacts that may be considered as treaties were concluded between the two powers (United States and England). Of these 30 treaties, the following 8 (about 1 in 4) were violated by Great Britain, several of them in more than one particular:

1. Definite Treaty of Peace, 1784.
2. Jay Treaty, 1795.
3. Treaty of Ghent, 1815.
4. Rush Bagot Agreement, 1818.
5. Convention respecting fisheries, 1819.
6. Convention for Indemnity, 1823.
7. Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, 1850.
8. Treaty of Washington, 1871.

England has always been notorious for her evasion of treaties. President Buchanan, in 1857, in his first message to Congress, said:

It has been our misfortune almost always to have some irritating, if not dangerous, outstanding question with Great Britain.

Since the origin of the Government we have been employed in negotiating treaties with that power and afterwards in discussing their true intent and meaning.

To quote again from John Bigelow's book, he refers as follows to England's way of reading her own meaning into treaties:

"With no other nation have we had so much trouble in understanding our treaty stipulations as we have had with Great Britain. It is an old strategem of diplomacy for a powerful state, negotiating with a comparatively weak one, to make the terms equivocal, and when the convention is ratified, to impose its own construction of it upon the other party."

In one of the debates over the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, Senator Mason, of Virginia, said (February 20, 1856):

"I think whoever has read this correspondence (relative to the interpretation of the treaty) will have been struck with the fact that so far as it was conducted on the part of the American Government, plain, ordinary, explicit terms were used to express an explicit and plain meaning; and that the meaning of the American Government cannot be misunderstood, whereas on the part of the Minister who conducted the correspondence on the part of the British Government (Lord Clarendon) if you attempt to get at the meaning of England, you will fall and find yourself involved in a maze of confused sentences, indeterminate and vague expressions, in which there is no distinct assertion of title drawn from any distinct source."

A recent striking example of the scrapping of treaties, was the tearing of the infamous Versailles Pact. England, when it suits her purpose, dilates on the sacredness of treaties in spite of her long and bad record in this respect. This widespread disregard of treaties should be a warning, if warning is needed, to keep the American people from making treaties with the Old World nations who have no regard for solemn contracts, oral or written. Washington's warning against foreign alliances is as applicable today as in the early years of the Republic when its population was scattered and did not exceed 3,000,000 souls. America has become a giant among nations by her almost scrupulous observance of keeping aloof from foreign entanglements.

Adjournment of Congress Now Tantamount to Repudiation of Oath To Faithfully Discharge Our Duties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 14, 1940

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is no sane reason why this Congress should adjourn now and go home.

When we came to Congress each of us raised our hands and swore that we would "well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter."

What official duties await any of us back home in our respective districts?

Our duty to the people who elected us is here in the National Capital—the opinion of the Chief Executive to the contrary notwithstanding.

There is nothing in the Constitution or in our oath of office which provides that Congress should lease to the President its duties during an emergency.

Processes for the reconvening of a Congress should be considered. If this Congress adjourns sine die, as the President has been urging, there is no way under the sun for us to reconvene except on the call of the President. He and he alone has the power to convene Congress, except on the date specified in the Constitution. If we adjourn, only a Presidential order can call us back before January. No matter how great the emergency, we could not of our own will reassemble.

The President's insistence on adjournment of Congress at this grave moment in the history of the world is comparable to the quarterback on a football team telling the center to pass him the ball and then ordering the guards, tackles, ends and center to leave the field and sit in the bleachers while he alone attempted to carry the ball unassisted.

Mr. Roosevelt's New Deal doctors have been pretty lucky in taking the public pulse in the past but they missed their diagnosis when they thought the country would take kindly to the idea of giving vast powers to the President and then having him send Congress home. The country does not agree with Mr. Roosevelt on his idea to adjourn Congress.

THE LEGION SPEAKS

I have just received a telegram from an American Legion post in my district which shows how the veterans of the last war feel about this Congress shirking its duties now and leaving Washington with national affairs shifted to the shoulders of one man, the President. With your consent I read it into the RECORD. It follows:

POST RAY I. BOOTH 101, AMERICAN LEGION,
Greenville, Mich., June 13, 1940.

Hon. FRED L. CRAWFORD,
Washington, D. C.

My post of the American Legion earnestly requests that Congress remain in session during present critical emergency.

WALTER K. WARD,
Commander.

From a farm couple in my district I have received a letter which shows how seriously the farm folk of this country are thinking about this crisis and the possibility of Congress abandoning its duties. Their letter follows:

ELSIE, MICH., June 10, 1940.

Hon. FRED L. CRAWFORD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: These are days when cool heads and steady hands are needed in Washington.

My idea is that one of the best ways to spend money for national defense is to keep Congress in session.

We of the Eighth District depend upon and trust you and others like you in this most critical time.

Respectfully yours,

Mr. and Mrs. ALTON FIZZELL.

WHAT ABOUT WAR PROFITEERING?

Appropriating huge sums of money, hiking the debt limit $4,000,000,000, and increasing taxes for an indefinite program labeled "national defense" without any well-drawn defense plan presented to explain what we are going to defend, is not the end of the duty now resting upon Congress.

We should stay here to see that these funds are used for the kind of defenses the people want. We should demand a well-formed national-defense program and appropriate the money for it as that program is formulated, and then at the same time levy taxes to carry out that defense so that our people will know what defense their money is going into.

Much has been said about war profiteering but what has this Congress done to prevent profiteering in the huge appropriations that have been made? We have only scratched the surface.

Who knows whether our laws are sufficient to cope with the much discussed "fifth column" in the United States, in a time of emergency? Congress should stay here and be prepared to instantly grapple with that threat, which we admit exists here.

These are "blitzkrieg" days. World situations are changing so rapidly the President should not gamble on having time to assemble Congress in event of emergency. Days would be involved in calling this body back together. Hours and minutes are what count in situations such as this.

To adjourn Congress now would be tantamount to a repudiation of our oath of office to faithfully discharge our duties.

Surveying the letters I have received from my district—and I have not had a letter urging adjournment of Congress—I find that the people of my district want us to stay on the job here. We begged the people to send us to Washington in November 1938. Why leave now when there is work to be done?

Typical of the expressions I have received from my district is an editorial in my home-town newspaper, the Saginaw Daily News. I appreciate the unanimous consent which the House has given me to present it here that you may know the sentiment in the territory I represent.

LET CONGRESS STAY

There is understood to be more than a smattering of Republican sentiment for Congress to stay in session—at least over the summer. The idea has its merits.

Still a great number of politically minded Congressmen want to go home and strengthen their relations with the voters. According to the Capitol's usually reliable gages of sentiment, this number forms a majority.

It is too bad the legislators can't forget about campaigning this once and go on sawing wood. It is too bad that party conventions and elections can't be held with Congress in Washington. It is too bad that the people themselves can't do without baby kissing and oratory this year and be trusted to elect the right men for the right jobs.

There are a great number of arguments why Congress should stay where it is. A new tax bill should be passed to pay for increased military expenditures. The old bugbear against new taxes in an election year is off. It may be more unpopular not to levy taxes in this case.

Definite provision should be made for the Alaskan and Pan-American highways. These are defense measures which should not wait, not even for a few months.

The European situation cannot be predicted 24 hours in advance. The rise of any morning's sun may look upon a completely unforeseen set of circumstances. Congress should be around to look after the interests of the people. Its presence should have a steadying and reassuring influence on the executive department in the days ahead.

"Fifth Column" Must Go

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the news dispatches of June 2, 1940, from the city of New York reporting the program of the Communist Party Convention is enough to give pause to every thoughtful American in these trying days. At this Communist convention, Earl Russell Browder, America's No. 1 link with Soviet Russia, was nominated to the position as Communist candidate for President of the United States.

These proceedings of this convention were broadcast over radio network throughout the width and breadth of the Nation and the public heard the applause when the name of this man Browder, a convict with a 4-year sentence for un-American activity, was placed in this position. A stranger attending would have thought that he was in Moscow in the heart of "red" Russia as he stood on the floor of the convention and heard the shouts of support.

America's "fifth column"—the bund and the Communist—is active, defiant, and arrogant. Any doubt regarding this was removed by listening to the speech of this arch-Communist Earl Browder and to the thunderous applause which greeted his every treasonable word.

The "fifth column" is even more dangerous here in America than it is in Europe. Why do I say this? The German Bund works now under cover—since Germany is engaged in war. The Communists work as a national political organization, with an actual balloting strength in 1936 of 80,000 votes. It claims to have 10 times this many supporters in America today as 2 years ago.

Communists and Nazis in America are spies for their respective governments just as they were spies in France, Holland, Norway, Finland, Belgium, and England. This spying in America must stop.

Congress has taken some steps to stop this alien activity, but Congress has not yet gone far enough. We have transferred, at the request of the President, the Bureau of Immigration from the Labor Department to the Department of Justice. This was desirable and should help in this fight. The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARTIN DIES, of the Dies un-American activities committee, has urged the formation of a "fifth column" council, such a committee to be made up of level-headed, fair-minded men, lest there be persecutions instead of prosecution. The registration and fingerprinting of every alien in America is an absolute essential to safety. This important work should be handled carefully and methodically under skillful direction. It should be left to one of the greatest men in his specialty in America, J. Edgar Hoover.

At the present time the Federal Bureau of Investigation has a force of only 150 men to stamp out communism and nazi-ism among 130,000,000 people. The number of complaints reaching the Department of Justice concerning un-American activity has increased to an astounding extent. Last week, May 28, 1940, 147 complaints from New York City alone reached the F B. I., and a large number have been sent in from the Fourth Congressional District. Several thousand complaints from all parts of the country are now reaching Washington. More men should be provided to enforce our laws against un-American activity.

In this trying time, with the world literally on fire, we have no time to waste upon those who seek to undermine our institutions. Any political party having such motives should be stamped out promptly and without hesitation. Its members must be taught either to support our Government or to leave our land.

Letters of the Secretary of Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. HOOK
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 17, 1940

LETTERS FROM THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters written by the Secretary of Agriculture to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]:

MAY 3, 1940.

Hon. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: Hon. MARVIN JONES has called to my attention H. Res. 472, which you introduced in the House of Representatives April 25, and has requested that I furnish you the information you are seeking. This I am glad to do.

Before answering in detail the questions you have raised, let me say that the anniversary farm dinners did not originate with this Department, and this Department had no official connection with them, and that Department funds were not expended in promoting or conducting the dinners. There was widespread interest among farmers in this celebration, and some of them who had been elected committeemen in the Triple A program quite naturally assisted in making arrangements, but they did this entirely unofficially and not as a part of their Triple A duties.

Now let me answer your questions specifically.

1. The Department of Agriculture did not nor did any officer, agent, or employee authorize, incur, or pay any expenditure in connection with the farm anniversary dinners, Friday, March 8, 1940.

2. No instructions went out prior to the 9th day of March 1940 from the Department of Agriculture nor from any official agent or employee of the Department directing anyone to hold these meetings. It was generally understood among officials in contact with the field employees that these widely publicized dinners were events with which the Department employees could take no official part. No instructions were issued because it was felt unnecessary in view of the fact that the departmental policy has always been clear on such matters.

3. No compensation was paid to county agents, county committeemen, or any persons connected with the agricultural program for assisting in arranging for the meetings commemorating this anniversary.

4, 5, and 6. I find that no official instruction went to Allegan County, Mich., with reference to arrangements for community meetings commemorating this anniversary. In reference to your constituent's letter, which you placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 25, we have communicated with the agricultural conservation program committee, Allegan County, and have learned that the matter of dinners was mentioned briefly and entirely incidentally during a meeting of township and county committeemen called to transact regular administrative business early in March.

I quote from a statement supplied the Agricultural Adjustment Administration by Clarence Swanebeck of the Michigan State A. A. A. office:

"Concerning the charge that committeemen in Allegan County spent a day canvassing the territory in regard to the A. A. A. anniversary dinner, while they were being paid $4 per day to work on the program: They had a meeting about March 1 in this county but didn't have all the men in; talked on 403's. (Form NCR 403 is officially titled 'Farm Plan for Participation in the 1940 Program,' and is the basis for eligibility of farmers to receive payments.) They had 5,861 403's to be completed as of March 1, and on March 1 they called all these community committeemen in. They took up the minutes of the meeting, parity payments, everything that a farm reporter could take up. They don't know exactly how many were in at this meeting, but there were not anywhere near 72 committeemen.

"At this meeting they had a farmer, Walter Whiteman, Fennville, Route 2, Republican by politics, and chairman of the dinner committee, appear at 10 a. m. Mr. Whiteman left at 10: 25. Took about 25 minutes of the time telling about what he was planning to do about the dinners in that county.

"They went on with the regular work the rest of the day. These men went out and worked on 403's; 72 committeemen, total of all committeemen in the county. Not all of them were at the meeting, as the county committee had to contact them to see if they were willing to work. They were paid in that county only for work on the 403's. The latter part of February and until after the dinner on March 8, just getting a nice start on 403's; about 10 percent done at the time of the meeting.

"If there is anything else we can give you, let us know. Some dinners were held: Pot-luck gatherings and church suppers at 50 cents."

7. The Department of Agriculture sent no instructions to employees or anyone else indicating that action should be taken in the celebration of the seventh anniversary of the program's success.

I hope I have allayed your fears that the Department of Agriculture engaged in any improper activity in regard to these dinners. While they were nonpartisan in character we considered them outside the official sphere of the Department. So far as I can learn, this policy was not violated.

As to the Triple A farmer committeemen, it must be borne in mind that they are not employees of the Department of Agriculture, but are elected by their neighbors to administer the program locally. They work only part time and their pay comes from the farmer payments allotted to their respective counties. I am sure that many of them assisted in promoting and arranging these dinners. They would be more than human, and certainly poor citizens, if they stood idly by without taking part in the debates which are raging over farm policies. These committeemen are independent and nonpartisan. We have no right, and we have never attempted to dictate to them what they should think or do on matters which clearly are their personal affairs as individual citizens.

Sincerely,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

Hon. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: This is in reply to your letters of May 4 and May 8, 1940, in which you requested information on administrative expenditures of Allegan County, Mich., for the past 3 months, in connection with farmers' anniversary dinners held on March 8, 1940, and the attendance of farmers at the St. Paul, Minn., mass meeting on April 27, 1940. I have also House Resolution 486, which you submitted on May 8, 1940, to direct me to furnish the House of Representatives similar information.

Your only point about the meeting for which committeemen received $4.50 for attendance appears to be that the purpose of the meeting was to promote the anniversary dinners. In my letter of May 3, 1940, I showed that the purpose of this meeting was not to promote the anniversary dinners but that the purpose was to provide community committeemen with information necessary for their administrative functions in carrying out the farm program authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 and related legislation. You were informed in that letter that about 25 minutes out of the whole day at that meeting was taken by Mr. Walter Whiteman to tell his plans about the dinners in Allegan County.

With regard to your question as to whether it is political activity for persons administering the farm program to promote a dinner to hear an official speak in favor of the farm program, it would appear that a reasoned consideration of the question would provide an obvious, negative answer. I do not believe that you can find any peacetime laws or regulations in the United States which would so narrow our traditions of free speech and free assembly as to deny that type of activity to farmers engaged part time in the administration of the farm program. Committeemen, who as farm leaders, may naturally have assisted, entirely in unofficial capacities, in the preparation for dinners, were merely exercising their rights as free American citizens.

No farmer in Allegan County, Mich., or any other county in the United States earned any compensation from funds appropriated to administer the farm program for attendance at any of the anniversary dinners. No farmer became entitled to $4.50 per day at any stage of attending any of the dinners nor, since urging attendance at the meetings was not an official function, at any stage of advocating attendance at them. Attendance at the dinners or advocating attendance had no effect whatsoever upon the compensation of any committeemen.

You state that the person who wrote you said he and others were offered 2 days' pay to attend the St. Paul mass meeting. No one was authorized to offer any pay or any money out of funds available for the farm program or the Department of Agriculture to any committeemen or other persons to attend the meeting, and to the best of our knowledge no payments of funds whatsoever have been or will be made to any committeemen or other persons from any Department funds for their attendance at the St. Paul meeting. The Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has been informed specifically that as complete a check as possible has been made on funds paid to committeemen in Allegan County, Mich., for the month of April, and that no payments have been paid or certified to persons for any days spent attending the St. Paul meeting or otherwise not working on the farm program. If any payment has been claimed and certified for any such purpose in any county of the United States, the error or violation of regulations will be corrected without delay according to the procedure in regular use to detect and correct errors or violations of regulations in the payment of funds for administrative work.

Since no committeemen or other persons were paid from funds available for the farm program to attend the St. Paul meeting, and since the meeting did not involve the administrative work of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration or any other agency of the Department of Agriculture, there is no way in which I could obtain any official information about the number of men or number of local committeemen from any particular area who attended the meeting. However, I can and will furnish you with the names of all persons who did or will receive pay for work on the Farm Program on April 26 and 27, 1940, in Allegan County, Mich., as soon as they can be obtained.

In order to provide you with specific information about amounts paid, persons to whom such amounts have been paid, and purposes for which such amounts have been paid out of any funds appropriated for the Department of Agriculture and used for administrative expenses in Allegan County, Mich., between March 1, 1940, and April 30, 1940, I have asked the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to obtain an itemized statement from the Michigan Agricultural Conservation Committee. This information will be obtained as soon as possible and will be transmitted to you immediately.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE,
Secretary.

America Awakens to Its Air-Force Weakness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS OF JUNE 17, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excellent and thought-provoking article from the Washington Daily News of June 17, 1940, which is authored by Charles T. Lucey and Lee G. Miller:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 17, 1940]

HOW SAFE ARE WE?—UNITED STATES AT LAST AWAKENING TO AIR-FORCE WEAKNESS

(By Charles T. Lucey and Lee G. Miller)

The air arm of American defense has come a long way—principally on paper—since President Roosevelt told Congress on January 12, 1939, that "no responsible officer" advocated building our air forces up to equality with "certain other nations."

The war changed the President's views. On May 16 of this year he told Congress: "I should like to see this Nation geared up to the ability to turn out at least 50,000 planes a year. Furthermore, I believe that this Nation should plan at this time a program that would provide us with 50,000 military and naval planes."

Currently Congress is voting money hand over fist in an effort to get going toward this objective. But what does our air defense amount to, as of today?

The Army and Navy have fewer than 5,000 airplanes of all kinds, old and new, trainers and transports, as well as fighters and bombers. (And many of these are being turned back to the manufacturers for sale to the Allies.)

They have no planes embodying the new lessons of the European war.

Listen to Maj. Gen. H. H. Arnold, chief of the Army Air Corps: "A year ago we believed that some of our airplanes had ample performance as compared with airplanes in the rest of the world. Everything went along beautifully until the Germans went into Poland."

LESSONS WE LEARNED

Then it developed that the Army was asleep at the switch in regard to three fundamentals of modern air war:

1. Leakproof gasoline tanks.
2. Shell-firing guns.
3. Armor to protect airplane crews.

General Arnold admitted that the Army had experimented years ago with self-sealing fuel tanks, and had given up due to weight and lack of knowledge of materials at that time.

Only about half a dozen of the Army's planes could be modernized in these respects, he said.

To fly one of the Army's B–18 bombers against modern planes "would be suicide," he testified at Senate hearings. The Army has about 300 B–18's.

That is a dismal picture. But there are encouraging factors.

While General Arnold admits that "we were on the wrong tack so far as our gadgets were concerned," he insists that our "individual airplanes still stand out so far as performance is concerned." Unquestionably the Army's fifty-odd flying fortresses are formidable ships as they stand. And the combat planes now on order will have the new German innovations.

The Allies' eagerness to buy Army and Navy planes is evidence that the existing models are by no means valueless.

OUR BEST DEVICE

In at least one "gadget," our military aviators are confident they have the world beaten. That is the secret bomb sight, reputedly a marvel of precision which permits accurate bombing from great heights. Not even the Allies have been permitted so far to buy this instrument or even inspect it.

The basic index of American air power is the skyrocketing capacity of the aircraft factories. The President says it has risen from about 6,000 a year to "more than double that number." And further great expansion is in prospect.

Manufacturers of airplane engines appear to be keeping pace; a current capacity of 16,000 engines a year is claimed for them, and a capacity of 25,000 1,000-horsepower engines is forecast within a year.

Compare those figures to our performance in the World War, when we delivered to Europe only 1,216 planes, despite enormous expenditures.

To accelerate the further expansion of airplane factories is one of the first tasks of the new Defense Advisory Commission, particularly of Member William S. Knudsen. The principal bottleneck is in machine tools, a problem with which Mr. Knudsen is now grappling.

The magnitude of the President's goal of 50,000 planes a year is attested by this fact: The American aircraft industry, in its entire 30-year history, has built only about 46,000 airplanes, and only about 12,000 of these in the last 10 years.

FIFTY THOUSAND IN 3 YEARS?

It took Germany about 5 years to achieve her estimated capacity of 36,000 planes a year. Nevertheless, Col. John H. Jouett, president of the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce, thinks this country could achieve a 50,000-plane capacity within 3 years.

Then there is the matter of training pilots and ground personnel. Today the Navy and Marine Corps have 2,623 pilots, and the Army at last report had 2,941. Total, 5,564.

Under new legislation enlarging air-training facilities, the Navy hopes within a year to be turning out pilots at a rate of 6,600 a year. Similarly, the Army's program calls for producing 7,000 pilots a year.

The Civil Aeronautics Authority will cooperate by providing primary training for 50,000 civilians in the coming year. (Incidentally, there are in the country today only about 43,000 citizen pilots, good, bad, and indifferent.)

The production of military pilots is a long and expensive process. Ordinarily 9 months of basic training is provided before an Army pilot gets tactical training with a combat unit. And most of the would-be flyers are weeded out at the start or along the way.

Gen. George C. Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, says that 75,000 young men will have to be "processed" in order to produce 7,000 trained pilots.

Pilots are only a fraction of the manpower required by aviation. The Army figures that every plane demands roughly 10 men to maintain it. Capt. Kenneth Whiting, United States Navy, says the Navy needs between 20 and 40 men for each plane, depending on the type.

Taking 30 as the Navy average, that would mean 300,000 men to maintain the 10,000 planes which is the Navy's eventual goal.

If the Army got 40,000 planes eventually, these would require 400,000 men.

Total, Army and Navy, 700,000 men. That is almost twice the combined personnel of the whole Army and Navy today.

Enlisted personnel as well as flying officers have to be thoroughly trained, of course. Skilled airplane mechanics cannot be conjured out of a hat. In the last year the Army Air Corps has expanded its enlisted personnel from 18,000 to 43,000, and General Arnold says they have not all been "absorbed" yet.

A year hence, if present programs go through, the Army expects to have something like 7,900 airplanes on hand or on order, and the Navy nearly 6,000. (From these figures must be deducted the planes turned back to the builders for resale to France and England.)

By that time, planes and pilots should be rolling out of the factories and training schools at a greatly advanced rate.

RESEARCH IS IMPORTANT

In the meantime, aeronautical research, in which Germany stole a march on us, is being speeded up. A great new laboratory is being built in California for the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, to supplement the N. A. C. A.'s big research station at Langley Field, Va. Also legislation now pending carries funds for an $8,000,000 engine laboratory.

In short, America is out to buy air power in enormous quantities. Whether it will get enough of it before an occasion for its use in action arises is another question.

Whether it will use it in the right way is also a question. Maj. Al. Williams insists that effective air power is impossible unless a separate aviation department is created, entirely apart from the War and Navy Departments. There is considerable support for this among service air officers—but they do not admit it publicly since the high commands are opposed.

The War Department position is that its G. H. Q. air force, to which the bulk of the Army's combat planes are attached, provides mobile striking power under a single though not independent command.

National Defense Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

STATEMENT BY UNITED GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES, INC.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, United Government Employees, Inc., an organization of Government workers, of which Edgar G. Brown is president, has issued a statement which, in part, is as follows:

The 15,000,000 Negroes in the United States appeal to the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives to reject the action of the conferees who agreed to strike out the Schwartz amendment inserted on the floor of the Senate, Tuesday, June 11, in the National Defense Act, H. R. 10055, of $2,000,000,000 guaranteeing "that no person shall be excluded from enlisting in any branch of the Military Establishment on account of race, creed, or color."

Does the United States Congress in 1940 agree to taxation without representation for loyal, patriotic Negro American citizens who have never been "fifth columnists" in the 150 years of the history of our liberty, independence, and devotion to democratic institutions?

The Negro press on national defense last week said:

(a) The Afro-American:

"CAN DEMOCRACY BE MADE TO WORK?

"It seems nonsensical, ironic, and almost unbelievable that any group of people should be compelled to fight for the privilege of dying for their country, but such is the inconsistency of prejudice which we will not try to understand.

"The A. F. R. O. has fought for that privilege for our group simply because we know that there is but one medium of exchange with which liberty, freedom, honor, and glory can be purchased, and that is blood. The terms have always been thus. The road to Utopia has always been fought for, inch by inch, with one generation dying that the next might lead a fuller life.

"Which all brings us to the matter of national defense and the race problem."

(b) The Norfolk Journal and Guide:

"THE WORLD CRISIS AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

"The black man, whose blood has been loyally shed in every war in which our country has engaged, is denied enlistment in the Air Corps and Marine Corps; in the medical, dental, and nursing units; and in the Navy and Coast Guard.

"The latter within the past few weeks has bestirred itself in seeking colored enlistments, and the Navy in recent years has permitted increasing colored enlistments, but chiefly, or solely, as messmen.

"The color basis so sharply defined in the Navy has shut tight to colored Americans enrollment in the Naval Academy, and permitted only one to graduate from the Military Academy in a great many years.

"The number of colored males in the United States between 20 and 45 years of age, from available figures, is 2,340,758. The number now in the military services is only 4,451. In the Regular Army there are only five commissioned officers and 11 warrant officers. The number in the Navy, chiefly stewards and messmen, is unknown—but it is not great."

(c) The Washington Tribune:

"DEMOCRACY AT HOME

"Now is the time to read the record of loyal devotion to flag and country. We have fought the white man's battles at home and abroad, from Lexington to the Argonne. No colored man has ever been a traitor. As the Government moves to recall aliens from the District and Federal employment, America needs to be reminded of the colored man's service to his country."

(d) The Chicago Defender:

"DEMOCRACY ON TRIAL

"War has come a step closer to our doorstep. President Roosevelt has increased the ante from three to five million. The hysterical cry that we are in danger grows louder. Some people are agitated to a degree reached before only in 1917.

"We believe in the defense of America—our home and our country. The war record of black America is proof that we believe in defense. But our war record is also proof that we believe in the democracy we never have enjoyed."

(e) The Philadelphia Independent:

"AMERICA'S HANDCUFFS

"America has placed a pair of handcuffs upon Negroes that will make them easy prey for 'fifth columnists' if Hitler ever gets as far as this western continent.

"This is no idle threat. Discrimination, more vicious and harrowing than any programs instituted upon the Jews by Germany, is crushing out the patriotic hope of countless Negro youths.

"Army jim-crowism, Navy jim-crowism, governmental pussyfooting and silent approval of this stand are snapping iron bracelets upon the wrists of Negroes that won't soon be removed unless something drastic is done about it.

"Local Negro boys and Negro boys in nearby and faraway States have repeatedly applied for admission into the Army, Navy, and other branches of this Nation's military units. Various subterfuges have been used to refuse them in some instances and in others they have been told outright that Negroes were not being recruited."

(f) The Kansas City Call:

"DEMOCRACY IN 1940

"Are the three Negro regiments to be sabotaged as only menials, the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry and the Twenty-fourth Infantry? The weak spot in America's armor race prejudice is the 'damned' spot on American democracy."

(g) The Pittsburgh Courier:

"MR. PRESIDENT, WE ARE WAITING

"Inquiries are coming into our office in every mail, asking us what progress we are making in our effort to have our citizens integrated into our national defense. It is but natural that these inquiries come. The country is at fever heat over the war situation in Europe and, judging from reports coming from our National Capital, the Congress itself is getting a little warm.

"We do not know what progress we are making. We have been turned down by the committees of Congress, and no one has suggested that Negroes be integrated into the present preparedness program."

(h) The Cleveland Call and Post:

"WHERE DO WE STAND AS AMERICA PREPARES FOR WAR?

"From the halls of Congress these days we hear nothing but of war preparations. Each succeeding week reveals new appropriations, each dollar earmarked for national defense and actual war."

While all this is going on, hundreds of Government operators are scurrying about the Nation tracking down "fifth columnists," and persons whose loyalty is questioned.

The Negro, America's "tenth citizen," witnesses this with awe and suspicion. For, while Congress rushes ahead with its spending program, and American industry gears itself for war-material production, and millions of workers find the employment window again open, the Negro stands at the end of the line as the "forgotten man."

Despite this Nation's experiences of the last World War with traitors and spies, there is little evidence now that it has learned any lesson from them. The only racial group upon which there was no odium of suspicion during the years of 1917, 1918, and 1919, was the Negro. The most loyal soldiers in the United States Army were the black boys who were called from 400,000 Negro homes to the Nation's colors.

The Nation's reward to these Negro soldiers who served so valiantly has been discrimination, segregation, lynching, denial of the right to vote, and industrial peonage. So, as America contemplates another war, the Negro citizens are asking the all-important question: What will be our position in America's preparedness program, and what will be our fate when war comes?

Not only is the Negro being completely ignored now, as this Nation organizes its factories and mills for war, but we are also being ignored as this Nation organizes its manpower for combat. The "No Negroes Wanted" sign appears at every Government recruiting office unless we are willing to sign up for scullion work. With appeals being made for thousands of airplane pilots, not a single Negro is being accepted.

The Negro soldiers in the Regular United States Army, are scattered at various camps and very few of them are doing any real military work. The fine fighters of the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry and the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Regiments, are now little more than servants for white soldiers.

In his official history of the American Negro in the World War, Emmett J. Scott, on page 468, quotes a white man as follows: "No other race under the sun would endure what the Negro does, except the Negro."

So, as this Nation feverishly prepares for another war, the Negro, just as he was in 1917, is being completely left out of the equation. Wanting and willing to go and help in any way we can, loyal and true, able and capable, we languish on the side lines.

UNITED GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES, INC.

Mississippi for Roosevelt and Harrison

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALL DOXEY
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 17, 1940

RESOLUTIONS OF THE MISSISSIPPI DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, at the Democratic convention recently held in Mississippi resolutions were adopted endorsing President Roosevelt and instructing the State delegation to vote for him for President for a third term.

Resolutions were also adopted endorsing PAT HARRISON, the senior Senator from Mississippi, for Vice President.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions endorsing President Roosevelt and instructing the State delegation to vote for him for a third term.

Whereas the Democratic administration, under the progressive and inspiring leadership of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, has for the past 8 years convincingly made democracy the agency for achieving and furthering the sacred objectives recited in the preamble of our Constitution, "To form a more perfect Union, to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquility, to provide for the common defense, to promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," and

Whereas the most far-reaching program of legislation in our history has been enacted into law under the wise direction of President Roosevelt, and his two terms in the White House have demonstrated beyond contradiction that he possesses to an unusual degree, the statesmanlike qualities of wisdom, courage, and judgment and the undeniable ability to deal sincerely, honestly, realistically, and soundly with economic, social, and foreign problems; and

Whereas President Roosevelt, with rare acumen, foresight, and perseverance, has forged a remarkable record in administering the affairs of our country under most trying circumstances and has sought to lead it into a new era of justice, liberty, and social enlightenment through reforms in the governmental system designed to guarantee the right of the people to jobs, the right to security in private employment and in old age, the right to a decent home, the right to adequate pay, the right to security of savings, the right of security of home and family, the right of collective bargaining, the right to an education, the right to sell agricultural products at a fair price, the right to a fair share of the Nation's resources, and the right to protection against exploitation; and

Whereas President Roosevelt has consistently and conscientiously favored measures to protect the neutrality, the safety, and the integrity of our country and at the same time keep us out of war and in furtherance of that objective obtained passage in Congress last fall after the outbreak of war of a new neutrality act which repealed the embargo provisions of an act of 1925 and enabled the Government to definitely keep American citizens and American ships away from the immediate perils of the actual zones of conflict; and

Whereas President Roosevelt, with the European hostilities now reaching catastrophic proportions, has developed, with the cooperation of the Congress, a long-range program for an expansion of this country's armaments in strengthening our defenses and is pursuing a foreign policy dedicated to peace, but which at the same time seeks to secure protection against potential developments and dangers of the future and the establishment of a defense which will be an expression of the vital forces of the Nation and of its resolute will to meet whatever challenge the future may hold; and

Whereas Franklin D. Roosevelt, by reasons of his background, training, experience, and ability, is the best qualified American to deal with national and international problems in this dark hour and lead this Nation during these critical times; and

Whereas it would be dangerous and unwise to place the leadership in other hands until the present challenge to democracy is past and world peace is restored; and

Whereas Franklin Delano Roosevelt has distinguished himself as one of the six great American Presidents of all times and today is in a better position than any other American to successfully cope with the problems and the crisis of our times and can better continue and complete the New Deal program for the economic happiness and welfare of the American people: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the democracy of Mississippi in convention assembled this the 11th day of June 1940, That its delegation to the National Democratic Convention in Chicago, July 15, be, and is hereby, instructed to vote for the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt on the first ballot and on any succeeding ballots or until he is nominated, or as long as his name is before the convention for nomination.

RESOLUTIONS ENDORSING PAT HARRISON FOR VICE PRESIDENT

That we regard as most satisfactory the services rendered, and especially do we appreciate the services rendered by our senior Senator, Hon. PAT HARRISON, in the Senate, and we feel that all Mississippians, regardless of any so-called factional minds are profoundly gratified because of the wide influence of this gifted son of Mississippi and we point with pride to the splendid record and universally acknowledged leadership of Senator HARRISON in the promulgation and realization of the ideals of democracy and the enactment of the same in beneficial statutory provisions under the most superb Democratic administration of our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and we do hereby present Senator HARRISON unto the forthcoming National Democratic Convention as a trained statesman and man worthy and capacitated to hold the office of Vice President of the United States.

Congress Must Remain in Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WICHITA (KANS.) BEACON

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert an editorial from the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon of June 14, 1940, relative to the joint responsibility of the legislative branch and the executive branch in safeguarding the vital interests of the Nation. The Congress must be constantly at hand during these days when the world is in flames to meet situations which change almost with the hour.

The editorial follows:

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon of June 14, 1940]

CONGRESS MUST REMAIN IN SESSION

The next 90 days will be of paramount importance in the United States in charting the steps to be taken by this Government, not alone in its rearmament program, which must be pushed with all possible speed, but in correlating its foreign policy with the fast-changing scene of Europe.

For that reason it is absolutely necessary that Congress remain in session, regardless of political conventions or political campaigns, until the present emergency has passed and the necessary legislation has been enacted. In these days of "blitzkrieg" warfare it would be the height of folly to adjourn the legislative branch of the Federal Government and then wait when some sudden crisis has arisen, until the Senators and Representatives from the 48 States are called and can be reassembled in Washington.

This is not a question of political advantage or disadvantage. It may be a handicap to some Members of Congress who are up for reelection this year to stay at their posts in Washington—although it would appear that the best campaigning possible would be to do a good job of representing the voters in the solution of the serious problems of the day. It is not a question of confidence or lack of confidence in the President.

This country was designed to operate under a government where the executive and legislative branches share in the responsibility. Right now every man and woman should be concerned in the national security and welfare above everything else. Let the party conventions be held. Let the political campaign proceed. Let the established and recognized institutions and practices of this democratic government function in the same orderly fashion they have functioned for a century and a half. Now is the time above all others that we should preserve the American way of life in every particular. But don't let any partisanship interfere with that greater duty of citizenship.

The Bituminous Coal Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

ADDRESS BY HOWARD W. VESEY

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, during the unforgettable days of the N. R. A., much strife and resentment was created among the consumers of coal of our Nation because of a virtual trust price-fixing.

Again the people are aroused because of the further governmental interference in private industry.

I submit a very able address delivered by Mr. Howard W. Vesey as to future probable results from the furtherance of the Bituminous Coal Act.

Following is the address of Mr. Vesey:

On April 26, 1941, the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937 will automatically pass into the limbo of discarded experimental legislation. Prior to that date the Congress of the United States will have to decide whether or not the bituminous-coal industry is to be made the subject of a further experimentation in collectivism or is to be freed from the shackles of strict regulation and supervision by the Federal Government.

No thinking person can object to the motives which inspired this legislation. Furthermore, I do not believe anyone will question the sincerity of those who sponsored it. Designed to benefit both labor and management, the result was a compromise of doubtful value to either group. So far, at least, neither group has received any benefit whatsoever from it. Instead of aiding both producer and laborer by reversing the downward spiral, it has, if anything, accentuated the very evil which it was intended to eradicate, namely, cutthroat price competition.

This is clearly shown by the losses suffered since the act went into effect in 1937. According to the reports of the National Bituminous Coal Commission, which was the administrative agency under the act until its abolishment by the President on July 1, 1939, the industry lost $37,000,000 in 1937 and $60,000,000 in 1938. We have no figures for 1939, but responsible members of the industry have estimated that the losses for 1939 will approximate $100,000,000. Whether or not this trend will continue in 1940 is a matter of speculation in view of the present European war. These mounting losses become all the more significant when it is remembered that 1937, 1938, and 1939 were good years for practically all other industries. These figures speak for themselves. They need no elaboration. Suffice it to say, unless this trend is stopped by removing the cause, the bituminous-coal industry is doomed to bankruptcy.

In spite of the fact that over three-fourths of the life of the act has already passed, no legal minimum prices have been established. Indeed, there is grave doubt in the minds of many men that effective legal minimum prices will ever be established. On the other hand, there are those who still cling to the hope that minimum prices will be established and that they will remain in effect long enough to enable producers to get back at least some part of the $20,000,000 which the Government has exacted from them in taxes and district board assessments. Although I sympathize fully with the aims and aspirations of this latter group, I do not believe this act can ever be made to work. Furthermore, I firmly believe that if minimum prices are established they will wreck this industry.

I am opposed to the act for two principal reasons: First, because Government price fixing is uneconomic and unsound; and, secondly, because it is un-American.

Government price fixing has always failed. It has in every case disrupted the particular industry and reduced it to a position where it could no longer compete on an economical basis. The losses to the industry so regulated have in every case been tremendous. In fact, the history of these various price-fixing failures in the past is almost an exact parallel to the history of the bituminous-coal industry during the past 3 years. Let us, therefore, examine for a moment both the act and the industry and see if we can determine why the price fixing of bituminous coal by Government is doomed to failure.

In the first place, the act does not strike at the fundamental evil. I believe that everyone will agree that the primary curse in the bituminous-coal industry is overproduction. It is indeed a deplorable fact that any person or combination of persons can tap one of our greatest natural resources by opening a new mine and thus add to the oversupply of bituminous coal. It is this oversupply which produces the intense price competition that has forced prices down to the point where they no longer return even the cost of production. However, no attempt has been made in this act to cure this situation. All that is provided for in the act is the regulation of the resulting evil, the low price levels, and not the cure thereof. Hence, I submit, it should be obvious to anyone that in every district where a price level is established by law that will return costs or more production in that district will be expanded until that price level is broken down and destroyed. Thus, instead of correcting the evil you merely provide for a fuller growth.

In the second place, the act, by providing for the establishment of fixed minimum prices, accentuates cutthroat price competition. I mean simply this, that the threat of fixed prices causes every producer to fight to obtain customers regardless of price on the theory that they will continue to purchase his coal after prices are established. The evidence introduced at the various hearings which have been held by the National Bituminous Coal Commission and the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of the Interior has conclusively proved this fact. This evidence shows that under the threat of fixed prices the price for industrial slack coal has dropped in certain sections to as low as 25 cents per ton. For the past 3 years this threat has hung over the bituminous coal industry. Why, then, should we be startled at the tremendous losses that this industry has suffered under this act? Is it any wonder that they have increased each year until today they have reached such mountainous proportions that the industry is on the very verge of complete bankruptcy? Gentlemen, this situation has got to be corrected and corrected in a hurry. We are not talking about a small, insignificant industry. We are talking about the third largest industry in the United States, an industry that is the bulwark not only of many of our other major industries, as, for example, the railroads, but of our entire economic system. Its welfare, therefore, demands the consideration of everyone, regardless of his walk of life.

Even if price fixing by government had proven to be economically sound, I submit the method employed in this act will not work. Briefly, the method prescribed in the act is the fixing of prices for every kind, quality, and size of bituminous coal produced at every mine for shipment into every consuming market at levels which will return for each producing district the weighted average cost of production for the price area in which it is located. Complicated as that statement is, it is not half as complicated as the contradictory provisions of the act.

I think I can best illustrate the point which I wish to make by giving a concrete illustration. The entire Appalachian field has been divided into eight districts, which are included in price area No. 1. The weighted average cost of production in this price area has been determined by the Commission to be $2.128. The weighted average cost of production in each of the eight districts ranges from a high of $3.654 for district No. 5 to a low of $1.837 for district No. 3. Thus, the Division is immediately confronted with the problem of either following the act and establishing prices which will realze the price-area cost and thus put the mines in the high-cost districts out of business, or violating the act and establishing prices which will realize the costs of the high-cost districts in order to preserve weak, antiquated, and uneconomic mines. Which course will the Division follow? That is the burning question in the mind of every producer of bituminous coal today. I submit to you that the result will be the same regardless of which course is taken. That result will be chaos in the bituminous-coal industry—upset production, disruption of normal distribution, increased costs of production, and inordinate increases in the fuel costs to consumers.

The above is only one of many illustrations that could be given of the unsoundness of this act, which establishes a price-fixing plan that defies almost every known sound economic theory.

No nation can prosper when its government attempts to strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. The denial of the very laws of nature inherent in this act would prevent the achievement of any lasting good.

Flexibility of prices has been one of the few assets of the coal industry. In contravention of the spirit of the laws which it has recently been passing, Congress has attempted in this act to eliminate competition within the coal industry. Should high prices result from the operation of this scheme of price-fixing, the large consumers of coal will undoubtedly take drastic measures to prevent the losses entailed thereby. In many cases they will lease or buy mines, operate such mines, and remove themselves permanently from the potential consuming market of coal producers. Thus, under the guise of an act to aid the coal industry, Congress is in effect fostering the extension of monopolies at the expense of the independent coal operators.

In the final analysis it will be the consumer who will be forced to bear the cost of the inefficient and out-moded methods of production which are fostered under the act. In spite of the fact that the trend in recent years in production costs is downward due to mechanization, the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of the Interior, the final authority below the courts of law, refuses even to consider 1938 and 1939 costs in establishing prices. Only the costs in 1937 are being considered. Why? Because they result in higher prices, thus enabling a greater number of the high-cost mines to survive. Who will benefit? Only the gas and oil companies—the suppliers of competing fuels. Who loses? The miners, the producers, and the consumers of bituminous coal.

For the past 7 years the Federal Government has been experimenting with the bituminous-coal industry. For the past 38 months it has virtually placed it in handcuffs. Instead of aiding the industry in solving its problem it has not only saddled it with a tremendous expense but it has virtually prohibited it from helping itself. For example, this act prohibits the making of contracts for a period of longer than 30 days. Thus, at the end of every 30 days, what would otherwise be long-term contract business, is the subject of the most intense competitive bidding. By thus placing the industry upon a spot-order or day-to-day basis, this act has almost deprived it of what little stability carried through the depression.

I said in the beginning the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937 is un-American. I make this statement because it is but another experiment in collectivism. I say "another" because, as you all know, the experiment is not new. In various forms and degrees it has been tried before by nomad and savage tribes, by the Spartans under Lycurgus, by the Romans under Diocletian, by the English under the Tudors and Stuarts, by the French under Colbert during the reign of Louis XIV, and today by the Russians under Stalin. As stated by one of our outstanding modern writers on administrative law, "There seems to be a relentless cycle in these experiments, as if a 'vision splendid' attempts from time to time to find embodiment in our crude human institutions. On each occasion in the past the experiment has run its course and the vision has 'died away and faded into the light of common day.' Its going has left a trail of disappointment in the shortcomings of the human race and a conviction that mankind is not yet ready for realization of the dream."

The misery and grief which has flowed from each of these experiments is known to all of you. The story has been written so indelibly in the sands of time that one would think we again would not be led astray. But, like all evolutions, failure has not stopped it. It has only retarded it for a short time. The vision seems to sleep for a little while, a century or two, and then bursts forth again radiant with the hope that the world is ready to receive it. But on each occasion it has been the tool of those who lust for power, and thus, consciously or unconsciously, to grind down rather than uplift common man.

In its most extreme form, the vision contemplates a state which not merely regulates but actually conducts all human activities—at least in their economic aspects. In a less extreme garb it would invest the State with actually conducting only a limited number of activities and, in addition, with the responsibility of determining what hours a man shall work, what wages he shall receive, how much he shall produce, at what price he shall sell his products and in what markets, and what business practices he shall pursue. This is the form in which it appears in the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937, except that the labor provisions were stricken out by the Supreme Court in the Carter Coal Co. case in 1936. Opposed to this theory of government is the theory which would confine the authority of the State within definite and fixed bounds. This theory found fruition in the Constitution of the United States of America. For over 150 years we have been following this theory but of late we have begun to drift toward the "vision splendid" of collectivism. Will it work? Or is the bituminous-coal industry doomed to all the disappointment which flows from an upset production, a diversion of normal distribution, and a definite trend away from bituminous coal? The past 38 months would seem to indicate the answer.

If I am correct in this assumption, then every member of the Virginia Coal Merchants Association and every other retail coal merchant in the United States ought to thank God that he does not come under, but is only affected by, this experiment. I doubt if we are ready for it. I do not believe the science of government has advanced as yet to the point where it can stand the strain of such complex and multitudinous duties. In short, I do not believe the members of the bituminous coal industry are prepared to accept such control over their daily lives. However, if I am wrong and we are today prepared to give up another portion of our individual liberties and to greatly extend the power of the Federal Government, I trust we shall have the intelligence to admit errors when we see them and try to correct them expeditiously.

In conclusion, let me say that I have attempted to tell you the story of an industry in handcuffs—the story of an industry that is foundering, due, in large part, to an unwise and uneconomical law. My criticism goes to the act itself and not to those who are presently charged with its administration. Indeed, in my humble opinion, the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of the Interior is to be complimented for their excellent efforts to administer a badly drawn and unworkable law.

My Reply to Walter Winchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include this address which I delivered over an N. B. C. network on Sunday, June 16, 1940, at 7:45 eastern standard time, entitled "My Reply to Walter Winchell."

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, and my friends in Montana, I have requested and I have been granted this time in order to reply to Mr. Walter Winchell's broadcast of last Sunday. I appreciate the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co. in giving me this opportunity to present my side to you.

In order that Mr. Winchell and the radio audience may know something about me, I shall give a brief résumé of my background.

I came to the United States from Norway in 1892, and I have served in the United States Navy, Naval Reserves, Revenue Service, and merchant marine, for over 20 years. I was in the Virginia Naval Reserves in 1898, and was petty officer in charge of the U. S. S. Siren in 1899 and 1900.

I am a navigator, master of oceangoing ships, and licensed pilot of aircraft. I am a doctor of medicine, a surgeon, and former professor of anatomy and instructor in surgery. I am also a surgeon in the United States Naval Reserves with the rank of lieutenant commander. I was with the Pacific Fleet in 1936 and again in the service twice in 1937.

In his broadcast last Sunday, Walter Winchell inferred that I had not adhered to my obligation and that I was a Nazi sympathizer, two unequivocally false accusations that Mr. Winchell cannot nor can anyone else substantiate. I have, as he stated, taken an oath to preserve, to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and that is precisely what I have done.

I am one of those who firmly believes in the fundamental principles of this Republic as set forth in the Constitution of the United States, and I maintain that anyone who engages in or approves by coercion or otherwise, changes or subversion of its meaning, is an enemy of the people. In this, I include even the President, Members of Congress, and Justices of the Supreme Court, when they sanction legislation or acts which may or will deprive the people of their constitutional rights and liberties. It should be clear from this that I am opposed to all forms of subversive activities, whether they be socialism, nazi-ism, fascism, bolshevism, or communism.

However, I realize that the greatest danger which confronts us today comes from those who wield the power of gold money and credit and use this to build an empire for themselves on the ruins of our liberties. It was that power that promoted the World War, and it is that power that is largely instrumental and responsible for the present war in Europe. Can the American people be fooled again? I don't think so.

It is this power which I have criticized and denounced, and it is because of my exposé of them that I have been maligned not only in the communistic papers but by certain other periodicals of the press as well. These attacks upon me have come because I have exposed the manner in which international gold money and credit is manipulated by the very money changers whom the President claimed he drove out of the temple.

My accusers, who have engaged in a campaign of vilification, have done so in order to discredit the statements which I have made.

In this campaign of defamation, they have not at any time been able to successfully contradict or controvert any of these statements, but they have instead resorted to the cheap expedient of name-calling, which in itself is the clearest evidence that my statements are based upon facts.

For example, in my speech on Gold and Its Power, April 23, 1940, I said that foreign governments own nearly $8,000,000,000 of American private stocks and bonds, which when converted into the present international dollar, would amount to over $13,000,000,000 of the gold in our Treasury. I further said that interests outside of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve banks held over $16,000,000,000 of gold certificates, and that we, the people in the United States, who have earned and are the true owners of this valuable metal, own but a very small part of the gold now held in the Treasury of the United States. What does it mean? It means that private interests, or interests outside of the United States are holding gold liabilities against our Treasury amounting to over $29,000,000,000.

Not one person contradicted this statement, and I challenge anyone to contradict that statement today. I have made many statements of this sort, and I have challenged criticism of them. Yet not one "peep" from my accusers.

Other information which I have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is based upon books written by the persons whose principles I have criticized; from material which I have obtained from documents in the Library of Congress; and from intelligence reports of the World War, describing and naming those who were then actually engaged in seditious activities against the United States when we were at war with Germany.

In addition to this exposé, I have also placed information in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD about the German-American Bund activities, an investigation conducted by the Department of Justice. This was written up in 14 volumes, a summary of which I inserted in the RECORD on July 19, 1939.

To carry out my program of informing the public, I inserted, on August 1, 1939, a brief quotation taken from Senate Document No. 14, a report on communism by the United Mine Workers of America. This report was given to Congress, and in the few paragraphs which I shall quote you will find the history of communism in America to date:

"The overthrow and destruction of this Government, with the establishment of an absolute and arbitrary dictatorship, and the elimination of all forms of popular voice in governmental affairs, is being attempted on a more gigantic scale, with more resolute purpose, and with more crafty design than at any time in the history of the Nation.

"The Communist regime at Moscow, bent on world conquest, is promoting and directing one of the best organized and most far-reaching campaigns in America with which any country has ever been confronted. The Communist organization on the American continent is composed of approximately one million members, adherents and sympathizers, scattered in every State and province of the United States and Canada, and who are actively or tacitly promoting the scheme to import bolshevism and sovietism to this side of the Atlantic.

"The movement is aimed not only at the labor unions but at the entire industrial, social, and political structure of the country and with the single aim of eventually establishing a Soviet dictatorship in the United States and converting the country into a vassal colony of the Communist International at Moscow."

This report was given to Congress in 1924. Compare these predictions with what is happening in the United States today.

I have opposed and criticized Congress for having unconstitutionally transferred much of its power to the executive department. My reason for objecting to that is because I oppose dictatorship in any form and dictatorship in general, foreign or domestic. Dictators can be established by force, as in Russia, Italy, and Germany. Dictators can also be established by laws which transfer power from the people to one man or one department. This is what is happening in the United States today as a result of unconstitutional legislation enacted by majorities in your own Congress.

I am opposed to this unconstitutional legislation which has established a Federal monopoly, ownership, and control of industries far greater than any private monopoly of the past. The Government has no constitutional right to engage in competition with private business. I am opposed to the importation of farm products which is now destroying the agricultural structure of our Nation. It is my firm conviction that our farmers should at least have the right to supply our home markets and our own people with food for our own tables.

I am opposed to war, and I condemn the warmongers and the effort which is being made to arouse fear of invasion. No power now engaged in the war will be able to invade any nation when the war is over.

This is my reply to Walter Winchell and to my defamers:

I believe in the principles that have made this Republic great, and my record stands by itself, squarely upon the Constitution of the United States.

Communist Traitors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEWARK (N. J.) STAR-LEDGER

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, it is very refreshing in these days of "fifth column" and subversive activities that the press, and particularly the Newark Star-Ledger from my own district, has sufficient courage to expose some of the un-American groups which are now carrying on under innocent-sounding names.

The following is an editorial of June 15:

COMMUNIST TRAITORS

It seems that the followers of the Communist Party line in this community resent the fact that we have stated that they are giving aid and comfort to Hitler's fifth column in the United States.

These left-wingers, denying that they are in fact Communists and operating under a variety of innocent-sounding organization names, contend that we misjudge them. They say they are patriotic Americans who would die to defend their country if it were attacked, but oppose aggression and want our country to spend its money on peaceful objectives instead of preparedness.

That sounds pretty, perhaps, but we don't believe it is sincere.

Thursday night the Essex County Council of the American Youth Congress staged a "peace rally" at the Newark City Hall. Speakers were profuse in their promises to defend America "if it were attacked," but consider what they did:

They listened to and applauded an Englishman, Anthony Scott, a man young enough to be doing something useful to defend his native land, now in the midst of a bitter war. This brave Englishman in the course of his oratorial contribution to the "defense" of his homeland gave unstintedly of his larynx when he said: "Britain and France are accomplices in destroying the peace of the world."

To be sure, this "loyal" Englishman was impartial as between his own country and our country in handing out compliments. Concerning America, he had this to say:

"The United States has become drunk with the idea of empire, to make New York and Chicago people rich."

After witnessing the treasonable performance at city hall Thursday night, we cannot believe the Communists who disguise themselves as peace advocates when they protest they would defend America if invaded. We believe they would be no more loyal than the Englishman who prefers stabbing his government in the back to defending it.

The American Youth Congress which staged this disgraceful rally is affiliated with the Peace Action Committee, which, in turn, derives its motive power from followers of the Communist Party line. These organizations, because they devote so much studied effort to disguising themselves in innocent-sounding names and innocent-sounding jargon, succeed in sucking in some well-meaning people. Their true motives should, however, be obvious to intelligent people.

We are proud to record the fact that this traitorous gathering adopted a resolution censuring the Star-Ledger as an enemy of peace. We do not favor a Hitler peace or a Stalin peace. We are proud to be placed in the same company with the embattled peoples of France and England, and the liberty-loving people of America. We are especially proud that we have become equally disturbing to the Communists and the German-American Bund. The Bund attacked us in a hit-run libel suit and the Communists fittingly are adopting poisonous resolutions.

All of that is flattering acknowledgment of the fact that in these critical times this New Jersey newspaper is earnestly trying to do its American duty.

While Rome Burns

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON STAR

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star for today:

[From the Washington Star of June 17, 1940]

WHILE ROME BURNS—

The great weakness of the European democracies, as shown by the present desperate plight in which they find themselves, has been their inability to function quickly and effectively in an emergency. No one in America can doubt that this is true, but there is a serious question whether we have taken to heart the lesson that should be learned from the tragic blunders of Britain and France. If we have not profited by their mistakes—and an answer to that vital question may be given by the House this week—then the outlook for America is indeed dark.

During the next few days the House will be called upon to consider a recommendation by its Committee on Military Affairs with respect to the President's request for authority, in the absence of Congress, to call a portion of the National Guard to active service should an emergency arise to warrant such action. A majority of the committee has proposed that this authority be granted subject to a limitation which would deny the President the power to use the guard anywhere except in the continental United States, the Panama Canal Zone, and our insular possessions—a limitation which brought forth a vigorous protest from seven minority members of the committee.

The real consideration which inspired the majority Members to impose this restriction is not known. It may have resulted from a lack of confidence in the President's discretion, or, more probably, it may have reflected a surrender to the vociferous but unthinking outcry from certain groups against sending American boys to fight on foreign soil. But whatever the cause, the imposition of such a limitation in view of present world conditions is lamentably short-sighted.

As the minority members pointed out, at any hour it may become necessary for the United States to give military assistance to any one of several countries in this hemisphere in order to prevent disloyal elements in league with the totalitarian powers from seizing he reins of a neighboring government. In such an operation, time would be a most important element and our Regular Army forces, mall and widely scattered as they are, might well be incapable of lealing with such an emergency. But the majority of the House committee, for reasons which defy comprehension, would not permit the National Guard to be used on such a mission until Congress, assuming it to be in recess or adjournment, could reassemble and grant the specific authority. Meanwhile, of course, hostile forces might obtain a foothold in this hemisphere from which they could not be dislodged without great difficulty, but rather than delegate a wholly reasonable power to the President the majority members of the House committee presumably prefer to gamble that potential enemies will be considerate enough to strike only when Congress is in session.

When the House takes up the recommendation of its committee, the Nation will join with the minority members in asking whether Congress, like Nero, proposes to fiddle while our Rome is burning. In the Star's opinion the calling up of the National Guard would be at best but a first step in preparing to resist the danger which confronts us. But, as a preliminary step, it should be taken, and a refusal by the House to grant in full the President's request could only be interpreted as confirming the contention that democracies cannot or will not function with that degree of effectiveness which a real emergency requires.

National Defense at the Crossroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD K. CLAYPOOL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. LOUIS JOHNSON, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Honorable Louis Johnson, the Assistant Secretary of War, before the National Association of Purchasing Agents and the civic bodies of Cincinnati, Cincinnati, Ohio, June 4, 1940:

Friends of national defense, there is a symbolic significance to our meeting at this critical moment in our Nation's history here in the city of Cincinnati today. It goes back almost 2,500 years to the Roman warrior, Lucius Quintius Cincinnatus, who preferred the plough to the sword but who in every grave emergency was ready to forego his normal peaceful pursuits to devote himself to the service of his country.

The symbol of Cincinnatus appealed to the veterans of the Revolutionary War whose leaders bound themselves together as Sons of Cincinnati. It appealed to the founding fathers of this community on the banks of the Ohio, who perpetuated the name of the organization by conferring it upon this city. It should appeal to all of us today as a reminder of our duty to our country in time of need.

National defense is at the crossroads. It is heading in the right direction. The road is long and the going may be rough. We must travel it at the maximum speed compatible with safety and efficiency and we must see to it that it remains true to the course of adequate preparedness. We must assure ourselves that at the end we will find an America ready to meet any military crisis; an America so well prepared on land, on sea, and in the air that no prudent enemy will be tempted to attack us, and that no reckless foe will be in a position to defeat us. And when that job is done, you and I, and every patriotic American, will be ready in the spirit of Cincinnatus, to go back to the plough or to the loom, the spindle or the lathe, and to resume his accustomed role in the life of his community.

In the meantime, we must put our national defense on a stand-by basis, ready for any grave emergency. We must be realists. We must listen to the truth whether it is pleasant or not. We must face the world as it is, whether we like it or not.

In the past, many Americans hailed the harbinger of disagreeable news with skepticism. For instance, in November 1938, before a Boston audience, I suggested that "to meet the tremendous pace that the rest of the world is setting we must double, yes, treble, and perhaps even quadruple, our present air force with the best airplanes that can possibly be produced." I had hardly finished the sentence when many arose to scoff at my suggestion as that of an alarmist. Be that as it may, we have neither the time nor the desire now for recriminations over spilt milk. Let us forget our differences of yesterday and work together today, united in the interest of national security. Let us give up all thought of individual gain and think only of national interest. We are all members of our great all-American team. Let us play the game along national lines with the same kind of spirit and energy that Bill McKechnie's men are displaying in their determined and courageous fight for a second National League pennant.

Since 1938 we have made some progress in our quest for adequate national defense; not enough, to be sure, especially in the light of happenings of the past few weeks, but of sufficient importance to indicate that we are headed in the right direction. In 1938 we are working toward a very limited objective of 2,520 planes by June 1940. In 1939 we embarked on a well-rounded program of 5,500 planes by June 1941. Toward that objective we had been moving according to schedule when the war in Europe spread in its present fury. As a result we now will have to add bombers, pilots, production facilities, and the other elements that contribute toward a well-balanced aviation program. We shall proceed to do so without hysteria and without lost motion. The experience gained in production and in training in the last year will help us immeasurably in the required expansion.

Our ultimate objectives we shall not achieve in a day, or in a month, or even in a year. I doubt if they will be fully realized in less than 2 years; and 2 years is indeed a long time, especially in an era of "blitzkriegen." That is the situation, however, and we must face it frankly and honestly, and then proceed with our characteristic American energy to attain the desired goal of national defense with a minimum of delay. In the last year we laid the foundations. Today we are ready to start on the superstructure, and we have the advantages of the battlefield laboratories of Europe to guide us in our plans.

Not only in the air but on the ground have we been laying a solid foundation for national defense upon which the larger edifice now contemplated by the President can be built with greater assurance. In the last year, we have made many advances all along our munitions front. Let me cite a few.

At the time of Munich, we had hardly enough Garand rifles for a division. Today, distribution to the Regular Army has been completed. Thousands have been issued to the National Guard and full delivery is expected by June 1941.

In 1938, we did not have enough gas masks to take care of our existing forces. Today, in spite of increases in personnel we have them in sufficient quantities for the Regular Army and enough under manufacture for early delivery for the National Guard.

In 1938, the Medical Department could not have met the requirements of supplies and equipment for an initial protective force. Today, it has completed its combat equipment for an army of approximately one-half million men.

I give you these examples not to imply that we are fully prepared anywhere in the munitions field. On the contrary, let me say unequivocally that we are not completely ready anywhere on our supply front. We lack trucks to meet the needs of the Regular Army. The National Guard has not been fully equipped with modernized artillery. Our quota of antiaircraft guns is not yet available. There are many weaknesses up and down the line. I merely point to a few of our achievements to indicate that a start already has been made. Our plans are sound. Our designs are satisfactory. Given the necessary time and funds, desired results will follow.

Our objective is critical items such as tanks, fieldpieces, and others of a noncommercial nature on hand to take care not only of the Regulars and the National Guardsmen but of all of those who will respond to the call of their country in the early months of a grave crisis. With the appropriations called for by the President, and now made available by Congress, we must translate money into supplies and equipment as rapidly as possible. By December 31, 1941, we expect to have practically all the critical items we need for approximately 1,000,000 men. Today, we have not enough of such items to take care of even the one-half million men in our Regular Army and National Guard.

Our plans for our Army envisage its possible use for the following purposes:

First, to provide garrisons in our overseas possessions to protect our naval installations—in the Panama Canal Zone, in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, and in similar localities. For this purpose our General Staff has estimated a need for 70,000 soldiers. Today, we have approximately 65,000 in our overseas garrisons, but we are working toward the 70,000 goal.

Second, to protect America against raids. This means a force available on short notice sufficient to thwart any threat that may develop against the Panama Canal or the continental limits of the United States.

Third, to provide a basic force which can be expanded to meet the full needs of any grave emergency. This means, in turn, organizations reasonably manned and fully trained and equipped; officers, fully qualified and experienced, and enlisted men—every one of whom is potential noncommissioned or commissioned officer material.

The importance of having available a coterie of the latter in our Regular Army is patent to all of you. In training, they are indispensable. In battle, they may become the leaders of our platoons or our companies. All of you who served overseas are familiar with examples of sergeants and corporals who had to take over command of companies when the officers were put out of action. You, in Cincinnati, undoubtedly recall the example of one of your own men, Corp. John H. Morgan, of Company D, Ninth

Infantry, Second Division, winner of the Distinguished Service Cross, whose citation reads as follows:

"All of his superiors having been killed by a nest of machine guns, Corporal Morgan took command of his platoon, and in an extremely difficult attack wiped out a nest of five machine guns."

The Morgans in the ranks are often called upon to command. We look to our peacetime military organizations to inculcate in them the spirit of loyalty and leadership that prepares them for such contingencies.

The framework for our present peacetime Army was laid down in 1920, at a time of relative peace in the world. The Congress, after extensive hearings, enacted the present National Defense Act. This basic law authorized 280,000 men in the Regular Army; and this is our objective today.

When the Low Countries were invaded we had a Regular Army of but 227,000 enlisted men. This force we hope to expand to maximum authorized strength. Completely equipped and properly trained, it constitutes a minimum requirement for national security. We must strive to reach the 280,000 figure for the Regular Army without delay.

Consider for a moment the figure of 280,000 Regular Army men as an objective. Note the extent of its modesty. Today there are 13 nations in the world with larger standing armies. Add our present National Guard of 235,000 and we would have an available M-day force of 515,000. Together with their officers, they represent at most 550,000, or a rank of but eighteenth among the land forces which other countries have available for possible M day.

At the time of the Munich appeasement our Army, including all trained reserves, gave us a standing of thirteenth among the nations of the world. Among those that preceded us were Czechoslovakia, Poland, Holland, and Belgium. Today, despite the fact that these four nations have been eliminated as military powers, we have slipped to seventeenth. Certainly no one can say that the War Department, in looking toward a force of approximately 515,000 enlisted men in both Regular Army and National Guard at this time, has set more than a minimum goal.

The President's program is a modest one. It does not promise to whip a large army into shape overnight. It does not assure us an immediate reserve of munitions to take care of the men called to arms in the first 6 months of a major emergency. It merely provides for reasonable preparedness in the disturbed world of today to be achieved with the aid and hearty cooperation of industry with a minimum of delay.

These munitions will cost money. They are, indeed, expensive. But remember, our military forces are a necessity, not a luxury. Nor is the reason for the cost difficult to ascertain. Man for man, item for item, the cost to America is greater than in any other country. Our soldiers are better paid, better fed, better clothed, and should be better equipped than those of any other army in the world; and who of you would have it otherwise?

Totalitarian governments pay their bills by fiat. They conscript their labor. They confiscate capital. Our Government pays in good American dollars for value received. Our labor is free to move about and it has the right to bargain. Our capitalist system encourages private industry and individual enterprise. Of course, we pay more for those American rights and privileges and who of you would have it otherwise?

The realization of the President's program will present many problems to industry which it will meet, I am confident, with enthusiasm and with energy. The load itself does not constitute a major problem. It will not displace normal production to any material degree. Conversion of the entire output of great industrial plants is not yet involved. The difficulty is not in the load but in the nature of the load. For one thing, it makes special demands for skill that are hard to fill.

In modern battle we demand not only a disciplined fighter, but a skilled mechanic. He must have a firm grasp of the powers and capabilities of his weapons as well as the strength and the courage to use them intelligently and efficiently. Guns, tanks, planes, and the other numerous battle accessories today call for craftsmen skilled in handling machines, as well as fighters bred in discipline. Any ordinary chauffeur can drive a car, but the pilot of a heavy tank who must traverse varied terrain, climb over steep hills, drive through thick forests, wade across deep gullies, and speed along wide open fields while planes from above and artillery from the flank shower him with a deadly spray, must indeed be a mechanic in arms; and behind the pilot are the army maintenance men who must keep the wheels rolling.

This is only one side of the demand for skill. Behind our planes, our tanks, our trucks, and all of our modern, delicate engines of war is the manual dexterity of our industrial mechanic. For the production of our war equipment and our munitions in our civilian factories we must look to deft hands. Where and how are we going to obtain this skill?

Here in Cincinnati we should experience little difficulty. You have done an admirable job in developing skilled labor. Since 1828, your Mechanics Institute has been helping to meet the need for trade and technical education in Cincinnati. Since 1906, you have provided the so-called cooperative education system of training for young engineers which is known throughout America. This plan for which the practical facilities of industry, as well as the theoretical courses of the educational institutions, are used cooperatively, has been continued for more than 30 years in Cincinnati. From here it has spread to many parts of the country.

Your vocational high-school system, called the occupationally segregated vocational-school system, or the Cincinnati plan, has attracted the attention of industrialists, educators, and labor leaders everywhere.

Your program of trade and industrial education with its unique emphasis on separate trade high schools for various industries has paid you dividends in developing special skills. Your schools for automotive, building, electrical, printing, mechanical, and tailoring trades have prepared young men for jobs in peace and in war.

Cincinnati has always believed that any type of training or education needed by a worker to make him a better worker, capable of turning out a better product, is a matter of public interest, definitely related to the economic power of your city and deserving of public support.

Your trade and industrial educational facilities have brought your community many industrial advantages. May they be used always in the construction of useful instruments toward peace.

When I first accepted the invitation to speak before you today I had hoped to devote my remarks to what the Army and Cincinnati have done for each other in time of peace. With that in mind, I sought data on the work of our Army engineers in the Cincinnati district. I learned of the splendid progress that has been made here on two of the country's greatest river-control projects.

First, the great canalization project of the main Ohio River with its 9-foot channel extending over a length of 981 miles by the construction of 47 locks and dams;

Second, the flood-control project, which provides for 78 reservoirs and local-protection works at 129 cities and towns.

Both of these projects are moving along in a satisfactory manner and are bringing blessings to you in Cincinnati and the Ohio Valley.

The Army, as you in the Ohio Valley so well know, is a factor in peace as well as in war. Would that we could use it always merely for the promotion and the development of such projects as those along the Ohio.

Its principal job, however, is to be ready for a grave emergency in which men must face battle; and it is toward the development of a strong army, capable of taking its place in battle, if need be, that we must now exert our principal energies. It is for that reason that I have devoted myself principally to the preparedness phase of our Army's activities.

In adequate defense we have our greatest protection against the scourges of war which today are destroying the old world. America has been and still is the abiding place for the civilization of the world. We must keep it so.

Kansas—The Natural Spot for National Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

STATEMENT BY THE KANSAS INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a statement prepared by the Kansas Industrial Development Commission in regard to the natural advantages of the State of Kansas in any program of national defense. Kansas, in a spirit of patriotic devotion, offers its abundant resources toward the program of national defense.

The statement is as follows:

Of the 48 States, Kansas is the natural choice for the location of national-defense supply and equipment factories. In Kansas, these plants will be (1) safely inland, (2) close to ample raw materials, (3) served by modern transportation, (4) in the midst of adequate loyal labor, and (5) near abundant basic food stuffs. Only Kansas offers all these advantages—because Kansas is:

1. Exactly in the geographical center of the Nation.

2. First in volcanic ash production. First in deposits of native chalk. Second in grain sorghums. Third in salt production. Third in chat production. Third in zinc output. Eighth in mineral production. Tenth in cement output.

3. Served by 9,000 miles of railroads. Served by over 9,000 miles of State highways bisected by the largest number of United States highways.

4. Supplied with an abundance of loyal, intelligent, American-born labor. First in per capita wealth. First in college students per 1,000 persons. Fourth in percentage of high-school students.

5. First in wheat, wheat storage, and flour milling. First in the shipment of eggs. Second in alfalfa. Second in creameries. Fourth in meat packing. Fifth in dressed poultry shipped.

In addition to these outstanding, definite advantages, Kansas also has a sound, cooperative, business-like administration of State government. And this State government pledges itself to cooperate fully in whatever measures are necessary to assure the continued security of the United States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN K. GRIFFITH

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF LOUISIANA

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include House Concurrent Resolution 21 of the Legislature of Louisiana, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 21

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and the Civil Aeronautics Authority to establish an aviation base at or near the Tchfuncta Park, St. Tammany Parish, La.

Whereas the United States, in its defense program, is seeking to establish aviation bases in various sections of the country, and

Whereas certain lands belonging to the Department of Conservation of the State of Louisiana, and being situated north of Highway No. 190 near the Tchfuncta Park, St. Tammany Parish, La., would be an ideal location, and

Whereas the said lands could be easily cleared for such purpose, and there is presently located upon said lands certain buildings that would be suitable to such an aviation base, and

Whereas such a location would, being in the Ozone Belt, be an ideal location from the standpoint of health, and could be used as a defense point from attacks through the Gulf of Mexico: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring, That we do respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States, now in session, and the Civil Aeronautics Authority that the proper authorities vested with the selection of air bases in the national-defense program be requested to make said location one of its air bases; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Louisiana senatorial and the congressional Representatives in Washington, and to the press.

America and Preparation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR JOHNSON

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the able Assistant Secretary of War, the Honorable Louis Johnson, last night delivered a very patriotic and timely address in Fairmont, W. Va., at the dedication of the Fairmont Hospital. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, on other occasions that I have been privileged to speak in Fairmont I have greeted you as West Virginians, as worthy sons and daughters of a mighty State which rightly takes pride in its individual identity within our indivisible Union. Tonight I salute you in terms of your broader identity, as American citizens who stand firmly united beneath the one flag that symbolizes our common democracy, a Nation of free men and women determined to maintain for themselves and posterity the principles of liberty and justice upon which this Government was founded, and upon which it stands securely tonight. Thank God, that is the spirit that moves America, from ocean to ocean and border to border, in this hour of stress and danger.

In union we have ever found our greatest strength. As a people who love peace and hate war we have always been prone to forget the needs of an adequate national defense. Because we covet no other peoples' riches; because we are inspired by no dreams of world domain, we have felt secure behind the formidable barriers of vast seas to the east and west of us, while safely flanked on the north and south by none but friendly nations. We have preferred to tread the path of democracy, seeking to fashion our individual destiny as free men endowed with the God-given right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We have taken pride in the achievements of our individual States, in the friendly rivalry between our home communities. But never have we failed when emergency has crossed the horizon of our hemisphere to rise as a united people to defend and hold secure those rights and privileges which we cherish as Americans.

So we stand tonight, as a people keenly aware of the danger that confronts us, as a people with but a single thought—to keep the legions of aggression and the mailed fist of the conqueror from our shores. State lines have vanished overnight; individualism is submerged for the moment in the will of a united people to guard the common welfare and the national security upon which the whole principle of individual rights and progress depend. So, with deep personal pride in this State which is my home, which has given me opportunity and contentment and the love of a happy family, I greet you in the spirit of the times, as fellow Americans.

The purpose that brings us together tonight seems to me to be typically American. We have assembled to dedicate an institution devoted not to the destruction of life but to its preservation; not to the intensification of human suffering and misery but to their alleviation. We are here to dedicate this hospital, a place where men and women and children beset by illness and racked by pain shall have the finest care that science, knowledge, and sympathy can marshal to relieve their suffering and return them to sound health and active productivity again. Here we find all of the finest motives and ideals of our American concept to make life better, not worse; to improve, not to destroy; to give life, not to take it away.

As we think of these things my mind goes back in history to the year 1888, back to another great humanitarian event which took place in the midst of another dark period in world affairs, back to the words of Louis Pasteur, one of the greatest scientists and benefactors of humanity in all the ages. In that year already the alliances were being fashioned and the foundations laid for the Great World War. But even as aggressors prepared to unleash the devastation of force and conquest upon civilization, in Paris men assembled to found the Pasteur Institute. In a brief address on that occasion Pasteur caught a vision of things to come and drew an everlasting parallel when he said:

"Two opposing laws seem to me now in contest. The one, a law of blood and death, opening out each day new modes of destruction forcing nations to be always ready for battle. The other, a law of peace, work, and health, whose only aim is to deliver man from the calamities which beset him. The one seeks violent conquests; the other, the relief of mankind; the one places a single life above all victories, the other sacrifices thousands of lives to the ambition of a single individual. Which of these two laws will prevail, God alone knows. But of this we may be sure: That science, in obeying the law of humanity, will always labor to enlarge the frontiers of life."

How like the situation that confronts us, our Nation, today. Those same two opposing forces are in contest, one still seeking violent conquests and the other the relief of mankind. Each day witnesses the unfolding of new forces of destruction, and not thousands but millions of lives are being sacrificed to the ambition of a single individual. But of this we in this generation may be sure: If we remain steadfast to the principles of freedom and justice upon which we have built the citadel of our Nation, if we maintain ourselves in sufficient strength to discourage aggression and to put it down if aggression is brought against us, we shall live to see the frontiers of life enlarged in a world of peace and progress.

We, in America, did not bring upon ourselves the emergency which now confronts us. Neither by act, word, nor deed have we invited threats from over the seas to our peace and our way of life. Your Government did everything within its power to discourage and prevent the war that is now making a shambles of much of Europe and that threatens to reverse the onward course of civilization by centuries. Your Government long ago warned that we must prepare to defend this hemisphere against the tyrants of aggression and conquest by force. But your Government's voice was as that of one crying in the wilderness. Some who heard refused to believe the truth, while others believed but were afraid to admit it even to their inner conscience. And now we face not prediction or theory but stark realism.

It contributes nothing to the need of the hour to say, "I told you so." It contributes nothing to getting done the job that must be done to indulge ourselves with wishful regrets. It certainly contributes nothing to our future security to go into national hysteria. It contributes nothing to the unity of mind which we need so badly for either party to blame the other for our state of preparedness, or the lack of it, according to the opinion you may hold on that point. If we are to meet and overcome the problems which are before us, we must be as realistic as the emergency itself and unswerving in our faith in America.

To be realistic the people must be informed, and in that belief the War Department has adhered strictly to the policy of telling you the truth about the state of our national defense. Sometimes the truth is not pleasant. The plain truth is that our national defense is neither as bad as some individuals have pictured it nor as good as it should be in the presence of modern methods of warfare. I wish that I could report that our needs will be met within this year, but in good conscience I cannot do so. At least another year must elapse after this one ends before we can truthfully say that our national defense is adequate, and we will be ready then only if we build intensely, work intensely, accumulate intensely, and maintain the intensified kind of teamwork that wins.

On the brighter side of the picture, let it be said that we are not the push-over that recent hysteria has led many of our people to believe. We are infinitely stronger today than we were a decade ago, and stronger than we were a year ago. We have a stronger Navy, a stronger Army, and a stronger Air Corps. Furthermore, while the oceans are not the formidable barrier that they once were, they are still something more of a hop than rivers or a channel 24 to 100 miles wide. But there is scant comfort to be gained from these facts. To be lulled back into a state of contented ignorance by such thoughts would be national suicide.

Methods of warfare have changed and are continuing to change with a rapidity and completeness that stuns the imagination. What seemed to be impossible yesterday is an accomplished fact today; and that which may seem fantastic today may well become a comparatively simple operation tomorrow. No longer can we afford to wait and build our preparedness in the light of war experience, expecting thereby to have the advantage of building only the best and most modern. We must build to meet the needs of the hour; and if what we have built is made obsolete by new weapons and new methods, we must build to meet those advances. Even further than that, we must use our inventive genius, which has never been lacking in the past, to build better and better than anyone else. And when we have reached the pace of national security against aggression from overseas, we must hold that pace and never again permit ourselves to be found in the condition we face tonight.

The day when we could put guns into the hands of citizen soldiers, teach them the manual of arms, and send them out to match their spirit and brawn against that of an enemy has passed. Wars today are fought more with spirit and brains. Soldiers must be trained as specialists who understand intricate and technical mechanical equipment, and they cannot be taught these things in a matter of days or even months. They must be prepared to strike with the power and speed of lightning, because that is the way wars hit now. Our men must know not only the tactics of modern warfare but also how to operate tanks, how to handle airplanes, and how to fire modern weapons accurately. In other words, they must not only be soldiers but also competent engineers.

The need of our Nation today is more ships, more guns, more airplanes, more munitions, more men, and more experience. We need ships enough to protect us not only on one ocean but on both oceans; ships enough to defend not only the shores of these United States and their possessions but also to keep an aggressor from establishing bases and beachheads in this hemisphere. We need enough airplanes, guns, munitions, and men in the Army to carry out the same broad hemisphere-defense program. In none of these categories are we sufficiently prepared and in each the deficiencies must be filled if we are to be secure in our own part of the world.

Our standing Army and National Guard combined represent a strength of less than 500,000 men. As I speak to you tonight, we do not have enough vital equipment to supply even this force, not to mention the vast amount we would need if this or another emergency should bring us to M day. No army can fight without adequate equipment and a continuous supply as the emergency proceeds. Because we had time after we entered the last war to prepare the full might of America for a knock-out blow we must not tamper with the dangerous idea that we would be so favored again. We must be ready for instantaneous action. We are bending every effort to put our present forces in readiness, but I cannot tell you, in all honesty, that this will be accomplished before the end of next year. Thus, I have tried to give you the other side, the darker side, of the picture. It is not a pleasant story, but it should be told and you have a right to know it.

Who is to blame for this state of unpreparedness? Again, I say that if we are to be realistic in approaching and overcoming this vital problem we must be bluntly frank. The truth is that we are all responsible. This is no time for anyone to be passing the buck. Let us retrace for a moment the history of the last 22 years. When the World War ended we had the most powerful military machine in the history of the world. Industry was geared to wartime production and supplies were rolling out in unlimited quantity. Our Army approached 5,000,000 men, most of them fully trained, and at least half of them battle-seasoned troops. Our Navy, built or building, was the most powerful on the high seas. But what happened?

The symphony of guns came to a sudden end, the victory was won, and within a matter of hours we turned to thoughts of peace and progress in our more normal American way. No enemy loomed over the horizon, none seemed capable of marching against us. Our men were demobilized quickly, industry turned to the herculean task of readjusting itself to the peacetime tempo, and we literally gave away enormous quantities of munitions and critical supplies. Then came the Washington Arms Conference, a venture noble in conception but deadly in its results to our national defense. Within a very few years our Army slipped from first place down to eighteenth place among the nations—smaller even than that of tiny Greece.

The Washington conference, by sinking American battleships while others sank blueprints, dropped our Navy from first to second place. And still the public cry for greater and greater economies at the expense of national defense became louder and louder.

Let no one misconstrue my intentions. I do not seek to foist the blame for unpreparedness upon other administrations of another party. Neither do I seek to raise political implications. I desire only to face the truth honestly, to bring home the point that the people themselves demanded that these things be done, and in response to that demand the Government did them. War was a thing of the past, national defense was expensive—as ever it will be—and as a whole people we quickly forgot the lesson we thought we had learned as a result of the World War.

The Congress had mapped out a program in 1920 which if it had been carried out would have maintained us in a state of reasonable preparedness. But it was not carried out. A number of times your Government attempted to arouse the people to the fact that wars were still possible, that our own country was not without danger, and an attempt was made to restore our defense to a reasonable state of efficiency. A previous administration, for instance, sought to bring our cruiser strength up to a level which would still have been below that of two other nations. Washington literally swarmed with lobbies of well-intentioned but utterly uninformed men and women who fought even that modest program with every power at their command. In the end a number of ships were built, but less than the strength that had been urged by the qualified men in the Navy Department who knew the risk we were running.

When the present administration came into office a start was made toward reconstructing the national defense, but who will deny with a clear conscience that the people even then were ready for it. Already the rumblings of the present war in Europe could be heard in the distance. We began to build up the Navy, increase the strength of the Army, and construct a substantial Air Corps, but still the people were not ready for the tremendous building program that eventually was to be the price for years of negligence and chance taking. Yes; even as late as last September, when the European war became a reality, the recommendations of your national-defense departments in Washington were called fantastic. And now, as ever it must be, the time has come to pay the piper.

Every thinking man and woman in America tonight is asking, "Is there yet time?" I answer, "Yes." There is yet time if every one of us puts a stout shoulder to the wheel, puts an end to name calling, bickering, and buck passing, and gets down to work. The job before us is the defense of our country, our homes, our future, our liberties, and the right of our children to inherit the blessings of a free America, as we inherited them from our fathers. America's first line of defense is the unity of our people. As a united people we can and will do the job.

In preparedness we shall find our surest security against war. If the going is hard and the burden heavy, let us remember that the sacrifices called for and the cost that must be paid are but a pittance as compared to the stake that might be the forfeit for temporizing and hesitating in this critical hour. Let us build our defenses so strong that aggressors will think long before attacking us, and if any should dare, let us be prepared to teach them a lesson so stern that for generations to come future tyrants will hold the might of America in awe and fear. We covet no people's land or resources. Let none dare covet ours.

Floyd B. Olson Memorial Exercises, Minneapolis, Minn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a superb speech delivered last night by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] at the Floyd B. Olson memorial exercises held in Minneapolis, Minn.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is not often that a whole region joins in paying tribute to a man—but then it is not often that a region produces a leader like Floyd B. Olson. He was close to the earth—though he towered up 6 feet tall. He was a natural leader and a fearless fighter. Wherever a battle was raging over some public issue you found him giving the last ounce of his strength and energy to the cause he thought right. He was an unswerving believer in the principles of democracy and the right of ordinary citizens. I consider it a privilege to join with you in honoring a Minnesotan who, if death had not robbed us of him, would today be playing the significant role in national affairs that he played for so many years in the affairs of this State.

In this hour of peril the Nation needs a voice like Floyd Olson's, a voice lifted to counteract the hysterical Wall Street and British propaganda that is being hurled at us from all directions to get this country into war. At a time when the waves raised by the tragic explosion of the European Continent are reaching and threatening to engulf us we need a man able to maintain, and anxious to fight for, his basic ideals of civil liberties, human freedom, and economic progress even in time of crisis.

Olson lived through the last European war, when university professors were fired without a hearing on faked charges of being pro-German, when your own Senator SHIPSTEAD's house was painted yellow, when labor leaders were framed on charges of sabotage, when the accident of having been born abroad made men the subject of suspicion and persecution. To his everlasting credit let it not be forgotten that Floyd Olson stood firm against such hysteria and helped to rebuild the spirit of tolerance and fair play after that hysteria subsided.

Governor Olson was a forceful speaker and a great Governor. He recognized the difference between the stump speeches of a campaign and the speeches made by him as Governor of all the people. He carried his points by the force of his intellect and not by the heat of his utterance. In his position as chief executive he was calm, cool, and deliberate. Constantly he cautioned his real friends, the worker and the farmer, against those inflammatory tactics which destroy thought and boomerang in the end against the users. In times of great stress he never tried to get legislation passed by exciting the public mind.

Today as never before in the history of our country we need cool and analytical men of Olson's character, men who do not resort to the crude vocabulary of melodrama in discussing public affairs. We must guard against the incendiary word as we guard against the incendiary bomb; they are equally destructive of democracy. A few days ago the Philadelphia Record, recognized as one of the leading administration papers in this country, made the sensational statement that we are now in the European war. Under the heading "We're In" there appeared words such as these: "Make no mistake about it. The action of President Roosevelt and the Navy Department in deciding to send bombing planes and guns to the Allies puts us into the war on the side of England and France.

"We can't get half into the war and stay half out.

"We must recognize that Hitler and the German Nation already look upon our arming of the Allies as an act of war; that in German minds we are now a German foe as much as France or the British Empire.

"We're in."

If we are in this war, we are in it without the approval of the American people. At no time have the American people given a mandate to the President or to the Congress to lead us into war. We are still a democracy and we should find out by democratic process if the American people want war. It has been said that we will give the Allies all aid short of war. But what is short of war? Can we drive an automobile 80 miles an hour down a road toward a precipice, keep feeding the engine gas and suddenly stop short of the precipice? Are we to strip the United States of its planes, destroyers, and battleships one by one as those of the Allies are brought down or sunk and leave our country denuded of its already too few weapons?

These are large questions, and they must be calmly and thoroughly debated. The right answer cannot be found by a stampede of Congress. The answer can be found only by calm and cool deliberation.

A distinguished Senator the other day made an impassioned plea—he waved the "bloody shirt"—and all but demanded a declaration of war now. He closed by saying: "Wake up, Americans, wake up!" I repeat what he said, but for quite a different reason.

I say to you mothers of America, to the youth of the country, to the businessmen, and to the workers, wake up, or you'll find yourselves in war.

Your boys killed and maimed upon the battlefields of France; your hospitals and insane asylums filled; the debts of the country increased beyond all comprehension; and your American way of life gone forever. And for what?

At nearby Fort Snelling, in your State, stands one of the largest veterans' hospitals in the United States. There, row on row, floor on floor, lie the helpless wrecks of what were not so many years ago fine, healthy, young men. At St. Cloud is another institution housing those unfortunates who, though living in body, are dead in mind. Twenty years ago these men were the flower of Minnesota manhood, like the boys who are today in the university or in Carlton or in St. Olafs; they were the hope of their generation. But today they are the living testimonials of the last bloody war in Europe. Knowing these things—what do you think Floyd Olson would have said were he standing before you today aware of the forces at work to bring us again into the middle of Europe's turmoil?

Many people believe that the defeat of the Allies would mean an economic catastrophe for the United States. Undoubtedly the United States would be forced to readjust its foreign markets. But I would rather give up billions of dollars' worth of trade than the lives of millions of American boys. We are the richest nation in the world; we can tighten up our belts; we can work a little harder; some of those who want to get us into war might eat a little less and still preserve democracy—and the lives of our boys.

If we concentrate on solving our own economic problems at home and put $30,000,000,000 of idle capital to work, we will more than compensate for any possible loss in foreign trade.

If we should rush headlong into the European war, we would simply leave exposed our own domestic economy. Is not the sensible thing under the circumstances to build up our economy and at the same time build up our own defenses in a rational way?

If the people of this country want to go into another European war to save the world for democracy, with what will the country fight?

Our bare hands against the armored tanks and diving bombers of Mr. Hitler?

Will it fight with an Army of less than 300,000 men against the millions of trained mechanized forces of Germany?

Will it fight with its Navy and leave the Pacific bare to be attacked by Japan—an axis power who hates us?

Theodore Roosevelt said, "Speak softly and carry a big stick." What are we doing?

The truth is, we are not prepared to carry on a war across the seas; nor is any other country equipped to invade the United States.

Gen. George C. Marshall recently testified before a congressional committee that "we do not visualize any invasion of this country. An air raid or something of that sort is possible, but, frankly, at the present time we do not find it in the offing."

No one person and no one party is to blame for our lack of defensive weapons. It was during a Republican administration that we destroyed our ships, and it was during another Republican administration that we did little or nothing to build them up. The truth is, the American people are not militaristically inclined. We have not wanted to spend money on armaments; but today, whether we like it or not, whether we want to spend the money or not, we must spend to modernize our defenses. But we must at the same time keep out of this European war. You must watch closely the actions of your Government to see that nothing is done which is going to lead American boys to slaughter upon foreign soil.

Have you read the recently issued report of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee? This report, prepared by a group of hard-headed realists who deal daily with the problem of building battleships and destroyers and guns, says that for the United States to go to war would mean a tragic sacrifice of the Nation's liberties and assets. Do you know that this committee, after listening to the testimony of the highest-ranking officers of our armed forces in secret session, says that the United States is not prepared to give any nation concrete help by intervening now, and that we will only jeopardize our own welfare by doing so?

Do you know that this Naval Committee report asks a question? It asks—I quote: "Why not face the basic military and economic fact that it is not within our power or means to create military or naval establishments of sufficient strength to police the world, but that it is within our power and means to prevent others from transporting their wars to this hemisphere?"

The propagandists talk about the European shambles in words such as justice, freedom, and liberty. Those are precious words, and those are precious things, but I ask, Is it not true that the war in Europe is concerned with many other things besides abstract principles?

Let us first determine whether this is the same old ghastly European struggle over the balance of power; of age-old hatreds and age-old quarrels, or whether it truly is a war for civilization. Let us determine whether it is a fight for world markets; for oil wells and gold mines; or for democracy and Christianity. These are the real questions. They are being obscured by the bombardment of propaganda.

Who is better qualified to tell us whether we have a place in this war than our American Ambassador to Great Britain, the Honorable Joseph P. Kennedy? I will read to you what he frankly said only a few months ago:

"There is no place in this fight for us. It's going to be bad enough as it is. As you love America, don't let anything that comes out of any country in the world make you believe you can make a situation one whit better by getting into the war. * * * There is no reason—economic, financial, or social—to justify the United States entering the war."

Let us find out what Ambassador Kennedy meant when he said this was not our war. Let us get at the private papers, the secret correspondence that will answer these questions. But don't let us take as answers the nervous reactions and emotions of amateur strategists or frightened bankers.

Let us weigh our decision in the light of the lessons of the past. The first World War was followed by starvation and revolution in Europe. Then came international money lending on a huge scale and the biggest speculative boom the world has ever seen. Panic followed. Germany collapsed as the money lending ceased. Out of the debris and ruins rose Adolf Hitler. When he finally came into office he did not lack for friends in England or the United States. Many were the reactionary statesmen and international bankers who regarded him as a stabilizing force.

The same men who have been so tragically wrong in handling their own affairs now want the United States to make good their errors by an outpouring of our blood and treasure.

Let me call your attention to a statement made in the Senate the other day. A Senator was referring to one of the most active propaganda agencies in the United States—the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. They are placing full-page advertisements in all the leading papers of the country. Here is what the Senator said:

"Let us see the background of this committee * * * let us see who started it * * * 18 prominent bankers met secretly on the 29th day of April in New York to set up this committee."

Note that—"they met secretly." The Senator said the meeting was called by the former legal adviser of the British Embassy in the last World War, and among those who attended the secret meeting was Thomas W. Lamont, leading partner in the House of Morgan. Also there was Frank Polk, of the Morgan law firm. In other words, the same group of millionaires who helped drag us into the last war are back at the same old stand with the same old slogans endeavoring to get us into the present war. Of course, the last time they did not start out by saying we should send troops abroad—they merely started out by making loans abroad. The country should know where this propaganda is coming from and who the individuals are behind it.

Americans—don't let your boys be sacrificed for the sake of the British pound or the Wall Street dollar.

We in America today face an enemy. That enemy is the force that is slowly sapping the strength of our economic and financial system. Let it collapse, as it surely will if we are engulfed in another war, and democracy and liberty are gone. Wild-eyed leaders will arise, promising Utopia and bread. Reactionary leaders will also arise and promise more. Between them our people will be bedeviled. In the end some sort of disguised fascism will crack all of our democratic safeguards.

There is one sure way to produce that collapse—go into war. There is only one way to avoid it—stay out of war and correct the conditions that make 10,000,000 men idle and jobless. Seven years ago we started out in pursuit of this enemy. Three years ago we were talking about the ill-fed, ill-housed, and ill-clothed. What has become of them? They are still with us, but our thoughts are being turned to Europe, when we ought to be thinking today of making democracy work in America. That is the best way to preserve democracy at home and to help democracies abroad.

There are no victors in warfare, only famine and death. Starvation will engulf Europe—starvation and the revolution of oppressed minorities who cannot be kept forever under the conqueror's heel.

These are the realities of war, not the birth of a brave, new world. In Germany a soldier's mother is notified of her son's death these days by this cryptic telegram, "Your son will not come home. Heil Hitler." Let us not pave the way for American mothers to receive a telegram which also says, "Your son will not come home. Hail democracy."

Tonight I have dwelt at some length on the question of the war because I feel that is exactly what Governor Olson would have done were he alive. We who knew Governor Olson know how today he would be fighting to keep us out of war. I can see him standing here, with his great physique and magnificent voice. I can see him carefully recounting the facts about the hundreds of thousands of killed and maimed boys that fell in the last war.

I can hear him pointing out to the Northwest the dreadful cost in human lives, not to mention the billions of dollars spent in explosives on the battlefields of Europe. I can hear him distinguish between the farmers and workers whose toil will be exacted and whose backs will be bowed under the war debts and higher costs of living, and between these clippers of coupons and great banking houses whose income and investments will be enhanced by war making. And finally, I can hear Floyd Olson warning the Democratic and Republican Parties that a new and great liberal antiwar party will be created unless they bind themselves in unmistakable terms to a program of keeping the United States out of the European war.

To What Is This a Commencement?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY JUSTICE WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS AT MIDDLETOWN, CONN.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be published in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered by Justice William O. Douglas, of the United States Supreme Court, to the graduating class of Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., on Sunday evening, June 16, on which occasion an honorary degree was conferred upon Justice Douglas.

I commend this patriotic address to those who are deeply concerned with all the problems of these uncertain hours.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the minds of thousands of college men and women who join in this 1940 commencement there is a single question: To what is this a commencement? While generations of graduates have asked that question, on only few occasions has the question burned as strongly as it does now.

The class of 1940 sees its world overrun by relentless force. It sees freedom snuffed out by sheer might. And it has the uneasy feeling that these events threaten our own way of life. As a result, the vast majority of young men and women of 1940 are searching more than ever for the part they may play in constructive service in the democratic cause.

But on many a campus there is doubt and confusion—doubt and confusion bred by a minority whose words and deeds have preached a doctrine of disbelief.

There are a few who seem unaffected by the issue now at stake overseas. There are a few who are cynical and suspicious of the democratic system. They call it archaic, decadent, and degenerate. To them it is a futile, fumbling process which does not meet the requirements of this age. But they fail to realize that democracy is a way of life, not an empty phrase to be renounced under the pressure of opportunism.

In a world where the kind of democracy we Americans have struggled to preserve is being threatened, disbelief or complacency must not be an American attribute.

These preachers of the philosphy of disbelief are easy prey to the foreign agencies of force and hate. Disbelief in our free institutions, disbelief in the adequacy of our democratic system to meet the needs of all our people is fatal. Indeed that disbelief or complacency is itself the most potent ally which any foreign ideology can obtain.

In view of current events abroad, the task which lies ahead for you is clear and well defined.

As you take on your responsibilities of American citizenship you will find fault with the way in which this democratic system has been managed by the generations which have preceded. And those who follow you will doubtless criticize and strive to undo much which you will do. They, like you, will not agree with Walt Whitman that "there will never be any more perfection than there is now."

Dissatisfactions of youth have potential constructive qualities. The boundless energies, the broad vision and idealism, and the great creative capacity of youth are foremost national assets. Those qualities alone make for a reappraisal by each generation of the work of the earlier one. And kaleidoscopic change makes that reappraisal and reorientation necessary.

But as you appraise the old and seek to fashion the new, let the thrust of your reasoning go deep; let your perception and analysis be keen. It is easy to be deluded by the seeming efficiency of the new foreign systems. But that mirage is no excuse for following little men on white horses.

It is almost effortless to be critical. But disagreement with some of the imperfections of the democratic system is no reason for failing to support it in these times.

Our right to criticize is one of the sacred constitutional privileges of the system we cherish. But even that is a hard-won privilege. It has not always existed. It has recently disappeared in other nations. Its exercise entails certain moral responsibilities. Those moral responsibilities are to create by words and action a deep and abiding confidence in our free institutions. The enlistment of the full energy and ability of your generation in that endeavor will be sufficient answer to those who may use the selfsame privileges for an ignoble purpose.

To preserve liberties it is first essential to preserve the system which makes liberties possible. That cannot be left to chance or the law of averages. It must be underwritten by the firm resolves and the energies of the entire people. It cannot be entrusted to the purveyors of a philosophy of defeatism. That philosophy is itself one of the most virulent poisons in modern social thought.

It is essential to understand the origin of much of this flabby, cynical attitude. The easy days of recent decades created a false sense of security and an indolence of mind and spirit. It also produced in some a scoffing indifference and a lack of faith, and in others a sheer materialistic philosophy.

Those forces weakened the democratic process. Those who succumbed to those influences did not assume responsibility for the continuing vitality and successful functioning of that process. Men and women of your training and capacity withdrew from active participation in it to sow seeds of doubt, distrust, and disillusionment. Or they devoted themselves exclusively to the pursuit of private gain without saving any of their creative powers for the city, State, or Nation or for society.

But rights are founded on responsibilities. The rights of a free people cannot survive persistent indifference or neglect of the duties of a free people. Civilization under a democracy is not the result of wishful thinking or exhortation. It is the product of a morale and zeal, of character and strength generated by united, coordinated, and continuous effort in all walks of life and conditioned by basic human and spiritual values.

In perilous days such as these, vitality of the democratic ideal calls for a supreme effort—spiritual as well as physical. The opportunity of a free people to govern themselves is dependent solely on their capacity to do so.

As our civilization becomes more complicated it entails increasing effort and attention. As stated by Mr. Justice Holmes at the turn of this century:

"When it is said that we are too much occupied with the means of living to live, I answer that the chief worth of civilization is just that it makes the means of living more complex; that it calls for great and combined intellectual efforts, instead of simple, uncoordinated ones, in order that the crowd may be fed and clothed and housed and moved from place to place. * * * More complex and intense intellectual efforts mean a fuller and richer life. They mean more life."

Those who measure the abundancy of life by the amount and quality of creative effort which life demands will envy you your opportunity. That opportunity is not merely to provide temporary protection and shelter for the institution of a free people against current assaults by foreign ideologies. In its broad aspects it entails such a practical demonstration of the efficacy of the democratic system under our constitutional form of government that those foreign ideologies cannot possibly withstand the competition.

Today the continued existence of free institutions is at stake on a world scale. Religious freedom, freedom of speech, political and economic democracy, due process of law, equal protection of the laws, freedom of assembly, freedom of the press—these are the very ingredients of our democratic system; they are part of the warp and woof of our constitutional government. They were won by our forefathers after bitter struggles and tremendous sacrifices. The history of their acquisition as part of our rich inheritance is written in blood as well as ink.

They come down to you not as interesting historic relics but as vital instruments for fulfillment today, as well as yesterday, of the deep desires and urgings of a free people. They assure that human and spiritual values will not be sacrificed in coordinating a nation's energies and resources to satisfy a nation's needs. These are the principles on which our representative government was founded; they have guided it throughout the years as its course has been charted; they have conditioned and influenced the thoughts and actions of all our statesmen for 150 years.

These are times when final choices must be made. Events will not defer to indecision or faltering action. Nor is there any place now for grandstand citizenship. That era has passed. And it takes more than resolution to create an invincibility in the democratic system. Faith and a grim resolve alone will not carry the day.

A tough fiber is necessary. Active, continuous contribution in the daily tasks of all walks of life is also necessary. Self-discipline of a free people based upon knowledge of what is at stake, self-sacrifice for the good of the whole, efficient performance of each daily job, however humble it may be, continuous propagation of the democratic faith—these will produce a greater national strength than any foreign dictatorship can create in its slaves.

By making those contributions, whether in business or the professions, in clubs or in bureaus, in hamlets or in capitals, you will have become active participants in a gigantic enterprise to save and protect human decency and spiritual values against the advent of barbarism and a dark age.

Those who say that it makes no difference to us whether democracy abroad is crushed overlook the virulent quality of the disease which has affected the world. That disease is not a localized infection, it is in the blood stream of the world organism. Because we are part of that organism we are tremendously affected. The further that virulent infection spreads, the closer it comes to our own vitals. The more the resistance to it is broken down the greater the risk of the ultimate triumph of disease.

The groups through which you move, the communities in which you live, the organizations of which you are a part need not merely discerning analysis of the defects, maladjustments, and deficiencies of the past. They need also the benefit of directive influences, constructive statesmanship, and concrete suggestions and actions for realization of the full economic and social benefits of the democratic system.

You are among those who can supply that intellectual leadership. The necessity of supplying it will keep you close to the actualities of life and will make you attentive to the practical requirements of democracy in action. Your undertaking to assume that position of leadership will release enormous constructive energies. It will supply cohesion throughout this republic. It will give direction to the efforts of multitudes. It will create a potent common idealism that will make penetration from within woefully futile. It will also create a tolerance which is the basic quality of all our free institutions.

Your training, background, and perception qualify you for a preeminent role of intellectual leadership. The Nation can ill afford to have you refuse or neglect it. The mere necessities of earning a living, the satisfaction of your personal needs, must not stand in the way. If the energies diverted by an early generation to sheer pursuit of pleasure are harnessed by you in propagation of the democratic faith through words and deeds, any achievement is possible.

Full utilization of the resources, the manpower, the intellect, and the spiritual reserves of this free people will make the decline or subjugation of the democratic faith impossible. But to attain that goal awakening of the responsibilities of citizenship is essential. With that awakening and with a united endeavor on a real partnership basis, we would have such a regeneration of the democratic faith that foreign ideologies would be relegated to psychiatric wards. Without that regeneration implements of war may be feeble defenses, indeed.

To those who fashioned this country democracy was the meat and drink of life. In more recent decades too many have assumed that democracy was merely something to be inherited. They have forgotten that democracy must be practiced vigorously. Each generation must earn the right fully to enjoy it. You who are graduated today must dedicate yourselves to a regeneration of this democratic faith. You go out to preserve it or you perish as free men and women. The most important continuous contribution which you can now make is the propagation of that faith.

May your rich heritage of civil liberties be utilized in that cause.

The Nation does not doubt your enlightened resolution, your ability to perform this task. It has great hope, great faith in your generation.

And when the history of this age is written may it be said that from the charred ruins of the philosophy of force and hate there emerged on this continent with your help a world leadership in the cause of free people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM DETROIT NEWS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have pronted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very significant editorial from the Detroit News of June 12 entitled "Whoa, Mr. President! Not So Fast, Please!"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit News of June 12, 1940]

WHOA, MR. PRESIDENT! NOT SO FAST, PLEASE!

The eastern press, some sections of which already are advocating war, is saying that the President in his Charlottesville address at last rose to the occasion.

In our opinion, he rose considerably above the occasion and went far beyond the constitutional prerogatives of an American President.

The Constitution gives Congress sole power to declare war. President Roosevelt at Charlottesville himself declared war, or sought to declare war insofar as he could by committing this country to acts of war.

He said, as the Chief of State, "We will extend to the opponents of force (the Allies) the material resources of this Nation."

In so saying, he ripped away the thin disguise that had veiled his move, also without Congress' assent, to make Army supplies available to the Allies. In that, he had adopted the subterfuge of returning munitions to the manufacturers as "surplus" or "obsolescent." His promise that now "we" will extend aid identifies this aid as proceeding openly from the Government of the United States.

Under the Hague treaties on neutrality and by international usage such aid extended to a belligerent is an act of war. The President's acknowledgment of it has made this country a party to the war on the Allied side. Only action by Congress, which will be difficult, now can alter that.

Otherwise the country surely must be, if Germany wins, a party also to the peace and a fit subject for demands by the victor.

That means, barring action by Congress to restore neutrality, that the country already is in a position where it dare not let the Allies lose. It is committed to the war, and by a declaration, not of Congress but of the Chief Executive.

We do not believe the American people's support, to now, of the President's foreign policies contemplated any such usurpation of authority over the Nation's destiny. The people, of course, sympathize with the Allies and, on sympathetic grounds, overwhelmingly desire the defeat of Germany. But we do not believe they are ready to go to war, as the present policy says they must, to prevent an Allied defeat.

We hope the people will not mistake that clear meaning of the President's statement. He said, it is true, that simultaneously with the aid the Government will extend the Allies, the policy will be pressed of building up American defense against the possibility of German victory. Thus, by implication, there will be no military action by the United States, except in defense of our own hemisphere.

But let us look at that proposition clearly. Once committed to the war as a nonbelligerent against Germany, would the United States wait, before giving military aid abroad, until its Allies were utterly defeated and impotent? We think not. The present course, if the war lasts that long, will take the United States into it within a period of months.

That unspoken promise was to be found in what the President himself said at Charlottesville of the consequences for this country of a German victory, leaving it "a lone island in a world dominated by the philosophy of force." The philosophy of force in truth has dominated the world of nations since the beginning of history—but let that pass and consider the President's prediction that in such a world the lot of Americans would be "a hopeless nightmare of a people without freedom, a people lodged in prison, handcuffed, hungry, etc."

If that is but half true, what are we waiting for? A President seeing such a fate in store for his country could not honorably delay long in sending to Congress, constitutionally, the message that will set our young men to fighting against it.

If the people agree to that prospect, well and good. But if it is not their sober and solemn conviction that the outcome of German victory would be as bad for America—for a well-armed and alert America—as their President's emotionally impulsive oratory has pictured it, let them speak up now before it is too late.

Let them call on Congress to restore American neutrality, so that aid extended the Allies will be confined to private sources and means countenanced by international law.

REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY N. ROUTZOHN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday my colleague the gentleman from California, Mr. LELAND M. FORD, called attention to some of the nefarious work of Harry Bridges on the Pacific coast, stating that 14 ships were tied up in San Pedro Harbor by reason of the work there of Harry Bridges at the present time. Subsequent to that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, and who is chairman of the committee on which I have the honor to serve, read a telegram from the Los Angeles Steamship Association stating that the tie-up was due to a jurisdictional dispute between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. I shall place in the RECORD a letter from the A. F. of L., over the signature of George Meany, secretary-treasurer, showing that it is not a jurisdictional dispute; that there is no difficulty whatsoever between the employer and employees; and that the entire matter is a C. I. O., Harry Bridges, high-binding effort to sabotage valid contracts and satisfactory relations existing between the Consolidated Steel Corporation and A. F. of L. organizations. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include the letter to which I referred.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1940.

Hon. HARRY N. ROUTZOHN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ROUTZOHN: In response to your inquiry, I am submitting to you from our official reports the record in connection with the C. I. O. picket line at the Consolidated Steel Corporation plant at Long Beach, Calif., where four Maritime Commission ships are being built. This record given to you can be verified by Mayor Bowron, of Los Angeles; Mayor Gentry, of Long Beach; and by Chief of Police William C. Wright, of Long Beach.

The Consolidated Steel Corporation is the largest steel fabricating plant in California. It erects steel for buildings, for oil-field work, and builds bridges throughout the States west of the Rocky Mountains. For several years it has had an agreement with the A. F. of L. Structural Iron Workers' Union which provided that all of its erecting work would be done by members of that organization.

When the Consolidated Steel Corporation entered into contracts with the Maritime Commission for the building of ships the A. F. of L. representatives of the workers involved started negotiations with the company with the idea in mind of securing the same type of agreement for the unions whose members would be employed in the shipyard. As a result, on May 13, 1940, a collective-bargaining agreement, the negotiating of which had been going on for several months, was formally signed by the Consolidated Steel Corporation; the metal-trades department of the American Federation of Labor; the building and construction trades department of the American Federation of Labor; the Central Labor Council, the Building Trades Council, and the Metal Trades Council, of the city of Los Angeles, and by the national representatives of all of the A. F. of L. unions whose members would be employed. This agreement is what is known as a union-shop agreement.

Immediately after this collective-bargaining agreement had been signed a C. I. O. committee visited Mayor Bowron, of Los Angeles, and indicated to him that serious consequences would follow unless this collective-bargaining contract with the Consolidated Steel Corporation was canceled, A. F. of L. members thrown out of the Consolidated Steel Corporation's employment, and none but C. I. O. members employed.

The following day, at a conference between Mayor Bowron and Mayor Gentry held in Long Beach, a committee from the C. I. O. threatened that unless A. F. of L. members were thrown out of work and C. I. O. members employed in their places there would be riot and bloodshed and the probable tie-up of the entire port of Los Angeles.

The C. I. O. water-front unions in California, which have been incidentally under the complete direction of an Australian by the name of Bridges for some time, began to stir up sentiment by means of a radio broadcast for a picket line to be thrown around the Consolidated yard in Long Beach for the purpose of preventing A. F. of L. workmen from going to work and carrying out their part of the collective-bargaining agreement heretofore mentioned.

There are three ship-repair yards on the San Pedro side of the harbor, which employ C. I. O. workmen. The C. I. O. broadcasters advised their men employed in these yards to refuse to go to work at the regular starting time in order that they might assist in picketing the Consolidated yard, and carry out the C. I. O. purpose of preventing the A. F. of L. workmen from going to work. These instructions from the radio broadcasters representing the C. I. O. were carried out and the picket line designed to prevent our members from going to work rapidly increased until over 1,500 pickets were in front of the Consolidated yard. However, the police kept an open passage through the yard gate and our members were able to report for work, although compelled to assemble at the Labor Temple in Long Beach and to be conveyed by bus to the plant in order to do so.

There is no question of jurisdiction involved in this situation. The American Federation of Labor, through its representative organizations, has negotiated this contract with the employer and is carrying out this contract by erecting ships according to its terms. The C. I. O. has no men in this plant. In fact, they do not seem to have anything in this plant except a desire to compel both workers and employer to carry out their activities under the domination of Mr. Bridges. Their action in picketing the Consolidated yard in Long Beach, Calif., is just about as justifiable as Hitler's invasion of Luxemburg, Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium.

Despite all their efforts, however, the American Federation of Labor is carrying out its contract with the Consolidated Steel Corporation and the Maritime Commission ships are being built according to schedule. However, the failure of the C. I. O. to be successful in this effort has led them to establish picket lines in front of any shop in this locality where an A. F. of L. man is employed irrespective of whether or not the C. I. O. has any grievance in the plant. This picketing has brought about other picketing in retaliation against C. I. O. plants in San Pedro and Long Beach.

Our latest information is that a conciliator endeavored to effect an adjustment in this area between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. by an agreement between both organizations that the picketing of the other's plants should immediately cease. The C. I. O. and A. F. of L. both agreed to this, but last evening we were informed that the C. I. O. has repudiated this agreement and is now again picketing A. F. of L. shops on the San Pedro side of the harbor with the object of driving all A. F. of L. members from that city.

The picketing still continues at the Consolidated plant but despite this the full force of employees has gone to work daily and as mentioned heretofore there has been no interference with the progress schedule of maritime ship construction in the Consolidated Steel Corporation's yard.

Trusting that the information contained in this letter presents a full answer to your inquiry, I am,

Very truly yours,

GEORGE MEANY,
Secretary-Treasurer, American Federation of Labor.

Rebuilding America—Rural Electrification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 18, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN E. RANKIN, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an address which I delivered over a Nation-wide radio hook-up of the National Broadcasting Co. here in Washington this afternoon.

Ladies and gentleman of the radio audience, I am addressing my remarks today to the farmers of America. In the beginning I want to thank the National Broadcasting Co. and associated radio stations, for giving me this opportunity to speak for a few minutes to the tillers of the soil, the farmers of the Nation, who constitute our first line of defense, and form the bulwark of our American institutions—the men and women whose toil feeds and clothes the world, who labor the longest hours, pay the highest taxes, endure the most hardships, and receive the smallest compensation per hour of any laborers in America—who fight the country's battles in times of war and sustain its institutions in times of peace.

We are in the midst of a great movement to build up our national defenses. If we desire to make our country strong, impregnable, invincible by any force which the nations of the world might send against us, the best thing we can do is to promote the prosperity and improve the living conditions of the people in the rural districts; and the greatest movement that has yet been instituted toward that end is that of rural electrification—taking to the farmers of this Nation the benefits of electricity, the world's greatest national resource outside of the soil from which we live, and supplying it to them at rates they can afford to pay—rates based upon the actual cost of generation, transmission, and distribution.

Speaking of national defense, let me disabuse your minds of any idea that Congress is preparing to plunge this country into the European war. Practically all of us sympathize with the Allies in their present struggle, and everything has been done to aid them that could be done under the circumstances, within the bounds of international law—everything short of war. But that does not mean that we are preparing to plunge into the conflict ourselves. We don't know what the future might bring, but a careful survey of the present Congress indicates that the Members of the House of Representatives are unanimously opposed to plunging this country into the European war. And I might add that they are opposed to a final adjournment of Congress at this time. A majority of the Members feel as I do that we ought to remain in session during this crisis.

But we are building up the defenses of the Nation as rapidly as possible, in order to make our country so strong that no foreign power, or combination of foreign powers, would dare attack us—now or in the years to come.

But I want to talk to you for a few minutes about the war that never ends—the unceasing war the farmers have to wage against all enemies, from the vicissitudes of the weather to the fluctuations of the stock market.

The farmers of this country have had imposed upon them by a former administration tariffs, or indirect taxes, that levied a tax upon everything they had to buy from the cradle to the grave; the farmers pay the highest transportation rates known, and the highest rate of taxes according to the incomes they earn. They have paid the highest interest rates, and up to the time this administration came into power, nine out of ten of them were denied the use of any electricity at all.

Seven years ago I began the drive to electrify the farm homes of America; to provide the farmers with electricity to light their homes, operate their radios, their water pumps, their washing machines, their electric irons, their refrigerators, their feed grinders, and all those other appliances that go to make farm life more pleasant and more attractive, lighten the farmer's burdens, and lift from the shoulders of the farm women the loads of drudgery under which they have struggled throughout the centuries. In this battle I have had the support of the liberal-minded Members of the House and Senate, as well as that of the administration itself, and our success has exceeded even our fondest expectations.

Yet we have just begun; this battle must be carried on until we electrify every farm home in America at reasonable rates, or at rates based upon the actual cost of generation, transmission, and distribution. My goal is to get this power to every farmer at the standard T. V. A. rates, or at the rates now charged the farmers in the Tennessee Valley area, which are as follows:

The first 50 kilowatt-hours a month, 3 cents a kilowatt-hour.
Next 150 kilowatt-hours a month, 2 cents a kilowatt-hour.
Next 200 kilowatt-hours a month, 1 cent a kilowatt-hour.
Next 1,000 kilowatt-hours a month, 4 mills a kilowatt-hour.

Now let me repeat those rates, so that you can take them down:

The first 50 kilowatt-hours, 3 cents a kilowatt-hour.
Next 150 kilowatt-hours, 2 cents a kilowatt-hour.
Next 200 kilowatt-hours, 1 cent a kilowatt hour.
Next 1,000 kilowatt-hours, 4 mills a kilowatt hour.

I know it will be pointed out that the farmers in the T. V. A. area are being charged 4 cents instead of 3 cents for the first 50 kilowatt-hours and 3 cents instead of 2 cents for the next 50 kilowatt-hours a month. But that extra 1 cent on the first 100 kilowatt-hours a month goes to pay for his lines. When they are paid out that extra 1 cent on the first 100 kilowatt-hours will be taken off.

Two years ago I went on the floor of the House and demanded that $100,000,000 be provided for rural electrification for the next fiscal year. Many Members felt that the amount was too large, but when these funds were made available the demand was so great that they were soon exhausted. By that time I was like the Chinaman who saw the bear trailing him through the snow in Alaska. He said, "Ah, you lika my tracks, I make you some more." The farmers liked this procedure so well that at this session of Congress I secured an extra $60,000,000, which, added to the $40,000,000 already provided, will give us $100,000,000 for rural electrification during the coming fiscal year. Now, don't any of you city folks who are listening get excited. This money will all be paid back.

I have also secured the adoption of a provision in the relief bill, or the lending-spending bill, to permit cooperative power associations to use W. P. A. labor in building their rural lines, in order to reduce the cost and enable them to build additional miles of lines through the sparsely settled areas and to reach every home in the territory covered by one of these cooperative associations.

I hope each and every cooperative power association throughout the country will take advantage of this provision and help us to electrify every farm home in America. We are also making a drive to provide cooperative cold-storage units for the rural communities throughout the Nation in order to enable farmers to save their meats, vegetables, poultry, eggs, milk, etc., and have them fresh at all times of the year, thereby saving millions of pounds of food that is now going to waste every year.

We are rebuilding the farm communities of our country. The trek from the farm to the cities is on the wane. The movement is now back to the farm. The deserted village is coming back.

Under this program farmers in the rural communities may enjoy all the comforts and conveniences of city life without the noise, the jams, the city taxes, and other annoyances or inconveniences.

Your Congressman can aid you greatly in working out this program if he is in sympathy with rural electrification. If he is not in sympathy with it, you can easily find it out. He that is not with us is against us; any man who throws cold water on this program is opposed to it at heart.

I repeat, this is the greatest movement for the benefit of the American farmers that has yet been instituted, and I hope that everyone, in Congress or out of Congress, who is in sympathy with it will snap into it and help us to rebuild the farming sections of America and make this the richest, the brightest, the most prosperous, the strongest, and most contented Nation this world has ever seen.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES G. SCRUGHAM

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the amazing collapse of the democratic governments of Norway, Belgium, Holland, and France within the past few weeks, and the perilous position of the far-flung British Empire, should focus the attention of every citizen on the critical situation confronting our own country.

Following the complacent and somewhat egotistical spirit of the military leaders of England, France, and our own country, we have lived for more than 20 years in a literal fool's paradise insofar as the problem of national defense is concerned. The day is now here when the best thought and energy of the leadership of America must be devoted to an effective campaign for domestic rearmament. This program is now in its formative stage and has the following objectives:

First. To increase domestic production for military and civilian needs.

Second. To develop and study transportation of all kinds.

Third. To study the availability of all kinds of military supplies.

Fourth. To coordinate efforts of producers and to allocate raw materials available to manufacturers according to priority of need.

Fifth. To establish harmonious relations between consumers, industrialists, and labor.

Sixth. To make places for those persons, especially veterans of the last war, who through physical infirmity or otherwise cannot take active parts in the above-mentioned lines of endeavor.

At the outset it must be clearly understood that the Nation is in the throes of what may be termed a "transition economy." Old motivations of individual initiative and of profit and loss are being changed. The entire Nation is beginning to operate under a coordinated economy vaguely similar to the Fascist states of Europe. For example, automobile manufacturers may not bring out new-model cars but will devote their available personnel and machinery to the manufacture of tanks and airplanes regardless of profit. Steel works will concentrate on the production of parts for warships, armor plate, and so forth, instead of seeking new business elsewhere. Miners will seek to produce strategic minerals such as tungsten, manganese, mercury, and antimony instead of the usual production of gold, silver, and copper, and so forth. Sooner or later this transition economy will affect nearly every business in the United States.

The President has already appointed a National Defense Commission to study and report on the rearmament problems, and Congress has made ample appropriations to put their recommendations in effect.

Of most direct interest to the State of Nevada is one of the projects to utilize the services of war veterans and others who do not fit into the general plan for industrial mobilization. On the extreme southern end of the State lies an area of some 3,800 acres situated in the Colorado River bottom lands. Water for irrigation is readily available by pumping, and adequate funds are carried in the 1941 Interior appropriation bill to fully finance the project. A law has been passed by Congress to permit the lease or sale of 5-acre tracts thereon for home, camp, health, recreational, convalescent, or business sites. The climate is similar to that of Indio, Calif., and a number of date trees planted some 10 years ago are in thriving condition. The soil is generally coarse and sandy and will probably require humus and fertilizers for best results. It is expected that detailed plans for opening the project for settlement will be made within the next 60 days. At the present time further studies are being made by the Departments of Interior and Agriculture, together with the Veterans' Administration, looking to the most advantageous uses of the land. Persons who take up the tracts offered under the project are expected to have some outside sources of income, such as a pension or wages from nearby employment. For such persons the project offers extraordinary attraction.

The Nazi "Fifth Column" in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, recently I had the honor of addressing the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League to Champion Human Rights at its seventh annual national convention at the Hotel Astor in New York. It is one of our foremost organizations devoted to real Americanism and to the defense of our democratic traditions against the onslaught of the "fifth column."

I shall take the liberty of giving excerpts from the remarks I addressed to the delegates, feeling that they may be of interest, in view of recent developments:

[Excerpts from address delivered by Representative SAMUEL DICKSTEIN at the Seventh Annual Convention of the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League, June 2, 1940]

The most active and dangerous elements of the "fifth column" in the United States are not aliens, but citizens, many of them in high places. These are the people to be feared, not the alien who, for the most part, is a law-abiding, hard-working victim of European oppression.

Long before the present hue and cry about the "fifth column" here, I pointed out its dangers and asked that some preventive action be taken. Time and again I warned the people of the United States not to allow their democratic system to be taken advantage of by groups and individuals, seeking its overthrow.

But I also wish to take my stand now against the hysterical rabble rousing of certain influential individuals—found even in the United States Senate and House of Representatives—who are banking on the confusion in which the American people have been thrown by the fear of nazi-ism, to push what I will not hesitate to call their own totalitarian measures across.

The civil liberties of aliens must be protected with as much vigor as those of citizens. Thomas Jefferson, condemning the pernicious alien and sedition laws of his day, wrote:

"The friendless alien has indeed been selected as the safest subject of a first experiment but the citizen will soon follow."

We have no right to condemn an alien as such. Some aliens are of course intriguing against our Government just as some citizens are. But let us not lump the innocent with the guilty in a manner reminiscent of the worst practices of a dictatorship. We in America still believe in the dignity of man—of every man, be he citizen or alien. * * *

Let us not fall prey to the sinister designs of "fifth column" elements who are chuckling as they see the American people beguiled into acceding to measures destroying civil liberties—measures which would have been recognized as Nazi-inspired at some other period.

The "fifth columnists" to be feared and denounced are not merely the alien groups, who can be easily identified and guarded against, but rather those influential individuals pretending to be 200-percent Americans who are actually the American counterpart of the Quislings and the Moseleys.

In line with Senator NORRIS, I do not feel that transferring the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice was the wisest thing to do. Although the F. B. I. and the Justice Department are doing a magnificent job and deserve wide support, it is not as fitted to handle the immigrant and set him on the right path as the Department of Labor. Inasmuch as the transfer has been approved, however, I will not say more than to express the hope that alien regulation does not lead to alien persecution.

On the other hand, alien regulation may lead to the ferreting out of the spies deliberately planted here by Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and Soviet Russia, whose agents, aided by native Fascist groups, form the "fifth column" in the United States.

In the past few years seamen on German ships have arrived here with orders to "jump ship" and "disappear" somewhere in the United States, where they can carry on their propaganda and, if necessary, sabotage. I have documentary evidence proving that German seamen, deliberately sent here and illegally in this country, are part of the Nazi network of spies and saboteurs.

I accuse the German diplomatic staff here of carrying on propaganda against our Government while taking advantage of their diplomatic immunity. * * * Nazi propaganda and "fifth column" activity are linked to the German consulates in the United States.

The Dies committee has not performed the things expected by Congress. It has spent large sums of money merely to scratch the surface of subversive activity. * * * It has recommended no effective laws to combat the "fifth column" menace.

I would also like to quote a few passages from the speech delivered by the chairman of the executive committee of the league:

At present some of these Nazi-inspired "Americans" are on trial for alleged attempts to organize a revolt against our Government, a putsch, a la Hitler. Their plans, as brought out, were typically Hitlerian. There are numerous others, leaders of native organizations who boast of their plans of forceful capture of the Government by their uniformed gangs a la Mussolini's black-shirted or Hitler's brown-shirted brigands.

These native traitors serve as the carriers of the Nazi infection to the American people. They spew their poisonous propaganda from street corners, in halls, in parks, from some church pulpits, through the radio, and serve as termites to undermine our American institutions.

In spite of the obvious inhuman barbarism of the Nazi military machine, which overruns and destroys neighboring countries, imprisons, robs, and murders innumerable thousands of innocent, inoffensive human beings, and drives the German, as well as all other peoples it can reach, back to the Dark Ages, these Nazi agents and Nazi apologists continue to preach to the American people nazi-ism and totalitarianism. By means of every brazen lie and subterfuge which only a degenerate Nazi mind could invent, they seek to influence the American people to exchange their heritage of freedom for the yoke of the Nazi Fuehrer.

These traitors serve Hitler not only by attacking our own free institutions with "arguments" supplied by the Nazi propaganda machine, but also by attacking all of Hitler's opponents. Especially do they concentrate now on attacking the Allies as "warmongers" who forced the innocent Nazis into this war. The devil himself could not have invented a more diabolical joke. They apparently hope that no one will notice that every attack on the Allies is a direct service to the Nazis.

The combination of spies, Nazi agents, saboteurs, and our native traitors form the Nazi "fifth column" in the United States. The Nazi military machine used such columns successfully in subjugating, disorganizing, and conquering neighboring countries. They are attempting to do the same here in our country.

During the last year, the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League has done much to help investigate, uncover, and expose the Nazi "fifth column" in the United States. This Nazi-inspired army of traitors consists of the various hate groups engaged in subversive activities and in plotting against the freedom, safety, and security of our country. That we struck a vulnerable point in the enemy's ranks, is attested to by the fact that the spokesmen of the Nazi-inspired groups from the petty fuehrer's of the "mobilizers" to the Nazi spokesmen in the Halls of Congress are singling out our league for their most vicious attacks.

In every one of these groups we found Nazis and Nazi agents among the leaders. Whether the poisonous propaganda was distributed on street corners, or from church pulpits, by means of mimeographed circulars, or through the pages of newspapers, whether the plots were to organize street fights or to manufacture bombs in an effort to overthrow our Government by violence, everywhere we found the hands of the Nazis or their agents as organizers, leaders, and plotters. The Nazi octopus which has spread its tentacles all over our country, has a firm grip on the entire "fifth column" in all its foreign or native battalions.

In Poland, in Norway, in Denmark, in Holland, and in Belgium the Nazi and native traitors were considered harmless cranks and were permitted to carry on their nefarious plots. Millions of innocent people are now paying with their lives for underestimating the potential danger of tolerating such traitors.

We must not repeat that mistake. We must take the proper and timely precautions so that it shall not happen here.

In this fateful hour, when a new barbarism rages in Europe, and dark storm clouds spread and threaten to engulf the entire civilized world, in this hour of great and ever-growing danger to all people who love liberty and cherish freedom, we must rededicate ourselves to the fight against this new monster-Nazi barbarism. We must redouble our efforts to uncover, unmask, and expose the Nazi-inspired, imported, and native traitors in our own country who seek to destroy our democracy. We must counteract their poisonous propaganda irrespective of whether they masquerade in red, brown, black, silver, white, or dirty shirts, and regardless of whether they spew their poison from soap boxes on street corners, from church pulpits, or from the exalted seats of legislatures.

To this goal—the preservation and defense of our freedom and of our democracy, we, like the founders of our Republic, pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

The publication of the league, the Anti-Nazi Bulletin, in its convention issue, contained many articles of interest to all Americans. I cannot resist quoting a few words from the article on Nazi propaganda by Jay Field, who writes:

The truth, like spring sunlight, will make the creatures of fascism crawl back into the woodwork.

Finally, may I quote the text of a message to the American people, signed by consular representatives of countries invaded by Nazi Germany, which was read to the assembled delegates:

A MESSAGE TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES

Yesterday we lived in peace, as free citizens of free independent nations. Today we are enslaved by a huge war machine. Our countries have been ravished; our homes destroyed. All we have left are homeless, hungry people—and the will to live as free men again.

Too long we permitted traitors to use our democratic freedom in order to help the Nazi invaders bring about its downfall. We were warned, yet the measures we took were not sufficient to hold back the enemy. Part of our armies were forced to fight against the "fifth column" in our very midst.

We who cherish the ideals of democracy, and hope once more to be free and independent, send this message to the people of the United States:

Only by constant vigilance can you hope to save those things which are dear to you. Only by unceasing care and determination to keep your democracy dynamic and alert to the perils of enemies within and without, can you preserve your liberties. Thereby the tradition of American democracy will remain an inspiration to an embattled world.

(Signed by consulates of invaded nations.)

America's Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered recently over the radio:

The grave situation which confronts the American people today is not of our making, nevertheless it is here, very real and menacing. The time has come to face the facts as they are, unflinchingly, with courage, and with intelligence. Only cowards will wince and only the ostrich-like will bury their heads in the sand and refuse to meet the issues. How we deport ourselves now will determine not only the future of this country but perhaps of the whole world. If we think like men of action and act like men of thought, we are not too late. If, on the other hand, we vacillate and wobble in indecision we are sealing the fate of free people for generations to come. This is a time provided by God to try the souls of men. This is a test of our competency as a democratic nation. The results will decide whether we have a right to survive as a free people. The problems are baffling and only a great people of tremendous capacity and vitality can solve them. Democracy as an exterior form cannot pull us through the troubled days which lie ahead unless we, as a people, prove ourselves capable of assuming the responsibilities which are inherent in this world situation. The time has come to chart a careful and clearly defined course. No longer can we speed ahead all sail and no rudder, nor can we formulate a program or fix a goal unless we understand our problems.

The struggles raging throughout the world today are not wholly the results of ancient blood feuds or of traditional national hatreds. They are the clash of ideologies as far opposite as the two poles. Two separate and distinct philosophies of life are engaged in a death struggle for supremacy. If the forces of atheism and dictatorship conquer the Allied democracies, the whole world will be changed. We Americans are accustomed to living in a world of comparative law and order. Our economy has been adjusted to that kind of world. Our political structure is in tune with it and above all, our safety depends on it. We have enjoyed high standards of living in America because our substance has not been wasted on vast armament programs. This has been possible because the British Navy has been a mighty guaranty of peace in the Atlantic Ocean and because the balance of power in Europe has held in check the forces of aggression. These defenses are being smashed before our very eyes. The power in Europe is unbalanced and weighs heavily in favor of Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin.

If my premise is correct, what are we to do about it? First of all we must prepare for the worst, and inaugurate a defense program which will make us so formidable that none of these modern Genghis Khans will dare trifle with us. I am not going to spend much time on this phase of our policy because the American people almost unanimously support our defense program. I say almost unanimously because the Communists', the pro-Nazis', and the Fascists' "fifth columnists" are all opposing it with every subtle and devious method created by the cunning minds of men. Their anti-defense propaganda is a dish prepared by rogues for fools to gulp. A defenseless America is a temptation and an invitation. A powerful America is a grim and potent warning.

Secondly, we should recognize the fact that the Allies are fighting today for everything which we hold dear—yes; they are fighting our battles, and if they lose some day we may be forced to stand alone against the mechanized columns of Mr. Hitler. Ninety-nine percent of the American people will be jubilant if the Allies are victorious. Our fears will disappear, our huge defense program will be unnecessary, and our future as a free people will be assured for years to come. What we fear is a German victory. If that is true, and it is, then it falls logically that we should do everything within our power to prevent it. We should aid the Allies with all of our economic resources—without, of course, impairing our own safety—and with all our moral support. When I speak these words I am not motivated by stick-candy sentimentalism nor by any moral persuasion that we will be engaged in a struggle to save democracy. Both may be true, but I wish to place my argument on a real and factual basis, and so I repeat that for purely selfish reasons we should aid the Allies with all our economic might. By aiding the Allies we are helping ourselves. We will be enlisting economic legions for our own defense. We will be taking decisive steps to guarantee not only our own security but that of our children. We will be assisting in maintaining an orderly world, fit to live in. Lending the Allies our economic resources today may save men from dying on the battlefields of tomorrow.

Some of you may challenge me at this point by stating that this policy is unneutral. I am not neutral and neither are you. I am no more neutral with regard to this struggle than I would be in the case of an armed thug attacking a peaceful citizen or of a burglar threatening my neighbor's life. The word "neutral" is derived from neuter and neuter means nothing—neither one thing nor another. Can our great freedom-loving America be neuter—nothing—where a struggle is in progress between right and wrong? I do not think so. Great Britain and France were relatively indifferent toward the fate of Manchuria. This indifference encouraged the invasion of Ethiopia, then Austria. Their indecision encouraged the ravishment of the Sudetenland, Albania, and Czechoslovakia. Their neutrality, now referred to as appeasement, was an open invitation to the dictators to invade Poland, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia. The fates of Finland, Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands, and Belgium are the direct result of this neuter policy of being neither one thing nor another, and oh! what a price the democracies are paying for this folly. Peaceful nations, whose only guilt was that of economic success and prosperity, have fallen like ripe plums into the laps of the conquerors. No; being a neutral is not the answer to the challenge which confronts us. Such an attitude will merely encourage further aggression.

Some of you may argue that this war is none of our business. My answer is that this war is very much our business. I am advocating an honest policy of defense and if that is not our business, pray tell me what is. Many people fail to realize that aggression breeds aggression. Having adopted a policy of conquest, Hitler cannot stop for long. Ruthlessly he will impose his economic and political principles on other peoples. He will be forced to do so in order to survive. You call this war none of our business? Let me read a pamphlet distributed by Nazi agents in Veracruz, Mexico, several days ago. I quote, "Long live Mexico, free, great, and powerful, with her states of Texas, California, Arizona, and Colorado. Long live the German people and welcome to Mussolini's fascists." There is the implied promise to Mexico that if she will cooperate with Nazi Germany against the United States, Texas, California, Arizona, and Colorado will be returned to her. Germany is already promising Mexico four American States as a reward for belligerency against us.

This war none of our business? When Nazi agents work daily to establish governments in South America which will be unfriendly to the United States! This war none of our business? Think of Canada, a belligerent nation. As Hitler subjugates the British Isles, he will turn his attention to our northern neighbor. It is a large prize with territory exceeding our own and with only 10,000,000 people to develop its vast resources. Today, we enjoy 3,000 miles of common frontier with Canada. There is not a single fortification along this entire line. If Mr. Hitler establishes himself as our neighbor on the north, this 3,000 miles of common boundary will literally bristle with armaments and fortifications. The cost will be terrific and the threat to our safety constant.

This war none of our business? Consider, if you will, the loss of profitable trade which we have already suffered: Norway and Denmark, $56,000,000; Czechoslovakia, $65,000,000; the Netherlands, $97,000,000; Belgium, $65,000,000. Thousands of men and women were employed gainfully in producing these goods. The economic impact of these losses will soon be felt.

This war none of our business? When you say that consider our status if Germany is victorious. We will be living in a constant state of imminent warfare, preparing feverishly for any eventuality, weakening our economic structure in a mad race to keep abreast of the dictators, burdening our people with an onerous tax load, and all of this when our trade is shrinking, rendering us less able to pay the bill. Visualize America if the Allies are defeated, alone and friendless. We will stand as the last bulwark of democracy struggling to exist against frightful odds. Does anyone honestly believe that we can remain an isle of progress and plenty in a sea of chaos and destruction? If we refuse to aid the Allies now the isolationists in America will have their day. America will be so isolated that she may disappear forever as a land of opportunity. Remember that when the torch of liberty is snuffed out anywhere in the world it burns dimmer here at home.

Let us consider another phase of this subject in a cold-blooded and selfish attitude. The more we aid the Allies, the more rapidly we develop our productive capacity, which some day will be used to provide armaments for our own defense. We must expand our productive capacity. Today, by their purchases, the Allies are assisting us in developing these facilities. The Allies are actually paying a bill which we would have to assume ourselves otherwise. It is distasteful for me personally to regard this situation from an entirely selfish viewpoint, but I am trying to present it to you as a real and factual proposition.

In order to strengthen our first line of defense, which is the allied cause, I am advocating the following steps:

1. Offer England and France the much-needed repair facilities in American dockyards so that if their own bases are destroyed the Allies can still wage naval and economic warfare on a world-wide scale.

2. Supply France and Britain with all the planes we can manufacture. More immediately, we should provide such planes as our Army and Navy can spare at the moment. This, of course, with the understanding that they will be immediately replaced as our production facilities are increased.

3. To cooperate in every possible way in the continuing Allied economic and financial blockade of the totalitarian states.

4. To repeal the existing restrictive provisions of the neutrality law which prevent us from aiding the Allies despite the overwhelming sentiments of our people.

5. Rush all surplus foodstuffs, medical supplies, clothing, cotton goods to the women and children who are innocent victims of this war. Not only is that a humanitarian gesture, worthy of our people, but it will relieve the Allied governments of the expense of providing these necessities, thereby releasing additional sums for much needed armaments.

The foregoing program is not neutral. It is not intended to be. It is nonbelligerent, however, and that is as it should be. Not once have I suggested sending armed forces to Europe. I am as much opposed to that as you are. The steps which I have just outlined, if immediately enacted, will preclude the possibility of this Nation becoming engaged in actual warfare. If the Allies, with our help, can hold the invaders at bay, it will not be necessary for us to fight for years to come, even in our own defense. The program which I have outlined is decisive and affirmative. That is as it should be. It is the only attitude which men like Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin respect. It is said freely in the German and Italian press that the American people are impotent and frightened. We are brushed aside as a negligible factor until all the rest of the world has been subdued and the triumphant forces of the predatory powers can be concentrated on our destruction. America is neither helpless nor frightened. She is rapidly becoming aroused from her sleepy indifference. The events of the past month have violated her sense of justice. She is determined now to preserve her heritage and to play her part in bringing order to a troubled world.

The Bridges Deportation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

ARTICLE BY CHARLES G. ROSS

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Charles G. Ross, from yesterday's issue of the Washington Evening Star:

[From the Washington Star of June 17, 1940]

BRIDGES BILL EXAMPLE OF HYSTERIA—"LEGISLATIVE LYNCHING" SEEN MORE HARMFUL THAN ANY ALIEN

(By Charles G. Ross)

Talk about mass hysteria. The august House of Representatives of the United States gave a prize exhibition of it last week when it did something never before done in the history of the country: Passed a bill for the deportation of a single alien, one Harry R. Bridges. The vote, believe it or not, was 330 in favor of the bill, and only 42 against.

The names of the 42 deserve to be printed on a special roll of honor. At the risk of seeming invidious, I list here, to show the quality of the opposition, the four Republicans, out of those voting, who refused to be swept off their feet:

BRUCE BARTON of New York.

ROBERT LUCE, of Massachusetts.

WILLIAM J. MILLER, of Connecticut, who lost both his legs as an aviator in the World War.

JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York.

It may be that Bridges, the west coast labor leader, ought to be sent back to his native Australia. It may be that his presence in the United States, as stated in the 5-line resolution of the House, is "hurtful." That isn't the point. The point is that the House has engaged in what one of its Members called a "legislative lynching." And it has done this at a time when there is special need for safeguarding our democratic processes.

The action of the House—this singling out of one individual, by name, to be kicked out of the country and, incidentally, to be martyrized—would be sheerly absurd if it were not for its dangerous implications. If Bridges is deported under the procedure laid down by the House, a precedent will have been set up for the expulsion of any alien whom a temporary majority in Congress, for whatever reason, may not like. For Bridges has not been convicted of violating any law, nor is it charged in the resolution that he has violated any. It is merely stated that Bridges is a man "whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful." Under that doctrine Congress can expel an alien because it objects to his race, his religion, or the color of his hair. It is not hard to imagine a state of hysteria that would bring a flood of bills for the deportation of particular individuals.

BRIDGES ALREADY CLEARED

Congress may or may not have the technical constitutional right to order the deportation of Bridges. The point is debatable. It was contended in the House that the Bridges resolution is a bill of attainder, which the Constitution specifically forbids. A bill of attainder is a legislative act which provides punishment without a judicial trial. By those supporting expulsion it was argued that deportation is not "punishment"; that Congress, moreover, has absolute control over the exclusion and ejection of aliens.

But whatever the technical power of Congress, the expulsion bill, as was eloquently pointed out in the House by Representative MILLER and others, violates both the spirit of the Bill of Rights and the national policy which accords the equal protection of the laws to aliens. Passage of the bill would be far more subversive of the Constitution than anything that Bridges has ever done or could conceivably do.

Bridges has been put through the whole prescribed process for the expulsion of undesirable aliens. He was arrested last year on a Department of Labor warrant charging that he was subject to deportation because of membership in an organization preaching the overthrow of the Government by force and violence—the Communist Party. Hearings were held for 11 weeks by a trial examiner, Dean James M. Landis, of the Harvard Law School, and on December 28 he reported his conclusions that "the evidence does not permit the finding that Harry R. Bridges is either a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with that party."

BRIDGES DENIED HEARING

Determined to get Bridges out of the country despite this clear ruling that he was not deportable under the laws, the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization brought in an arbitrary act authorizing the deportation of Bridges, and this was amended on the floor to direct the deportation. Bridges was denied a hearing before the committee. He is now denied the right to be heard on a writ of habeas corpus, or to be heard in any other way, but if the House bill goes through, he must be taken forthwith by the Attorney General and forthwith deported to Australia.

Not only does the Bridges bill strike at the Bill of Rights, it is also a shocking confession of legislative inadequacy. If the House thinks that Bridges ought to be deported, the way to get at him is to pass a general law covering his case; then Bridges would have his day in court and the issues raised by the expulsion law would be fought out in court.

The short cut chosen by the House, if not a bill of attainder, is at least a flagrant perversion of the legislative process.

It is earnestly to be hoped that good sense and regard for the Constitution will cause the Senate to block the writing of a vicious and dangerous precedent.

Weekly Reports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN A. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ONEONTA (N. Y.) NEWS

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oneonta (N. Y.) News of June 14, 1940:

[From the Oneonta (N. Y.) News of June 14, 1940]

WEEKLY REPORTS

We have not the slightest doubt that President Roosevelt has been truly sincere in his efforts to bring about a normal situation in America.

But these are times when the best of men are in a quandary as to what is the correct thing to do. There never were times like these before. The severest depression in our history, topped by a new World War—having just gone over the $8,000,000,000 mark in national debt to buy back our prosperity and being faced with added billions for a belated and convulsive move for armament makes a situation that frankly we doubt if any man can handle.

We are definitely against this giving the President or any other individual a blank check for him to fill out for any amount and for any purpose he sees fit. We have seen to it that the "honeymoon" of the New Deal was financed as they wanted it but now they must settle down to household budgets the same as anyone else.

Seven years ago this country hired Mr. Roosevelt because he talked somewhat reasonable and he had a refreshing point of view. One of these views was that the national debt at that time was unnecessarily and stupidly far beyond what it should be and that he would take such immediate steps as to reduce this debt and balance the Budget.

We do not doubt his sincerity of purpose but with the national debt being increased many times greater during his 7 years of administration to the point of its being the greatest in the history of this country and with unemployment as large as it ever was we feel Mr. Roosevelt has clearly demonstrated he is not capable of solving our problems alone. And we repeat—nor is any other individual.

From time to time we speak of Congressman HALL in this column. For a young man new to national political life we believe ED HALL is doing a superb job.

Last week he proposed a bill that would require the President of the United States and his administration to give a weekly accounting on every step they take with regard to national defense.

"Congress has a right to know," he declared. "The people have a right to know. There is no reason why the general information about the progress of the defense program should be withheld."

The Chief Executive's report, Mr. HALL told the House, should contain the number of contracts entered into by the Government each week, the number of airplanes completed and those under construction, the number of men under pilot training, the status of shipbuilding, and the "weekly progress of all land, sea, and air force development."

This makes sense. Business today is no longer on a "let's spend regardless" basis as it was in 1929. We have learned to budget ourselves and operate on a week-to-week schedule. So should the Government.

Congressman HALL'S proposal should be adopted, and if it is, you will find the end of reckless spending and the beginning of a "pay as you go" era.

But one of the most serious elements we have confronting us is that this is an election year and politics will keep many good ideas and many good men from functioning for the good of America. Mr. Roosevelt is asking Americans to forget partisanship this year—to forget political affiliations for the common good of all in this critical year. He has plenty of opportunity to set an example to his fellow men. Odd as it may seem, with a very poor record of results, Mr. Roosevelt will unquestionably run for a third term. But his chances of reelection do not depend on the opposing candidate but on how Mr. Roosevelt handles himself from now to next November.

Colonel Lindbergh on National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE B. CROWE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON STAR

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I note with great interest, in these distressed times over world conditions, that numerous Members are rising from their places and introducing into the Appendix of the RECORD newspaper clippings, speeches, and other material bearing on the present world conditions. Accordingly, I am introducing a clipping taken from the Washington Evening Star, entitled "Change of Heart," and it has to do with the position of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh and his frequent radio addresses.

I notice that others in his party, such as party national leader, Gov. Alfred M. Landon, of Kansas, Wendell Willkie, and others, do not share the views of Colonel Lindbergh by any manner or means. Colonel Lindbergh, too, appears to have been on all sides of the question. At first he, like many others, said, "Who is our enemy?" and "Who are we preparing to resist?" Sufficient, however, is the clipping from the Star which I am introducing, since it shows plainly the various positions that Colonel Lindbergh has taken, and it shows that he has been wrong most of the time, if not all of the time.

The editorial follows:

CHANGE OF HEART

Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, who took it upon himself a few weeks ago to assure the Nation that "no one wishes to attack us and no one is in a position to do so," appears to have changed his mind on that score. For if we are in no danger of attack he could hardly consider it necessary, "whatever our decision may be in regard to Europe," to "start now to build up our defenses," to ask that the "men of our country give a year of their lives to military training," to "insist upon military bases wherever they are needed for our safety—regardless of who owns the territory involved."

If there is need—and the Star holds that there has long been obvious and urgent need—for defense measures, there is danger of attack upon our national interests. Those interests extend far beyond our own soil, reaching in multiple and complex forms to every corner of the globe. And if those interests are not only in danger of attack but are actually being attacked today, which is the case, the ignoble and myopic surrender of our world interests to Hitler and company without taking such steps as we can to preserve them is intolerable.

It is this perverse insistence by Colonel Lindbergh that the present death grapple in Europe and Africa is outside our field of interest that outweighs what merit resides in his belated recognition of the need for arming ourselves against direct attack on this hemisphere.

Colonel Lindbergh holds that it should be no concern of ours whether Germany and Italy or England and France win this war. He says, as Hitler said a few days ago, that if we demand that foreign nations refrain from interfering in this hemisphere, we should not interfere in theirs. And he asserts that the policy of placing our industrial strength at the disposal of the democracies is a baiting of the trap of war by interventionists who seek by indirection to embroil us in the present phase of the battle and put our troops in France.

This is undiluted distortion of the actual truth.

Such help as we have given to the Allies, Colonel Lindbergh to the contrary notwithstanding, is an integral part of our effort to defend ourselves. The Star believes, because a triumphant Germany under Hitler would be the greatest menace which this country could conceivably face in the world today, that if we were possessed of an Army and Navy adequate to prevent that menace from ever materializing, we should before this have declared war upon Hitler and brought about his defeat while Allies stood at our side. Lacking such an Army and Navy, aid to the Allies was belatedly extended, to the end that the danger which Colonel Lindbergh partially recognizes might be arrested if possible, and, if worse comes to worse, at least postponed as long as possible. Capitulation of France now may mean that this aid came too late and in insufficient quantities and kinds. We must now proceed even faster to bring our own defenses to the necessary strength and efficiency.

During discussion of the repeal of the arms embargo 8 months ago, when Germany was armed to the teeth offensively and defensively and the Allies had nothing to attack with, Colonel Lindbergh said that he, for one, was in favor of supplying European nations with all the defensive weapons that we could spare. On Saturday, when it became clear that France and England were fighting a purely defensive battle with their very existence at stake, he would withhold any assistance—defensive or otherwise—from them.

Colonel Lindbergh has the right to change his mind and heart, but it is highly unfortunate that his public expressions tend to discredit the defense program which depends so much on unity of thought and action.

Public Sentiment Opposed to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, showing how public sentiment changes from time to time are the hundreds of letters being received in this week's mail, which, almost without exception, take a definite and outspoken stand against any sort of involvement in the European struggle. Letters last week showed a strong trend toward aid to the Allies, and toward measures short of war.

In the three messages quoted below from residents of Minnesota, the general sentiment of this week's letters are clearly expressed, and I am glad to present this information for the benefit of those who are charged with the responsibility of charting the course of national destiny.

Let the public speak, and let those in authority hear the people's voices. Read these letters:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 16, 1940.

JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The morning papers state that President Roosevelt has acted again without consent of Congress and promised "redoubled aid" to the Allies, at the same time hinting that Congress should make military commitments.

This seems to be the old policy of the President making war, and Congress only declaring it.

The Gallup poll shows that more than 80 percent of the people are against the President's evident policy, and I can assure you that the percentage is even higher in Minnesota.

I don't believe in government by letter writers—this is the first I have written to a Congressman—but if it will help to force the President to do what the people want to do, I intend to write lots of letters.

I hope you will stand firm against any involvement in Europe, although we are told there is a great war hysteria in the East.

Sincerely,

GEORGE K. PRITCHARD.

ST. LOUIS PARK, MINN., June 15, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Congressman, Third District, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please vote against any participation in Europe, either war or methods short of war.

We are in favor of taking the advice of Charles A. Lindbergh. Please think of America first.

Yours truly,

KENYON A. GABRIEL.
LENORA GABRIEL.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1940.

Congressman JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Third District Representative, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We demand a true representation of the folks at home. We want no war. America's defense and our problems come first. Just heard Colonel Lindbergh's address over the air, which expresses our sentiments exactly. The President and many of the Congressmen are more pro-Allies than American, which causes us to wonder, Are we again subjects of the Empire Great Britain? Less aid to the Allies, please, and more aid to America, especially for defense!

Sincerely,

Mrs. E. RODINE.

Fathers' Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 18, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, OF NEW YORK

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered at the world's fair on June 16, 1940:

For many years now Mothers' Day has been celebrated throughout the United States as a day of devotion to the mothers of the Nation, and a day on which mother, and what it means to be a mother, is graphically portrayed to the people of this country as an appropriate gesture of loyalty and devotion.

A few years ago, unofficially, the third Sunday in June came to be celebrated as Fathers' Day. Fathers' Day was founded in 1910 by Mrs. John Bruce Dodd, of Spokane, Wash., and has grown to great prominence since. Mrs. Dodd was inspired by the devotion of her own father to his family of small children who were left motherless at an early age. It is now proposed that Fathers' Day be equally officially celebrated just as Mothers' Day has become celebrated.

A word or two will not be inappropriate to be said in connection therewith. Love of one's parents is the most natural feeling which is instilled in us by our divine Creator.

Our ancient Bible among its Ten Commandments says "Honor thy father and mother." And all of us, particularly those who had the benefit and privilege of religious training and a proper home atmosphere in which our youth was spent, remember how reverence and love of one's parents was ever present in every task which we were called upon to perform as children.

There is really no reason why one's mother should be singled out as against one's father. Both are equally important in the scheme of things. To create a proper home atmosphere, both parents are of equal importance. In a home a father and mother cooperate in the bringing up of a family. It is so much more appropriate that when mother is honored, father should likewise receive his share of a child's devotion.

By setting aside a definite date at which children of this Nation will honor their fathers, it will instill great love and affection for both parents and will make the home ever presided over by a father and mother, the real center of the children's universe.

It is such a fine feeling to remember one's parents with tokens of devotion. If one could have his way, he would wish every day in the calendar be celebrated as mother's and father's day. But, of course, the humdrum of daily activities, and the hustle and bustle of everyday life we cannot very well at all times show this transcendent devotion to our parents, which we would like to. So, we are confined to have a day on the calendar set aside for this special purpose, and it will be a wonderful reminder of the unity of a family, and the love and devotion which we owe to both parents, if along with Mother's Day, we were to celebrate each year a father's day as well.

In these days of stirring Americanism where patriotic virtues are being proclaimed to the world, all of our citizens are unanimous in doing everything in their power to uphold our democracy and freedom. This democracy should be defended, not only by the expenditure of money for military and naval preparedness, but also by stressing the importance of the home as the fountain of American liberty. The American home is the finest product of the American way of life, a life free from dictatorships, oppression, and from the denial of human life.

Who among us does not remember that distant day when as a child he was in awe and dread of his father, the head of the family and the fountain of wisdom and greatness. Father would solve all our problems for us, tell us what was right, and make our path easy. Father helped us play games, he took us to the baseball field and to prize fights, and if we think back he always was "a regular fellow." And if we are still young enough to have a father, aren't we delighted to live in his shadow and enjoy his companionship as long as the years allow it?

And so through the ages, we will never forget the memories of our childhood, and by having a day definitely set aside to honor father we will recall with a pang and a little palpitation of the heart the days of our youth and the place which father occupied in our little universe, not so many years ago.

We must not forget that father gave us the foundation of our moral life, taught us what was right or wrong, showed us how to avoid the pitfalls of daily life, and gave us encouragement to bear the misfortunes which would come in our path. If we were able to grow up into useful citizens, and are able to take our place in the world, it is due to the fact that father straightened out our little difficulties in early life, and gave us the chance to become grown-up citizens and useful members of society.

And so, if a day is set aside to celebrate as Father's Day, we shall ever be grateful to the man whose hard work, devotion to duty, and ability to understand our problems made us what we are today.

Father's Day should be made into an official holiday. In laying a wreath at the foot of the statue of George Washington, the father of our country, let us remember all the fathers of our Nation.

I have introduced a resolution in Congress to make Father's Day a national holiday. I hope Congress will see fit to pass this resolution so that it will become a law in the near future.

Congress Should Stay on the Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE JOPLIN (MO.) NEWS-HERALD

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from a recent issue of the Joplin (Mo.) News-Herald:

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY ON THE JOB

To most people it will seem mysterious that Congress should be in a hurry to adjourn. The only practical argument seems to be that the Congressmen themselves want to get home so they can campaign for reelection. That might be a sufficient reason in ordinary times, but these are not ordinary times.

Consider our triune form of government—judicial, executive, and legislative. The United States Supreme Court adjourns for the summer and no one thinks anything about it. Judicial processes are naturally and properly slower than executive and legislative processes. Even in legislative processes, deliberation is expected as indicating reasonable study before statutory enactments.

But in extraordinary times it may be necessary to enact statutes much more quickly than is possible if the Congress of the Nation has first to be called into session. It no longer requires several weeks for Representatives of western States to get to Washington, but it still is true that several days must elapse between the issuance of a call for Congress to meet and the actual opening of the session.

Keep in mind that it is not just the matter of enacting laws. Upon Congress is placed the responsibility for declaring war. Also, there are many questions as to actions and decisions short of a declaration of war that properly should be put up to Congress and not left solely upon the shoulders of the President.

If you were the President of the United States, wouldn't you want Members of the Senate and House of Representatives to stay on the job in a critical time like the world is experiencing just now? Would you want to accept the full responsibility for decisions and actions that quite possibly might lead this Nation into the World War that is in progress?

It is not enough, as someone has said, for Congress merely to gayly appropriate any number of billions of dollars and then go home. It should stay on the job to see to it that the expenditure of these billions is started in proper fashion, to see to it that there is a minimum of waste, to see to it that various important legislation that cannot be completed by the proposed date of adjournment is completed, to see to it that the best brains of Congress are immediately available to the President if the world crisis increases, so far as America is concerned.

There is no reason why this question of congressional adjournment should be a political question.

The Members of Congress are the employees of the people. They are each paid $10,000 a year for their services. Surely, if there is any probability that their services will be needed—if there is even a possibility of it—they should be in Washington, on the job, and ready to deliver that service. The excuse that they want to get home and campaign for reelection is about as petty and paltry and disgraceful an excuse as could be presented, under the circumstances.

The Farmer, the Consumer, and Ice Cream

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY ROBERT C. HIBBEN, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ICE CREAM MANUFACTURERS

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, during the many discussions of the economic ills of agriculture, we discuss corn, wheat, cotton, tobacco, and other commodities, but slight attention is paid to dairy products, which is the largest of all agricultural commodities.

The following address of Mr. Hibben should prove of interest to Members of Congress. Mr. Hibben was guest speaker on the National Farm and Home Hour, June 15, 1940, sponsored by the National Grange:

In the early nineteenth century, charming Dolly Madison amazed and delighted official Washington by serving ice cream at a White House reception—its first recorded White House appearance.

Today, ice cream has become so universal a food in this country that commentators (in noting any national characteristic) often say "Why, it's as American as ice cream."

Every year the total production of more than 1,000,000 cows goes to supply the cream and milk solids which are the major ingredients of ice cream. Annually we in America eat some 1,200,000,000 quarts of ice cream.

If it were possible to pile quart on quart this gigantic mass of ice cream would occupy 1⅔ acres of ground, and reach into the sky as high as the Washington Monument, here in the heart of the Nation's Capital.

Seventy-five percent of the annual output of ice cream comes during the 5 warm months when milk production is at its heaviest. The enormous value to the dairy farm of this outlet for its peak production is at once apparent. Ice-cream manufacture in America has been rightly called the balance wheel of the dairy industry.

From the farm point of view, ice-cream manufacture holds many other important aspects. The industry uses more strawberries and peaches than any other except the canning industry. Over nine and one-half million quarts of strawberries are purchased yearly for use in ice cream, exclusive of those made into toppings and sirups for use at the retail fountains.

Cherries, raspberries, pineapples, and many other fruits are in heavy demand. Pecan, walnut, and other nut growers look to the ice-cream market for the disposition of a large percentage of their annual crops.

Of beet and cane sugar, some million and one-half pounds are required annually for sweetening ice cream, again touching agricultural enterprise.

Add to these major ingredients the flavors, confections, etc., which are utilized in special ice creams, and an idea may be gained of the economic affect of ice-cream manufacturing on the multiple enterprises which go to make up our economic life.

In so closely knitted an economic fabric industry and production problems are interrelated and mutually dependent. Benefit or disadvantage to the ice-cream industry has a kindred effect upon the dairy farmer. For example, trade barriers which prevent the free flow of cream in interstate commerce narrow the farmers' potential market by increasing the cost of the products manufactured from such cream. This in turn deters sales increases in the consumer market. A vicious circle is thus formed—with neither industry nor farmer able to go forward toward economic stability.

Discriminatory legislation pointed at motortruck transportation is another striking example touching the dairy farmer. Any regulation adversely affecting truck travel taps the pipe line of the farm-to-market movement of milk and the life line of the ice-cream industry's distribution.

It is to the interest, therefore, both of the ice-cream manufacturer and the dairy farmer, to be awake to these and other regulatory tendencies. By intelligent action, there may be assured the safeguard of those vital factors, essential to the common future, in which both have so great a stake.

There is no mystery about the manufacture of ice cream. In common with bread baking, canning, and many other home-food preparations of our grandmother's day, the making of ice cream has moved from the kitchen to the modern, sanitary plant. The recipes grandmother used have been adapted for large-scale production. Just as much cream, in some cases more, goes into ice cream today, as in that cranked in the old freezer on the back porch. In addition, more milk solids are used, which give ice cream an even higher food value.

The modern ice-cream plant is a triumph of sanitary and refrigerating engineering. From the time of the receipt of the raw products until its consumption, this food is not touched by human hands, but is processed through an elaborate arrangement of equipment which marks the acme of efficiency and sanitation.

The finished ice cream comes to you as a safe, wholesome dairy food, rich in those vital elements which make milk essential for the human race. In fact, ice cream contains more milk solids than an equal volume of milk. These important minerals and vitamins of milk are present, unimpaired, in ice cream, which has the additional advantage of universal popularity.

Ice cream is good, and good for you, an unbeatable combination. Young and old, sick and well, enjoy its appealing taste, delight in its refreshing coolness.

This month of June has been designated "Dairy Month" to accent the importance of dairy products in the Nation's health. Butter, cheese, ice cream, milk are spotlighted to focus attention upon the entire dairy industry as an economic force in our national life. Dr. McCollum, famous nutrition expert of Johns Hopkins, says: "The people who have achieved, who have become large, strong, vigorous people, are the people who have used liberal amounts of milk and its products." Here, indeed, is a challenge to every homemaker to see that the daily family dietary contains sufficient of these dairy foods to safeguard the vitality and promote the well-being of those nearest and dearest to her.

One glass of milk daily in addition to that now taken or one more dish of ice cream or one extra cheese sandwich on buttered bread—what a change would take place; not only would health be improved but that problem of overproduction of milk, which so harasses the dairy farmer today, would be near solution. June Dairy Month is a reminder for each of us to help ourselves more liberally to milk, ice cream, cheese, and butter for our health's sake and to help at the same time the dairy farmer, now in the midst of peak milk production.

If the habits thus acquired persist throughout the year, so much the better for us all.

STATEMENT OF CHESTERFIELD MONTHLY MEETING OF FRIENDS AT CHESTERHILL, OHIO

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, on December 17, 1939, the Chesterfield monthly meeting of Friends was held at Chesterhill, Ohio. At that meeting, these substantial and loyal Americans issued a statement, which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as an extension of my remarks:

Since the establishment of this meeting in 1834 Chesterfield monthly meeting of Friends (Quakers) held at Chesterhill, Ohio, has maintained its adherence to the principles of peace. These principles have characterized the Society of Friends over a period of 2½ centuries.

While others may believe differently, we desire to reaffirm our belief that: War is a sin against God, war is in conflict with the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and that hatred and carnage have no place with those who are trying to follow the teachings of the Gospel.

Our belief in His teaching urges us to maintain the stand for peace. While "we utterly deny all outward wars and strife and fightings with outward weapons for any end or under any pretense whatever," we do firmly believe that it is our Christian duty to participate in constructive efforts to "overcome evil with good."

Airports and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES KRAMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. LOUIS JOHNSON, THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Louis Johnson, the Assistant Secretary of War, at the inauguration of an air line at Clarksburg, W. Va., Sunday, June 16, 1940:

Fellow citizens, today, in Clarksburg, we forge another link in our great chain of national airways. To our city this airport means the reduction of the distance to our State Capitol at Charleston from hours to minutes; and to our National Capital at Washington, from a day or a night to but a few hours. Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, Philadelphia and New York are comparatively within the limits of this county. All of America is but around the corner.

To commercial aviation this new airport means that thousands of men, women, and children can traverse our free skies with greater safety and with increased assurance. It means that thousands of tons of mail and other valuable cargoes can be delivered with added facility to their destinations. It means a step forward in the American field of transportation.

Yesterday, the comfort and the capacity of our public roads paved the way toward automobile progress. Today, the convenience and the availability of public airports will confer a similar blessing on the development of aviation, and coupled with increased production and training facilities, they will combine to give us the air power we need for the defense of our country.

The President of the United States recently indicated 50,000 as an annual aircraft production capacity vital to our national security. While we naturally visualize this increase as pertaining solely to military aircraft, we must not overlook the great value of commercial aviation to the realization of this objective. In all phases of the development of national air defense, commercial aviation plays an important role.

In this field, the United States is supreme. Our air transportation system carries more passengers and mail longer distances with greater safety than that of any other nation in the world.

As a result, the birthplace of our modern airplane is no longer a small shed in the corner of a vacant lot, but a vast industrial plant covering hundreds of acres in which thousands of skilled workers ply their trades. Likewise, the aviator of today no longer depends on the cow pasture of yesterday, but has at his disposal over 2,400 improved landing areas within the United States.

It is largely due to commercial aviation that there are today over 14,000 licensed airplanes and 31,000 licensed pilots in this country. It is through its efforts and those of the Civil Aeronautics Authority that over 10,000 names will be added to this list within the next 2 months.

These mark but the beginnings. An enormous task lies ahead of us. Our industrial plants must be enlarged manyfold. Workers skilled in the art of aircraft production must be counted in the hundreds of thousands. Our airports must be multiplied in number and expanded in capacity.

We must qualify thousands of eager young men as pilots where we now have hundreds. We must teach them not only to fly but to do battle in the air, for the civilian pilot is but the foundation for a military aviator. Long and strenuous hours of training lie ahead.

From a military standpoint, the civilian pilot has completed his basic education and is ready for college. He has proved his ability to fly. This greatly simplifies the problem and materially reduces the time required to convert him into a military aviator.

We are fortunate indeed to have this reservoir of proven men available. In the realization of our air program, commercial training facilities will be developed and utilized to the fullest possible extent. Without their invaluable assistance our task would be impossible.

In our consideration of military aviation we must not overlook the importance of the airplane utilized purely as a means of transportation. Just as the Navy has its auxiliary ships, so modern air force has its transport planes. Today expeditionary forces speed through the air over all terrain barriers and land deep in the enemy territory. Ammunition and supplies reach them from the skies. Reinforcements are rushed to inaccessible points by man-made birds. Even the sick and wounded are evacuated through the clouds.

We are not lacking in this new field of military strategy. In event of an emergency we can convert great numbers of our air merchant fleet to this purpose. With our experience and facilities we should be able not only to adopt the new tactics but to beat any nation on earth at this game. Commercial aviation may well prove a direct and major asset to our national air defense.

The necessity for a strong and highly efficient air force is no longer a matter of debate. Recent events abroad have demonstrated its value in unmistakable terms. The Allied armies in Norway were rendered helpless by its absence. Without its assistance the astounding German advance through Flanders would have been impossible. Without the intervention of the British air force in Belgium the Germans would not have been robbed of the full fruits of their victory. The conclusion is inescapable that a nation weak in air power, indeed, is impotent.

But an air force itself, in turn, is impotent without adequate landing fields. When Germany overnight grabbed every important airport in Norway she insured success in that sector. By the same act she placed England under a handicap that entailed certain defeat. Conversely, as the "blitzkreig" rolled through Belgium nearer to the airports of Great Britain, the English air power increased and the German thrust was parried in great measure.

The lesson is obvious. The development of airports throughout the United States involves more than the convenience and safety of our national airways. It materially contributes to the preservation of our national existence.

Therefore, today in Clarksburg, we do more than provide increased transportation facilities to our community and to our State. Today we forge another link in the armor that will protect our beloved land against any would-be aggressor. May that armor become so strong that no marauding nation will ever dare threaten to penetrate it.

Fight the "Fifth Column" Here

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WESLEY E. DISNEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

ARTICLE BY REV. REMBERT GILMAN SMITH

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Rev. Rembert Gilman Smith:

FIGHT THE "FIFTH COLUMN" HERE

(By Rembert Gilman Smith)

During the Spanish civil war, the term "the fifth column" originated. Franco was advancing on the city of Santander with four columns of soldiers. He had a fifth column inside the city, the aid of which enabled him to capture the city. This method is as old as the fall of Troy, made possible because the Trojans, making light of the warnings of Cassandra, let the Trojan horse into the city, from the belly of which the Greeks descended, and opened the gates to the Greek army.

Four columns now threaten the United States from without. They are composed of Nazis, Communists, Fascists, and Anarchists. They expect to get valuable help from the "fifth column" within.

Who are in it or likely soon to be? Those who have accepted, or are about to accept, any one of the four doctrines—nazi-ism, communism, fascism, or anarchism. Some of these avow their enmity to Americanism, some conceal it, and some even pretend to be patriotic. These pretenders are the direct spiritual descendants of Benedict Arnold.

While they wait hopefully for the arrival of the enemy at our gates they are busy within. They resist with all possible dastardly means those who seek to inform and arouse the people. All individuals and organizations at work to expose them, and their allies without, are smeared by them. They try to choke their bugles with mud, and to drown them in a sea of it.

In the "fifth column" are some from every class—preachers, bishops, teachers, politicians, lawyers, judges, doctors, merchants, farmers, laborers, capitalists, editors, reporters, college and university students, technicians, youth groups. Every racial bloc has some. They are in secret or proclaimed despair of our constitutional, representative democracy, and are turning their devotions toward substitutes for it, such as are now found in Germany, Russia, Italy, or some other land of recently reborn slavery.

The most dangerous regiment in the "fifth column" now, when the air is full of war, and of rumors of war, is composed of the slacker pacifists, who fill the land with propaganda against all war, including war for defense. Many academic dreamers and woolly minded preachers have been zealously and insidiously seeking to weaken the patriotism of the youth. They claim to be Christian, but they are in rebellion against Jesus Christ, who commanded His followers, "Sell your cloaks and buy swords." They have had such success as that an alarmingly large number of young men in this Nation declare that they will not fight to defend native land. What abject and awful degeneracy!

In the "fifth column" are found millions of the indifferent and the selfish. Preoccupied with ambition, money getting, pleasure seeking, they shut their eyes and ears to the realities of these perilous times. They are in the "fifth column" on account of their ignorance, indolence, and criminal neglect of patriotic duties. They are like the people of ancient Meroz, cursed because "they came not up to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord, against the mighty."

How many are in the "fifth column"? An accurate estimate is impossible, but it is certain that they are numerous and powerful enough to be dangerous. Let no undue sense of security rest upon the probability that the "fifth column" is now a minority group. Active, unscrupulous, and cruel minorities, aided by stupid, supine, or cowardly majorities, have already massacred civilization over vast areas. They now boast that they will bring chaos to us.

Fight the "fifth column" with all lawful weapons, and at once.

Participation in the European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY PROF. PHILIP C. JESSUP

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, there appeared in the Hartford Courant on June 15, 1940, a letter from Prof. Philip C. Jessup entitled "This War Is Not Yet 'Our War.'"

Dr. Jessup is professor of international law at Columbia University, but is a resident of Norfolk, Conn. His many contributions to current problems justify the importance which has been attached to his recent letter appearing in the Hartford Courant, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Hartford Courant of June 15, 1940]

THIS WAR IS NOT YET "OUR WAR"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COURANT:

The United States is still, thank God, a democracy and therefore a citizen can still express his opinions, even though he be damned as "an imbecile or a traitor" by those who disagree with him.

Disagreement and name-calling are still our privileges, but they are privileges which are coasting rapidly over the brink into war. Once we are at war, it will make no difference (if I may take a humble personal example) that I am a veteran of the A. E. F., that my ancestors came here from England some three centuries ago; my freedom and yours will be surrendered to government.

"Let us not deceive ourselves," wrote Maj. George Fielding Eliot in The Ramparts We Watch in 1938. "Let us not say, these powers that we propose to grant to a single man will be politely handed back when the war is over, as a matter of course. They may be, and they may not be. The risk that they may not, or that the reclaiming of them might plunge this Nation into the horrors of civil strife to which foreign war would seem but a pleasant dream, is far too great to be taken if it need not be taken."

NEED IT BE TAKEN?

Does it need to be taken? Must we risk that freedom now because there is no alternative but war? The comforting theory is being widely circulated that though we are in great danger from the Nazis, we do not need to fight for our freedom; the Allies will do the fighting for us, equipped with such cast-off equipment as we can spare.

It is hard to believe that the American people will accept the idea that our frontier is really on the Somme, or the Seine, or the Loire, and that French and British troops on those rivers of France are really fighting our fight, and accept at the same time the hypocritical or cowardly conclusion that all we need to contribute is the sale of guns and planes. Suppose the Germans had crossed the Atlantic, with remnants of Allied troops fleeing before them; suppose the Germans landed in Canada where the Canadian troops, supporting the French and British were being driven back across the boundary into Maine or New York. Then it would really be our fight. Would we still say we would not risk a single soldier, but would give the Allies our spare weapons?

IF OR WHEN IT IS OUR FIGHT

If or when it is our fight we will fight with everything we have, manpower included. The American people don't believe it is our fight in Europe today though their sympathies, like mine, are overwhelmingly with the Allies and against the Nazi-Fascist gang. That is why the politicians do not dare advocate our going to war, but assure the people we will not send another army to France as we did in 1917.

It was not long ago—do you remember?—when we were arguing the repeal of the arms embargo and we were told that the Allies did not need men: so there was no question of our sending the boys to fight in Europe once more. Who believes today that the Allies do not need men? If we follow the lead of those who tell us we must now cast our lot with the Allies, we shall continue to coast faster and faster into war, and war means fighting the enemy with all you've got, which includes men, and still more men.

Even in 1917 we said at first we would send only a "token regiment," or at most a division. Thirty distinguished citizens, whose honesty I admire as much as I disagree with their views, published in the New York Times on June 10, a plea that we declare war now on Germany but even they are apparently afraid to tell the American people that fighting a war means using men as well as material. Don't dodge the issue by saying we could not get men there in time; they said that in 1917, too.

SENTIMENT VERSUS SELF-INTEREST

And let's not confuse sentiment with self-interest. Of course our sentiments are with the Allies, as they were with the Ethiopians and the Austrians and the Czechs and the Poles, and as they are with the Chinese. Looking further back in history, we will find they were with the Japanese against the Russians 35 years ago and with the Boers against the English some 40 years ago. Nations don't fight because of sentimental attachments. England and France did not fight for China, or for Ethiopia, or for Austria, or for Czechoslovakia. Harold Nicholson, a brilliant and patriotic Englishman, recently wrote a book called Why Britain Is At War. In it he said that a Briton before he fights must have both a sense of personal outrage and a sense of personal danger. We have the sense of outrage; the question is about the danger.

WE FIGHT TO DEFEND OURSELVES

There is always a danger when a strong nation goes on the warpath. Many Americans for years have preached the danger from Japan and have urged us to make war on Japan. We don't, as a people, rise to these cries of distant danger; we don't fight what are called preventive wars. We fight to defend ourselves, our country, and our free institutions, and we are united on the proposition that that includes fighting in defense of the Monroe Doctrine—defending this hemisphere against an invasion by a hostile nation. We would fight, not by selling old equipment, but with every man we have, to prevent Germany or Japan from taking the French or British or Dutch possessions in this hemisphere or from taking any part of Central or South America.

THOSE "IFS"

If we are going to war now—and it means war if you accept the idea that "the frontier of our national interest is now on the Somme"—we are counting on a lot of "ifs":

"If" the French and English are defeated;

"If" all we have been told for years about German lack of materials and their inability to hold out long is untrue and the defeat of the Allies can be accomplished this summer.

"If" the British and French surrender their fleets instead of bringing them to Canada and other outlying parts of the Empire as Prime Minister Churchill recently indicated would be done.

"If" Hitler, immediately after defeating the Allies in Europe, does not mind leaving a fundamentally hostile Russia on his flank while he turns to the gigantic task of conquering the Western Hemisphere.

"If" Hitler does not prefer first to consolidate his gains in Europe plus rounding out his empire in the Near East and Africa.

"If" Hitler makes an alliance with Japan and the Japanese attack us at the same time across the Pacific.

"If" Hitler remains in power indefinitely after the German people learn the cost of the war he promised them would never come.

"If" Mussolini can hold his people in a war which seems all wrong to a vast number of Italians.

"If" the South Americans with our help cannot control their "fifth columns."

These are "ifs," not certainties. Are we going to pour out American lives on the chances that the "if" will come true?

The full-page advertisement spread over newspapers "from coast to coast" by a committee of representative Americans, tries to make some of these "ifs" ridiculous by asking whether the Nazis will "considerately wait until we are ready to fight them." Nobody is fool enough to suggest that they would wait for that reason but the "ifs" don't rest on any such silly basis.

"MAKE OUR DEFENSE SURE"

Preparations for defense, yes, by the billions, by sacrifice and devotion and nonpartisanship of every citizen of the United States. Ours will not be the position of the little countries which hoped that the war would not strike them and therefore went under, partly because they were small, partly because they were not farsighted. We will strain every nerve to make our defense sure, but it will be a defense on lines of our own choosing, the lines of the Western Hemisphere.

I was only a private in the American Expeditionary Force and make no claim to being a military strategist but it makes sense to me when I read Major Eliot's description of national defense based upon protection of this hemisphere and its adjacent seas. "The necessity is," he writes, "that we shall make up our minds that whatever betide, we send no more great armies to fight in a European war." Don't be misled by labels. This is still a European war and not a World War. It may become a "world" war and if it does we shall be in it, fighting from the position of our own natural advantages and not across the seas. But whatever the outcome of this war, it has brought home to us the concern we have with the rest of the world. One of the things the war has killed is the blind isolationism of 1920.

GET THE ISSUE IN THE OPEN

Let's get the issue out into the open so that the American people can register their will while there is still time. Let's keep our sympathies—we couldn't scrap them if we would. Let those individuals whose sympathies drive them to such gallant sacrifice (and all honor to them) as to enlist in the allied armies, fight under Allied flags, as they are free to do. Let the Allies buy in our markets as they are privileged to do under our laws. But let's be honest with them and with ourselves.

Say that we do not think it is "our" war and therefore we are not coming in. If we change our minds, we will do it deliberately, with full understanding of the consequences, and if that time comes we will fight with all our resources, men as well as machines. Say to the Nazis and the Fascists and the Japanese that we will declare war and fight at the first sign of invasion of this hemisphere, whether it be Brazil, Greenland, Canada, or Bermuda, or, if you will, Hawaii. Say to our President, our Senators, and our Congressmen that we are ready for any sacrifice necessary to our defense program but that we expect them to preserve our freedom, our democracy, against foreign invaders and against "fifth columns," and also against another danger just as great, the danger of hysterical fears which undermine democracy within and which may send us coasting into a foreign war, from which we can still be saved by a cool head.

The March of Economic Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 18 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

PROCEEDINGS OF TWENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Twenty-fifth Annual Convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, excerpts from the address delivered by Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America on May 18, 1940, a statement of the committee on political action of the same organization, and the complete address of Secretary Ickes on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America at the New York World's Fair on May 18, 1940.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Resolution adopted by the Twenty-fifth Annual Convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America]

We must defend and extend the New Deal program. That program can be defended and extended only under a national leadership whose attachment to it and to the people has been tried and tested beyond question. On the record, there is one man in public life today who has preeminently demonstrated that he possesses these qualities of leadership. With the world aflame abroad, we cannot afford to lose the leadership of President Roosevelt, who, as no other man in our generation, inspires devotion among our people.

Therefore, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America calls upon the Democratic Party, in this time of national and world crisis, to draft President Franklin D. Roosevelt as its nominee for the office of President. It calls upon Franklin D. Roosevelt, putting aside all questions of personal desire, after 7 years of ceaseless and exacting service, to accept that candidacy. And we individually and collectively pledge to him our unswerving support in the fulfillment of the great tasks before us.

[From address by Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America on May 18, 1940]

And so we say to Franklin Delano Roosevelt: We the people of the United States have twice elected you President of the United States. We have followed and supported your leadership in your efforts to strengthen and revitalize our democracy. You have served us well, but your work is not done. We consider your continuance in office for another 4 years necessary to give a free people national unity at a time of grave crisis—necessary to give hope and courage to those offering their last full measure of devotion to preserve freedom in a civilized world. At such a time, Mr. President, we must hold you to your promise not to let the people down. We propose to nominate you, we propose to elect you, and we, the people, command you to serve as our President.

STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE ON POLITICAL ACTION

[Adopted by the Twenty-fifth Annual Convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America]

During the past 8 years the working men and women of America, and with them all progressive Americans, have made notable gains in their struggle to strengthen our political and economic democracy. We meet today upon the threshold of a political contest which will determine whether the gains of these years shall be preserved and extended or dissipated and lost. Organized labor has learned from its experience since 1929 that the preservation and improvement of its working conditions and living standards, the solution of the pressing problem of unemployment, the defense of its civil rights and liberties, and the very existence of our American democracy depend upon the character, the program, and the policies of our National Government and the man who heads it. Therefore, organized labor is intensely concerned with the coming political contest whose outcome so vitally affects its own welfare and that of the whole Nation.

The membership of the Amalgamated is fully alive to the decisive importance of this issue and has registered its decision with this convention in no uncertain terms. Many resolutions dealing with the coming national elections have been submitted to this convention by local unions and joint boards representing every important center of our organization. These resolutions, without exception, call upon the Democratic Party to draft, and the Nation to return to office, our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In the light of this unanimity of opinion among our membership, the decision to be taken by this convention is clear. It remains for us to formulate the basis upon which this decision rests.

Let us, therefore, briefly review the situation in which the Nation found itself 8 years ago and the progress which has been made since that time under the leadership of President Roosevelt, and then attempt to indicate the choice which now lies before us.

Eight years ago the Nation was in the grip of the worst economic crisis of our history. Fifteen million men and women, able and willing to work, were unemployed. Without means, public or private, to support themselves and their families, indignation and desperation expressed themselves in public demonstrations and hunger marches. The plight of other groups of our people was equally desperate. Farmers were driven from their land, our old people were without security, and our young people without opportunity or hope for the future.

The National Government was worse than impotent in the face of this crisis. It disclaimed responsibility for starvation. Under the hypocritical slogan of rugged individualism, it refused to lift a finger to alleviate the misery and suffering which swept the land. As a result, in March 1933, when Franklin D. Roosevelt took office, we were perilously close to complete and irretrievable national disaster.

It has been the genius of President Roosevelt to give wise, clear-visioned, and steadfast leadership to our people. It was he who, in the black days of 1933, formulated their largely inarticulate demands and aspirations into a positive program of Government to provide relief from starvation, increase employment, halt the descending business spiral, restore the national credit, increase purchasing power, and lay the basis for a more equitable distribution of the national income; not only did he formulate that program but he welded the labor and progressive groups of the nation into execution in the face of the relentless and unprincipled reactionary opposition which soon developed.

As workers and as citizens alike, we recount with pride those major New Deal achievements which met the burning needs of our people in the hour of crisis.

The Wagner Act: It has written the basic right of workers to organize into the law of the land; it has made possible the greatest advance in labor organization in our history.

The Fair Labor Standards Act: It has established the important principle that it is the duty of government to protect workers from the most extreme forms of exploitation. It has helped protect organized labor from sweatshop competition by fixing minimum wages and maximum hours. It has contributed to an increase in the national-purchasing power.

The Social Security Act: It, for the first time, recognized Federal responsibility to protect the workers of the country against the perils of old age and unemployment, and to alleviate the haunting fear, born of insecurity, which has gripped the heart of every working man and woman since the advent of our industrial system.

W. P. A. and P. W. A.: Those measures give legislative recognition to the responsiblity of our national Government to provide for the unemployed. They substitute the dignity of honest and useful work for the degrading dole. They have preserved the health and skill of millions of unemployed workers, have helped support the wage structure of the Nature and made an essential contribution to the national purchasing power.

The Walsh-Healey Act: It has insured minimum prevailing wages to hundreds of thousands of workers in factories which are the beneficiaries of Government contracts.

The housing program: A series of measures has saved a million home owners from eviction, enabled 500,000 American families to become home owners and now undertakes to replace slum dwellings with decent housing within the reach of all workers.

The farm program: It has saved millions of farmers and farm workers from ruin, almost doubled farm income, and by increasing farm purchasing power has restored the farmer as a customer for the products of our factories.

The practical realization of all these social and economic objectives of the New Deal has been made possible only by the fearless fight which it waged in the courts to uphold the right of the workers, the farmers, the aged, and the oppressed to the equal protection of the law of the land. Not since Lincoln called for the overruling of the Dred Scott decision has any statesman had the courage shown by President Roosevelt in calling upon the courts to remove the barriers which the courts had erected to the accomplishment of necessary social and economic reforms. And had it not been for that fearless courage, the workers would not now have the protection of the Wagner Act and the wage and hour law, and the aged and the unemployed would not now have the protection of the Social Security Act.

Many of the legislative advances won by the New Deal, such as social security, wage and hour legislation, and the guaranty of the right to organize, had long been a part of the political program of progressive labor organizations like our own. For many years before 1932 we had sought political leadership and a political instrumentality through which we could realize that program. Not only did we find such leadership under President Roosevelt, but the program realized under him has given a tremendous impetus to the organization of labor itself, so that today labor represents an important force in our national life, arming all progressives with a mighty weapon for further advances.

The achievements which we here recount are the fruit of long and bitter struggle. In the early months of President Roosevelt's first administration, reaction, cowed by the narrowness of its escape from complete disaster, offered no effective resistance to the initial measures of the New Deal program. But it soon rallied its forces and began the counterattack. That attack has continued with relentless and increasing vigor. The true measure of the President's leadership is to be found in the fact that not only has he held his ground under the onslaught but has continued steadfastly to move forward, when some of those around him wavered, faltered, and deserted, giving up the battle as lost.

When we recount the achievements which have been won under the President's leadership we do not minimize the tasks which lie ahead. Progress has been made. Much remains to be done. We still face the crucial question of unemployment. If we would solve it we must further increase the purchasing power of those of our people who are without the means to satisfy their needs. The working conditions and living standards of our workers must be improved. They must be provided with decent housing, given further protection against unemployment, and increased security in old age. Their right to organize must be fully guaranteed and enforced everywhere. Their civil and political rights and liberties must be protected and extended.

We do not let impatience to achieve our full program blind us to the giant strides which have been made. At the same time we must not let satisfaction with our progress lull us into security or relax our vigilance.

Events abroad daily teach us that our liberties as a free people cannot be made secure unless we find the way to give full employment to our rich resources of men, land, and machines, and assure our people the possibility of realizing their demands for a secure and decent life. We are mindful of President Roosevelt's warning that "the social and economic forces which have been mismanaged abroad, until they resulted in revolution, dictatorship, and war, are the same as those which we are here struggling to adjust peacefully at home."

In this critical hour, when half the people of the world are locked in terrible wars which threaten to destroy the values which we identify as the civilized way of life, we in America can best make our contribution to the Nation and to the world by demonstrating for all to see that the problems which beset us are susceptible of a peaceful and a democratic solution.

If we are to achieve this high purpose, it is essential that we continue along the path which we have taken these last 8 years. We must defend and extend the New Deal program which holds the only hope of fulfillment of that purpose. That program can be defended and extended only under a national leadership whose attachment to it and to the people has been tried and tested beyond question. On the record there is one man in public life today who has preeminently demonstrated that he possesses these qualities of leadership.

Finally, with the world aflame abroad, we cannot afford to lose the leadership of President Roosevelt, who, as no other man in our generation, inspires devotion among our people. His humble and selfless allegiance to the preservation of the principles of peace and freedom is too rare and precious a quality to be denied to his country in this time of need.

In a dangerous world he has expressed the heart and soul of all that is valuable and decent in the civilization which the centuries have built up. The road which he traveled has sought to preserve intact our traditional loyalties to the ideals of freedom, democracy, peace, and international good faith.

Therefore, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, assembled in this thirteenth biennial convention, calls upon the Democratic Party in this time of national and world crisis to draft President Franklin D. Roosevelt as its nominee for the office of President. It calls upon Franklin D. Roosevelt, putting aside all questions of personal desire, after 7 years of ceaseless and exacting service, to accept that candidacy. And we individually and collectively pledge to him our unswerving support in the fulfillment of the great tasks before us.

LABOR'S STAKE IN FREE GOVERNMENT

[Address by Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, delivered on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America at the New York World's Fair, Saturday, May 18, 1940, broadcast over the National Broadcasting Co. blue network]

Friends and fellow workers, I am glad to participate today with members and friends of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America in this celebration of its twenty-fifth anniversary. You who are members and we who are friends should be very proud of our association with an organization which has not only vindicated the dignity of labor in its struggle to bargain collectively but which has also demonstrated the capacity of organized labor to be a moving force in promoting industrial efficiency and in maintaining a socially just democratic society.

I have always been sympathetic with and interested in the trade-union movement. To me it is a truism that organized labor, effectively and intelligently led, as your phase of it has been, not only gives strength to the workers but to the Nation as a whole.

Shortly after the Women's Trade Union League was organized in Chicago in 1904, under the brilliant leadership of Mary McDowell and Margaret Dreier Robins, I volunteered my services when it decided to go to the legislature with a bill limiting the hours of labor of women in industry. It was not an easy fight. The manufacturers' associations were fighting us, the lawyers were fighting us, and there was a troublesome decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois that seemed to say that our bill was unconstitutional. Fortunately, however, about that time a distinguished lawyer from Boston, Louis D. Brandeis, appeared before the Supreme Court of the United States to defend the State of Oregon in a similar case. He spoke with an eloquence and social consciousness which caused even the Supreme Court of the United States to forget its old precedents. That gave us the strength to press our 10-hour law through the Illinois Legislature and to defend it successfully before the Illinois Supreme Court. Other States soon followed the trail that Oregon and Illinois had blazed, first with 10-hour laws and then with lower limitations.

I am also proud to recall that my association with the Amalgamated really antedates its actual birth by several years. That association dates back to the clothing-workers strike in Chicago in 1910, known as the Hart, Schaffner & Marx strike.

My friends of the Women's Trade Union League also threw themselves heart and soul into that fight. So did Hull House, that living monument to the greatest woman of her generation, Jane Addams. Pickets came not only from the ranks of the workers and sympathetic trade-unionists but from Hull House, the University of Chicage, and the North Shore. My wife was one of those who took her place in the picket line, while her mother sat in the police station signing the bonds of all arrested strikers and pickets.

The police were needlessly rough with the picketing strikers, but they were careful to be duly respectful to those of us who were lending a helping hand. However, they made an extraordinary slip. They arrested Ellen Gates Starr, co-founder with Jane Addams of Hull House. I undertook to defend her, and much to the distress of the authorities, I insisted that her case be tried even after the strike had been settled and other arrested pickets had been released. Despite the sworn testimony of three hefty policemen that they had arrested Miss Starr, who was a frail little lady, because she had put them in physical fear, she was triumphantly acquitted by judge and jury.

I do not want to give you the impression that the strike was won for the union by its friends outside of the union. On the contrary, the so-called respectable element in Chicago, by and large, was alarmed at the efforts of the garment workers to assert the right to organize and bargain collectively for the improvement of their working conditions. It was bruited about that many of the workers, including their leaders—the "ring-leaders" as they were contemptuously called—were immigrants who had no understanding of American institutions.

From my associations at Hull House with Jane Addams I knew too much about the immigrants—those huddled masses, yearning to be free—to be taken in by the horrendous reports about their "un-American" activities. But I must confess that when I first undertook to help the strikers—some of them boys still in their 'teens—I feared that, however good their intentions may have been, they had been rash, impulsive, and headstrong.

But when the first excitement of the strike subsided and employers and workers gathered around the table to discuss their common problems, my smug complacency was jolted. I found that I had more to learn from these boys than they had to learn from me. Even Jane Addams, Raymond Robins, and Margaret Dreier Robins, who had known the strikers much better than I, glowed with relieved satisfaction as accounts of the progress of the negotiations came in. The employers who had come to the conference table reluctantly, expecting an unpleasant ordeal with arrogant trouble-makers presenting exaggerated claims, reported back a rare and inspiring experience.

Fortunately some of the members of Hart, Schaffner & Marx were socially minded to a degree taht was unusual in those days for a typical employer. They were willing to put their own cards on the table and to listen to the case of their employees. They found that the strike leaders whom they had suspected, resented, and distrusted as young hotheads, had a keen and amazingly broad understanding of their common problems and a social vision and idealism which revealed a rare and abiding faith in the democratic way of life. So impressed were the employers by the case presented that they were willing to set up an impartial board on which both industry and labor should be represented and which should be presided over by that rare personality, James Mullenbach, once a coal miner and Protestant preacher, and then the head of the Chicago municipal lodging house.

The reports which came back from those conferences to us invariably singled out for especial praise one young man, slight of stature, and with gleaming black eyes from which flashed intellectual integrity, indomitable courage, and irresistible idealism. He was, we were told, wise beyond his years and a man destined to be a leader among men. He displayed a rare ability to understand the problems and difficulties of those with whom he had to negotiate and in return he expected an equal readiness on their part to understand the problems and difficulties of the workers.

That young man was Sidney Hillman. He has traveled far since those days, but he has never disappointed those who have put their trust in him.

As president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, Sidney Hillman has applied himself wholeheartedly and without stint for more than a quarter of a century to the advancement of the interests of American labor.

As president of the Amalgamated, Sidney Hillman has been no partisan politician, but he has eloquently and effectively asserted labor's need for legal recognition and protection. Although he has served the Amalgamated well and faithfully, he has also recognized that labor's strength lies in labor's unity; in labor's willingness to work together to promote the interest of the common man and woman.

No one has worked more ably and assiduously than Sidney Hillman to bring about the enactment into Federal law of fair labor standards for the protection of those workers, organized or unorganized, who are least able to protect themselves.

The Amalgamated may be proud of its leadership, and its leadership may be no less proud of the Amalgamated.

For successive terms the Amalgamated has maintained a continuity of effective and responsible leadership. You have been too wise and too regardful of your own best interests not to retain as your leaders those best qualified to serve you without paying any attention to the length of that service. And it is not without significance that there are few labor organizations more democratic than the Amalgamated.

I believe that it is as much the essence of democracy that people should have the right freely to continue a leadership which they desire as it is that they should have the right freely to discontinue a leadership which they spurn. Modern democracy is not a play where each member of the cast takes his turn at enacting the star role. In the dangerous world in which we live democracy cannot afford to deny itself the most effective leadership available. This is indeed a time to recall the salutary and truly sage advice of George Washington that there is "no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who in some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public."

We are not living in an era of peace or tranquillity. We are passing through one of the most fateful periods in the history of mankind. At home our domestic economy is adjusting itself to profound social and economic changes. Abroad, brute force and strident ambition march mercilessly against peaceful nations. Dictatorships are on the march to enslave the spirit of free democracy and we have been brought up against the realization that the world cannot exist half Fascist and half free.

However high or low our station, each and every one of us is deeply, anxiously concerned about our country's and our children's future, about their safety, their peace, their welfare in the years which lie just ahead of us.

There is no blinking the facts which President Roosevelt reemphasized in his message last January when he said that "the social and economic forces which have been mismanaged abroad until they have resulted in revolution, dictatorship, and war are the same as those which we are here struggling to adjust peacefully at home" * * * and "dictatorships—and the philosophy of force which justifies and accompanies dictatorships—have originated in almost every case in the necessity for drastic action to improve internal conditions where democratic action for one reason or another has failed to respond to new modern needs and modern conditions."

We have reached a fork on the way of industrial progress. We cannot, if we would, go back to the economic habits of our fathers before the power age. America must choose. On the one hand is the path which we elected to take in 1932 under the leadership of President Roosevelt—the path which calls for the strengthening and revitalizing of the processes of democracy so that, through them, we may meet the exigent social and economic problems of our time. On the other hand is the primrose path which we chose in 1920—the path which we blindly trod for 12 long years—dodging, concealing, forgetting, and ignoring the pressing social and economic problems of our time—and finding ourselves at the end facing chaos. If we again choose the primrose path we may not be so fortunate, when chaos comes, as to have a President with the self-restraint and wisdom of Franklin Delano Roosevelt to save us from abandoning liberty for the illusion of security.

During the last 7 years, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, we have made more peaceful adjustments to profound social and economic changes than in any period of our history. In the interest of free enterprise and of free labor we have challenged the right of a few to control and exploit the lives, the property, and the labor of the many. We have taken effective measures to protect labor's right to organize and to bargain collectively, and labor's right to obtain a fair wage for a fair day's work. We have taken effective measures to help the farmers to obtain a fair price for their products and to conserve their precious and irreplaceable soil. We have taken effective measures to protect the savings of investors and bank depositors. We have given work to the unemployed. We have initiated a low-cost housing program. We have made a start at providing social security against old age and unemployment.

These things, and many others, we have done to strengthen and revitalize our democratic way of life. Much has been accomplished; much is yet to be accomplished. And in doing and planning all of this we have given the common man a real stake in the preservation of our democratic way of life. In doing all of this we may have trod on a few arrogant vested interests, but let no man say that what we have done has not strengthened our national unity. Let no man say that we have destroyed hope, confidence, or enterprise. The hope, the confidence, the enterprise of the American people lies not in the luxuries of the few but in the opportunities of the many.

If American democracy is to survive, the social and economic gains of the New Deal must become a part of the American heritage. The unemployed are not going to be left uncared for. The industrial workers are going to be organized and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; they are not going to be content with company unions organized for them by Ernest Weir or Tom Girdler. The social security now afforded against old age and unemployment is not going to be scrapped, but is going to be extended upward and downward, and also outward into the field of health insurance. The Securities and Exchange Commission is going to continue to protect our people's savings from the arbitrary control of private economic power.

This does not mean that New Deal reforms are safe from attack. This does not mean that the administration of New Deal reforms can be safely entrusted to men who were openly hostile, or coldly indifferent, when President Roosevelt and his liberal followers were struggling to write them into the law of the land. It is not unfair to ask who are the men, who having worked night and day to accomplish these great reforms, have come to the conclusion that they could be improved or better administered by others who derive their support from those who bitterly opposed or grudgingly accepted them.

At this critical stage we can afford neither the luxury of a reaction nor the stress and strain of the counterreaction, if not counterrevolution, which would inevitably follow such reaction. The continuance of the Roosevelt administration is necessary to permit the New Deal's concept of social and economic justice to become an accepted part of our American system. Far-sighted men of affairs realize that it is better for business to adjust itself to the new order than to fight to upset it. They know that such a fight would stir up bitter resentment and social discontent and, at best, could be only temporarily successful. They realize that this is no time to turn back the clock. They do not want again to be chargeable with the appalling consequences which would almost inevitably follow a relapse into the primrose path. They look across to war-darkened Europe where the ruling classes thought that it cost too much to buy time, and they say that it is much more important that everyone should have enough than that those who have more than enough should have still more.

As all of us look across at tragic Europe, and shudder at the barbaric attacks against religion, freedom, and international good faith, we thank God that we have a President who was the first among us to see what was happening there, and seeing, has stirred us to the need of national defense and national unity.

There has been no man in our time in whom our people have placed their faith as they have placed it in President Roosevelt. There is no man whose word carries courage, conviction, and hope around the world as does President Roosevelt's. The inspiration of his leadership to those about to die for democracy was eloquently told by Dorothy Thompson in her column from Paris last Wednesday.

Nor has there been any time since the founding of the Republic that America has needed such leadership as President Roosevelt has given us to hold America—the whole of America, without regard to faith, race, or wealth—united in the face of great danger.

Today, despite the shoutings of politicians and the clamors of newspapers which no more represent the people or realize what they are thinking about than they did in 1936, there is more political unity in America than at any time in the past. There can be no question of partisanship in a year when our need for strong and experienced and trusted leadership is so great, when the lack of continuing such leadership may mean irrevocable disaster.

It is the people who are calling President Roosevelt. It is the people who are looking to President Roosevelt for continued leadership and will not be denied, because they have the right—the right of a democracy—to choose their Commander in Chief. It is the people, regardless of party, and not the politicians, who constitute the movement to continue President Roosevelt at the helm of the ship of state. The politicians, some of them belatedly, may think that they are doing the leading, but, regardless of their place in the procession, they are only following the people. The surprising thing about this popular movement toward the goal of national unity is that it is being joined daily by many people, rich and poor, Republican and Democrat, who opposed the President in years past and who still differ with him on many points of domestic policy. As these people express it, Roosevelt, at the present juncture of affairs, is the greatest unifying force of the Nation today and the unifying force which he represents is the country's greatest need today as we see the uncertainties and perhaps even the terrors of a social revolution that is shaking the world.

There is no higher law than the law of self-preservation. This law became part of the consciousness of man while he still dwelt in dark caves. This law is just as compelling today as it was in the beginning. It is this law that is bringing together, at a time of grave crisis, men who never before have seen alike on a political issue.

We know that President Roosevelt is not seeking another 4 years. We know that after 7 exacting and exhausting years in office it is his desire to retire to the quiet of his home on the Hudson—a desire that his true friends would be eager to see gratified, if it were not for the imperative need that the Nation—and humanity—has of him.

At this turning point in our country's history, President Roosevelt is in exactly the same position as was George Washington when the country confronted a similar crisis 150 years ago.

Washington, after 7 exacting years as the Commander in Chief of the American forces in the War for Independence, and after 6 years of patient struggle to establish an enduring Federal Union, was about the present age of President Roosevelt. He desired to retire to his Mount Vernon home, leaving the management of the affairs of State to other and younger hands. Yet, although independence had been won and the Union established, the people looked to him for the leadership necessary to make national unity a living reality. Washington was a faithful soldier in the cause of democracy, and he did not let down those who had fought democracy's battle with him.

And so we say to Franklin Delano Roosevelt: We, the people of the United States have twice elected you President of the United States. We have followed and supported your leadership in your efforts to strengthen and revitalize our democracy. You have served us well, but your work is not done. We consider your continuance in office for another 4 years necessary to give a free people national unity at a time of grave crisis—necessary to give hope and courage to those offering their last full measure of devotion to preserve freedom in a civilized world. At such a time, Mr. President, we must hold you to your promise not to let the people down. We propose to nominate you, we propose to elect you, and we, the people, command you to serve as our President.

Training of Civilian Pilots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. SCHULTE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of the House one of the finest steps toward national defense that has been taken by the Federal Government. I refer to the initiation of a program for the training of civilian pilots who, in the event of attack by a foreign power, would be equipped to aid in the defense of their shores. The program, sponsored by the Civil Aeronautics Authority, will return to the taxpayers of this country incalculable interest on their investment.

The C. A. A., through the Junior Board of Commerce of the District of Columbia, has chosen Columbus University Junior College as the local institution for conducting a ground-school course in aviation. I heartily commend both the Junior Board of Commerce and the Government agency for their splendid selection. Columbus University Junior College is rounding out only its second year. Yet its achievements in the field of education have become so notable that the Federal Government already recognizes its high standing in the academic field.

At this point I should like to pay public tribute to the guiding genius of Columbus University, a man who raised the university's law school to the third highest ranking law school in the country in point of enrollment. I refer to Dean John R. Fitzpatrick, whose zeal and organizational ability are largely responsible for the high standing of Columbus University today. It was through the efforts of Dean Fitzpatrick that the junior college was established 2 years ago. The school has offered educational opportunities to adults who otherwise would be denied the privilege of higher education. Now, through the recognition and aid of the Federal Government, an aviation department has been established in the junior college.

I appeal with all the sincerity at my command to the young men and women of Washington to take advantage of the ground-school course in aviation which the Federal Government is conducting at Columbus University Junior College. The course starts July 1 and will be given at evening sessions 5 nights a week. The cost of the course to the student is so negligible that it could hardly be an excuse for missing it. Heretofore, ground-school courses in aviation were usually reserved to men and women with college degrees. This course at Columbus University is for noncollege students, male and female, although college graduates are not barred.

There are many incentives and many laudable reasons why the youth of Washington should take an active interest in this course. In the first place I believe it is the solemn duty of every young man and woman to contribute his or her share toward the defense of the country. Especially is this true in these days of world-wide conflict and uncertainty. These are days when the incredible is happening right under our own eyes. This is an era when greater and greater emphasis should be placed on the importance of national preparedness. I know of no better way of preparing our country for the allegedly impossible than by this civilian pilot training which the Government is offering at Columbus University.

Disregarding, for the moment, the preparedness features of this ground-school course in aviation, one is forced to admit that the course is well worth the time and energy from the standpoint of self development and interest in the industry of aviation which is here to stay. It is, and will continue to be, an integral part of our industrial life. This industry is developing so fast, in fact, that within a few years airplanes will be as common as automobiles. In short, Washington men and women now have an opportunity of getting a first-class education in one of our most important industries under the sponsorship of the Federal Government.

The Government, I believe, has made the ground-school course at Columbus University very attractive. It is offering scholarships to the highest standing students who complete the course successfully. These scholarships enable the students to take flight-training courses without a penny of cost to them. The C. A. A. pays for these flight scholarships. This point alone should be sufficient to attract hundreds of young men and women to this course.

Multimillion Dollar War Propaganda Budget Exposed

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, in the accompanying article from yesterday's Washington Daily News, John T. Flynn discusses some very significant aspects of work now being done in this country by un-American agents. Mr. Flynn calls the attention of this country to the fact that agents who are trying to get us into the European War are in many ways fully as dangerous as agents who are trying to undermine our defenses at home. My Flynn calls for a rallying of pro-American forces to build an impregnable defense establishment to protect American interests at home.

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

NEW YORK, June 17.—There is a point in the current excitement about the war which is a little puzzling. Last December—4 months after this war started—Mr. Joseph P. Kennedy, American Ambassador to London, made the following statement:

"There is no place in this fight for us. It's going to be bad enough as it is. As you love America, don't let anything that comes out of any country in the world make you believe you can make a situation one whit better by getting into the war. There is no reason—economic, financial, or social—to justify the United States entering the war."

The war had started. But Mr. Kennedy, in full possession of this reason, warned against getting involved in the war. Poland had been devastated. Ships had been sunk. Finland had been raped by Russia. Warsaw had been destroyed. We all knew what Germany would do in France if she got the chance. Yet we were all resolved to stay out of the war. But now the hysteria is sweeping us in. What has happened?

In the United States Senate the other day someone recalled the statement of Lord Northcliffe about the last war. "England," said Northcliffe, "spent $150,000,000 for propaganda purposes in the United States during the war, and I consider that money spent to greater advantage than any equal amount during the entire conflict."

It is reported that the British Government has appropriated to spend here this time $165,000,000. We may be sure the sum is very great and that it is being spent intelligently. Can it be that this hysteria which is now raging in America is one fruit of the well-expended propaganda money for foreign countries?

There are, of course, powerful English instrumentalities at work to excite us into the war. That is quite natural. England is in a desperate position. She would be less than human if she did not try to get us in. There are also powerful German groups who want to keep us out and for exactly the same reason. Neither of them is thinking about America. Each is plotting to aid its own side. But there are Americans here—real Americans—who are thinking about America, her interests, her destiny, her democracy, her recovery, all of which would probably be destroyed by entering this war. Apparently it is quite proper for an English propagandist to work here to get us into a war. But an American who wants to keep out is a "fifth columnist."

Is it not time that we began to have a look at the sources, the means responsible for the amazing panic which has raged in this country in the last few weeks? We have investigated a good many trivial things these last few years. Here is the most serious thing in this world which, before it is done, may involve the lives of hundreds of thousands of our young men, the health of many more and the democratic security of us all. At this moment it is at the mercy of propagandists, foreign forces and agents trying to get us involved in war. And the Government is interested only in the agents who are trying to keep us out and gives no attention whatever to those who are trying to get us in.

If They Vote to Go Home, Vote to Keep Them There

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States feel that Congress should remain in session so as to be able to immediately legislate concerning any matter which may develop in these turbulent times. They do not agree with the President that Congress should adjourn and leave matters in his hands. They have had over 7 years' experience with his leadership and actions and they do not want to leave important decisions affecting both our national-defense program and our foreign policies in his hands. In this connection I call attention to the following editorial appearing in the Indianapolis Times on June 12, 1940:

[From the Indianapolis Times of June 12, 1940]

IF THEY VOTE TO GO HOME, VOTE TO KEEP THEM THERE

Within a few days Congress may be called upon to cast the most important vote of 20 years.

That will happen if administration leaders persist in their effort to force an adjournment.

Any Congressman who does vote to adjourn and go home should be commanded by his constituents to remain at home.

Any elected representative of the people who is so insensible of his constitutional obligations that he would voluntarily abandon his post at a time like this is, we believe, unfit for the responsibility of service in Congress.

The terrible conflict in Europe goes rapidly from bad to worse. Any day may bring the need for fateful decisions involving our Nation's peace and security. Borrowed billions have been laid on the line for rearmament. But to turn dollars into weapons in the quantities needed, old industries will have to be invigorated and new ones created. Only Congress can do what is necessary to mobilize idle capital and manpower for this supreme task.

Overnight it may become not a matter for academic debate but an imperative necessity to order compulsory military training and conscript men for defense duty. Congress alone has that power and responsibility.

Our Government has operated in the red through 11 years of apparent peace and security. Confronted now with need for gigantic new defense expenditures, nothing substantial has been done to weed out old wastes, and the only tax proposal yet made won't even balance the nonmilitary outgo.

Congress is the Nation's fiscal guardian. Yet it is suggested that Congress pack up and go home. It is suggested that if an "emergency" should arise the President will summon Congress back to a special session—a procedure which requires several days in a period where there may be no day to spare.

We repeat that any who votes to go home at a time like this ought to be made to stay there—and very probably will be.

It is the duty of the elected representatives of the people to assume the full responsibility of their office. Blanket power should not be granted to any individual, especially with conditions as they are, and Congress should remain on the job, ready to promptly perform any duty which is required. If the administration, in its desire to leave all matters in the President's hands, presents a resolution to adjourn it should be overwhelmingly defeated.

Today I received the following telegram from the Service Club, of Indianapolis, Ind.:

The Service Club of Indianapolis believes it is imperative that the Congress of the United States shall now remain in session and determine step by step the conduct of the United States in world affairs. We each of us expect that the Congress and its Senators and Representatives will individually discharge their obligations. We insist that they delegate none of their responsibilities whatever to the Executive or any other department of the Government. As the Members of Congress believe in democracy we urge them to perform the duties which the Constitution places solely on them and to refuse to transfer any such power either to the Chief Executive or elsewhere.

Congress should not delegate its powers. We should not let the war situation completely overshadow our domestic problems. Congress should exert its energy to a solution of our problems.

EDITORIAL BY WILLIAM GRIFFIN, OF THE NEW YORK ENQUIRER

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, this editorial by William Griffin, editor and publisher of the New York Enquirer, is good reading for he expresses the sentiments of 90 percent of the American people.

Would to God we had a press in the United States unhampered and untied to the international troublemakers, the people who have been responsible and are now using every means at their command to involve this country in war.

Would to God that we could get rid of this internationalistic administration, whose departments and bureaus are under the control of those who do not subscribe to those principles which were set forth in the document we are supposed to follow—a document which protects the majority of our people from minority usurpation.

I hope the people will wake up before it is too late, because the majority in Congress seems to be in a trance.

[From the New York Enquirer of June 10, 1940]

SAVING OF UNITED STATES SHOULD CONSUME ALL OUR EFFORTS

Entirely too much thought and effort is being given here to the problem of saving the Anglo-French Allies and entirely too little to the infinitely more important problem of saving the United States of America.

Every American is rightfully desirous of seeing the Nazi Reich laid low, but no American can in conscience desire to see Uncle Sam laid low in the process of bringing Adolf Hitler to justice. Little will it profit America to destroy Nazi land and save Britain and France if in so doing this Republic is itself destroyed.

Whether we like it or not, the truth is that this Republic is now well on the way to destruction.

Congress and all others concerned should realize that this is no time for plunging and floundering and gambling in the field of foreign relationships. We need clear and loyal thinking and clear and loyal action.

Our country is in positive peril, not from without but from within.

If we stand firm at home and do our duty to the Republic, keeping it at peace and strictly neutral, no harm can befall us. This, however, is not a course which commends itself to those whose first love is not America but the empire from which America wrung her freedom eight score years ago. They want to see Britannia succored and rejuvenated by the blood of millions of slaughtered American boys and at the cost of our national existence.

Things more than ominous have taken place in our beloved land in recent days. A Washington despatch June 6 revealed how swiftly the Republic is being conducted to disaster. It declared:

"State Department circles said the 'lid is now off,' and that this Government was prepared to give all possible aid to the Allies short of sending an expeditionary force to France."

Who has given our Government authority to extend such aid to the Anglo-French forces? Certainly not Congress, and certainly not the American people.

This step means war and nothing but war. It means that, without the permission of Congress, airplanes, rifles, artillery, tanks, warships, and other indispensable implements of national defense are to be handed over to Britain and France.

It means further that millions of American youths are marked for sacrifice on foreign soil.

The British and the French merit the warmest commendation for their unceasing loyalty to their own lands in all things. Who has ever heard of a member of the French or British Parliament advocating the stripping of his own country of its means of protection in order to bolster the defenses of foreign powers? Everyone who follows the debates in Congress knows that not one but many Members of both Houses are zealously advocating this very course for Uncle Sam.

When George Washington discovered the plot of Major General Arnold, leader of the British "fifth column" here in the War of Independence, he uttered these words of anguish:

"Whom can we trust now?"

These words of the Father of his Country have a particular appropriateness for, and can be applied with telling effect to, those so-called Americans who are working night and day to plunge our country into the present tournament of blood, death, and destruction now going on in Europe.

Whom can we trust now?

Not one of those who is openly clamoring or secretly plotting for war has the remotest intention of risking his own life or possessions in the death struggle wherein war would involve the Republic. They and their belonging are entirely too precious to be interfered with. The other fellows must do the bleeding and the paying.

It cannot be too often iterated that our entering the war would instantly result in the establishment of a dictatorship here whose tyrannous powers over the lives and liberties and belongings of our people will be all-embracing, a dictatorship that would inflict upon us at the very outset the exact evil against which we would have taken up arms abroad.

Another vital factor which should not be overlooked is the utter foolishness of reposing confidence in the fidelity of Britain and France as war Allies of ours.

At this very moment London and Paris are keenly suspicious of each other.

Most people never thought that the day would come when Hitler and Stalin would be allies. Yet that day has come.

And right now both England and France, despite their grandiose public beseechings of God to bless their cause, despite their perfervid avowals that they are fighting for liberty of mind and body despite the unspeakable doings of Stalin in Poland and Finland, are trying as hard as they possibly can to consummate an alliance with the tyrant of the Kremlin.

We have nothing to lose by remaining at peace. We have everything to gain by remaining at peace. Upon public action depends whether or not the war mongers in our midst will be able to involve us in war and destroy the Republic.

Americans would be false to their principles and ideals did they fail to abhor Hitlerism. They would be equally false to their principles and ideals did they allow their loathing for Hitlerism to result in the destruction of this Republic. The most deadly blow which the American people can deal Hitlerism is to prevent their country from being involved in war and subjected to certain dictatorship and certain ruin.

WILLIAM GRIFFIN,
Editor and Publisher, New York Enquirer.

Mr. Speaker, let us now contrast the article I have just quoted, and which represents the viewpoint of a real American, with an article which expresses the viewpoint of England—the internationalistic viewpoint.

Lord Lothian has been traveling throughout the United States ever since he arrived here, lecturing, coercing, trying to create a sentiment which would favor our engaging in a perfectly foolish, stupid, and senseless war, which no one is responsible for except Great Britain herself and those who advised her that we would be in the war.

Would it not be a fine predicament were we foolish enough to turn our fleet over to any power, no matter whether it be Great Britain or anyone else? We have turned our airplanes over and are in a sense left utterly defenseless today should anything happen. As a matter of fact, should England herself decide that someone in the United States has not kept his promise to her, she could invade us from the north and use the equipment that we have given her for conquest against us. There is nothing extraordinary about that, for Great Britain has broken more treaties and produced more scraps from them than any other power in the history of the world. She has shown less consideration for defenseless nations than any other world power. All her possessions have been gained by conquest—taken from a people who not only lacked modern weapons but did not even have, in many instances, more than a blowgun or bow and arrow for protection. She sacrificed 150,000 of her colonials in her Gallipoli campaign without losing any of her own people. Surely she has shown no consideration for anyone, yet here this traveling propagandist for the British Empire advises us, in a subtle manner, to be sure, to give England our fleet.

[From the New York Enquirer, June 10, 1940]

LOTHIAN HINTS UNITED STATES GIVE WARSHIPS TO BRITAIN

PITTSBURGH, June 9.—Great Britain, ruler of the seas for centuries, is in need of naval destroyers as well as airplanes for its fight against Germany, Lord Lothian, British Ambassador to the United States, declared.

"We need ships—naval destroyers—as much as we need planes," Lord Lothian said in an interview here while en route to Washington, Pa., to address the graduating class of Washington and Jefferson College.

"We need guns, too—antiaircraft and machine guns. We lost almost all of our equipment in Flanders and the Germans now have seized many of the French manufacturing plants in the north around Lille.

"That is why anything the United States can give us now may mean the difference between our winning or losing this war."

Speaking before the one hundred and thirty-ninth graduating class of Washington and Jefferson College, the British Ambassador expressed the belief that only the formation, in some form, of a United States of Europe would bring lasting peace to the war-torn Old World.

"If Europe could only conquer war and find a basis for unity within itself, the whole world would have taken an immense step forward," he said.

In conclusion, let me quote a noted British writer, Hilaire Belloc, from the same issue of the New York Enquirer:

HILAIRE BELLOC, NOTED BRITISH AUTHOR, REVEALS HOW AMERICA WAS DRAWN INTO WAR IN 1917

WASHINGTON, June 9.—A book by Hilaire Belloc, noted British author, historian, and lecturer, published in 1925, and which dwells on the methods used by warmongers to induce the United States to enter the World War in 1917, is said to be enjoying a brisk "revival sale" throughout the capital and in other principal cities, where people are interested in the peculiar parallels to the present propaganda methods presented in the book.

Belloc wrote in his book, 7 years after the end of the World War of 1914–18:

"The most comic part of the affair was the attitude toward America. We dared not insult America, for we were naturally as keen on getting American help as is a drowning man on catching a deck chair. * * *

"In their ignorance many people came to believe that it was the duty of the Americans to come over and help, and, what was more astonishing still, it was represented to them as a matter of life and death, not to us, but to themselves. The Americans were told (Heaven knows whether any of them believed it!) that if the Germans, Austrians, Bohemians, Slovenes, Croats, Bulgarians, Turks, etc., won in their push against the English, French, and Italians, that if the half-baked won against the baked, the next thing would be a sailing of the conquerors over the sea for the rude domination of Scranton, Pa. Fiddlesticks-ends!

"But people did really talk like that. They shook their fingers at the United States and said: 'It will be your turn next!'"

These articles in the New York Enquirer express exactly what is happening in the United States today. We are being treated with the same coercion by the English and by the English Internationalistic Government.

There is much to be said about this, but space forbids incorporation of all this information within the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. However, my entire interest in inserting this is to provide the people of this Nation with facts based upon statements by those who call the American people sheep.

My Answer to Unfair and Uncalled for Newspaper Attacks—Sufferers of Atavism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOACHIM O. FERNANDEZ

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under the rules I would be privileged to address the House of Representatives for 1 hour, to defend my character and dignity against imputations emanating from blatant New Orleans newspapers. In order not to interfere with the legislative program I shall be content to place these remarks in the RECORD. Primarily, to support this statement I quote from editorial of the New Orleans Item, titled "That Lost Drydock."

Higgins industries launches the first of several torpedo boats for Uncle Sam's Navy. We ought to be building and launching lots of bigger ones at the Algiers Navy Yard—and still bigger fighting and commercial ships in a great shipyard here in New Orleans.

But the same day the Higgins craft takes to the water the Navy starts New Orleans' big naval drydock on its way to far-off Hawaii. That terribly upsets the balance. The association of commerce and other Orleans interests have long been struggling to keep this great dock here and get it into operation. But there it gaily goes on its way across the Pacific.

And while this departure was incubating our congressional delegation has mostly been heeling around down here at home to save the plundering statehouse machine.

Our people should get it at last into their heads that our naval drydocks will go to Hawaii, and our navy yard will gather moss, and no commercial shipyard will rise in New Orleans until we get a couple of Senators and eight Representatives in Washington who have the energy, intelligence, and address, to make the administration and the Federal departments give due consideration to the just demands of New Orleans in such matters as this.

The Algiers yard goes on rusting in Congressman FERNANDEZ' district. To get respectful treatment for it is a job calling for strong character, exceptional address, dogged persistence, and a willingness to be disagreeable, also for the talent to attract congressional allies in such efforts, and to get the ears of the President and those who run the executive department.

It long ago became apparent that Mr. FERNANDEZ by no means fills this bill. Even if he and his colleagues had not been ward-heeling down here for the corrupt statehouse machine, instead of concentrating their time to saving this naval dredge, and getting the navy yard reopened, it would have made no difference. For Mr. FERNANDEZ simply lacks the qualifications required of a man who handles assignments of that sort.

Editorial from the New Orleans States:

Yesterday saw the great naval drydock that for years has been at the Algiers Naval Station started on a trip to Honolulu. This dims the hopes of Orleanians that the naval station, giving employment to many, would be reopened some time in the near future. This station, if in operation, would do much toward relieving the unemployment situation in New Orleans and aid our merchants and businessmen on the road to greater prosperity. New Orleans should never have lost the Algiers Naval Station. Our Congressmen and Senators have been derelict in their duty in allowing this great port to be discriminated against as it has by the Navy Department in closing of the Algiers yard.

While New Orleans is fighting for industrial independence "Bathtub" JOE FERNANDEZ, Member of the House of Representatives, and Senator ALLEN J. "Little Bull" ELLENDER spent most of their time in Louisiana doing all in their power to perpetuate the rule of a crooked political machine over this State. They should have been in Washington, fighting to keep the drydock here and to reopen the Algiers Navy Yard, instead of going around the State, one stirring up race issues and the other raising his voice in defense of a machine that has brought disgrace upon Louisiana.

Mr. Speaker, I want to categorically deal with these outbursts from newsprint species of atavism. For the benefit of those of my constituents who read this, I want them to know what atavism is. I assume the gentlemen of the House know, but I primarily want my folks back home, whose education is somewhat limited like myself, to understand what I am trying to express here. Atavism is the recurrence of any peculiarity or disease from which an ancestor in remote generations has suffered. Of course in the instance of these newspapers the "recurrence" does not generate back so long, as I just want to deal with my career, in face of this unjust castigation by some so-called learned college and university graduates, who get paid to push a pen behind an editor's desk and try to mold public opinion. O Mr. Speaker, I recognize the set-up in this country, and the essentiality of freedom of the press. I think that every Member of the House concurs in that recognition. I simply want to vindicate myself, and use this means at this time to do so, as I have offered myself for reelection in the primary to be held in Louisiana on September 10, this year. These newspapers have always in the past, it seems, been motivated by atavism. They always fought the man who was for labor—the man who was for the masses. Yet, these same newspapers, through paid advertisement in their columns, profited by what the same men—who produced more for the common people and masses in Louisiana, who gave them more benefits, who opened the way for new industry and increased business in Louisiana—were directly and indirectly responsible for.

Mr. Speaker, if what was printed in the editorial of the Item were not so serious, it would be laughable. To say that such printed comment by a newspaper subject to atavism is enshrouded in doubt and qualified with "if" is only corroborating the exhibition I have made. I maintain and hold that I do enjoy my prerogative as a free American citizen to mingle among my friends and common people and people in all walks and classes of life in my district during the year and around election time. Politics is my business. But I maintain and hold that my action has been legal, and nothing I did or will do could stop any citizen from exercising his right to vote in a Louisiana primary as he or she saw fit. I have the right, Mr. Speaker, to have a reasonable discussion with my folks and give "sales talks" if I desire. Oh, but the insinuations of an abusive press would try to impress decent people's minds with other feed, just as if they were issuing fodder to cattle.

In the editorial of the States is reflected the pen of an editor who is trying to kindle some of his own political aspirations or ambition. Of course, that is his God-given right, but to abuse, or try to abuse, Members of Congress is just a little side line with another press that suffers with atavism. They say in this editorial that I spent most of my time in Louisiana doing all in my power to perpetuate the rule of a "crooked political machine" over Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, do you or any gentleman of this House believe that the machine itself as a whole was filled with corruption? I am not here to defend any man but myself, and it is my name that has been impugned. But I will say this: Many of the men and women in that organization were honest, industrious, and good citizens. If they were not, collapse would have occurred sooner. Out of elected officials in the Long organization in Louisiana, only one was indicted. He was an ex-Governor. A few holding appointive jobs were charged and indicted and convicted. Most of the men indicted, and some of whom were convicted, were businessmen having dealings with the regime. However, I do not intend to prolong any Louisiana political strife, but am simply citing these facts in defense of my action.

Mr. Speaker, this is a free country. A fellow has the right to choose whom he wishes to support. All of my loyal friends held jobs under the State regime. I wanted to do what I could to save their jobs. I would do it again. A dog is known for his faithfulness to mankind. These men of whom I speak were kind to me when they did not have State jobs. They supported me for office in the past; and lots of them are loyal yet to me, even though they face the loss of their jobs under the new administration.

The Editorial of the States asks "What other benefits has 'Bath Tub' JOE FERNANDEZ lost for the people of his district besides the Algiers Naval Dock?" My answer is "None." I challenge those newspapers, sufferers of atavism, to show what benefits I lost during by absence from Washington, in an effort to help my people and their cause. I say my people, for my people did by a majority express themselves the same as I did. Nothing arose in this great Chamber during my absence that was lost to the great State of Louisiana.

Yes; it is true the floating drydock at the Algiers Naval Station was moved. But did that occur during my absence? Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate how a suffering press will deliberately try to fool the people, I want to point out that the President of the United States, on September 11, 1939, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, ordered the removal of this drydock to the Hawaiian Islands Naval Base at Honolulu, notwithstanding my repeated appeals to the President and the Navy Department. The President exercised his temporary emergency powers to transfer the dock on the same day he decreed a limited emergency existed in this country, September 11, 1939. I am prone to recognize the necessity of strengthening our naval base in the Pacific at Honolulu. I am sure that the people of New Orleans will understand this movement of the drydock by the President as one for their ultimate protection and general welfare, as an instrument of national defense. Howbeit, I want at this time to insert in the RECORD communications between the President of the United States and myself on the subject:

JUNE 9, 1938.

Hon. F. D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On April 26, 1938, you approved the Naval Supply Act for the year July 1, 1938–June 30, 1939. On page 16 thereof, under Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks, is this proviso:

"* * * and including such sum as may be necessary incident to the utilization of the naval station, New Orleans, La., for vessels to be placed and maintained in a decommissioned status. * * *"

That proviso was included, at my instance, through cooperation of the members of the Appropriations Committee, and was retained in the act without a single objection on the part of the committee of which I am a member.

Congressman MALONEY and myself, from New Orleans, about a week ago contacted your secretary, Mr. McIntyre, in an effort to arrange an appointment with you, when we would be enabled to make our appeal to you in person so that funds for this purpose may not be withheld during the next fiscal year; and in order that this important project of the Navy may be reopened on this small scale, with the vision of enlarging it suitably from time to time, for reasons that in these troublesome times must be obvious to you.

The appointment sought has not yet been granted, and I find it essential to embark for New Orleans tonight on urgent matters. I had hoped, in vain, that Mr. MALONEY and myself would have earned this engagement prior to this time. Mr. President, the station at Algiers, New Orleans, is located in the district which I represent. I quote from letter of January 24, 1938, from Admiral William D. Leahy, Chief of Naval Operations:

"* * * relative to reopening of the New Orleans Navy Yard, the revised estimates now are:

1. Reopening of yard for maintenance and recommissioning of from 10 to 20 destroyers	$1,258,405
2. Increase in annual maintenance	356,463

"It is estimated that civilian personnel will total about 80 men."

I now quote from the unanimously adopted report of the House of Representatives (No. 1699, of January 17, 1938) on H. R. 8993, the Naval Supply Act of 1938:

"It is the thought of the committee that if the decommissioned vessels be added to at the establishments where they are now maintained, congestion would ensue and delay might result in getting them promptly in readiness in event of emergency. For that reason New Orleans, with its unused facilities and fresh water, which lessens the amount of deterioration, would seem to be ideally suited for the accommodation of vessels hereafter decommissioned. The policy would occasion added expense to this and other appropriations, but possibly not to an extent which would outweigh the advantages that would ensue, should an emergency arise, from being in a position to recondition and recommission more expeditiously vessels which would be in immediate demand, than would be practicable under present practice."

I do not want to throw suspicion on any of our neighbors, for I believe in your good neighborly policy. However, we must face factual possibilities. It is a fact that this country did war with Mexico at one time. That may be healed or not healed, all dependent on the feelings of the other country. That we have no control over the politics or policies of Mexico, or other countries—I am speaking of Mexico, however—is evident by the fact of recent expropriation of the oil industry by that country. In that light that we do not control Mexico's policy or politics, isn't it possible that some European or Asiatic nation may find a suitable base there, based possibly upon some financial or reciprocal arrangement, thereby endangering our country if that nation be antagonistic in policy or character towards the United States? In such event, wouldn't it be most wise—just on the strength of that possibility, as well as other considerations—to let this money go for the reopening of the navy station at New Orleans?

Mr. President, I regret Mr. MALONEY's and my efforts have so far been in vain, to see you, and that response was not had from the White House ere this time. I want you to know that I supported your administration every time except to restore Federal employees' salaries and veterans' benefits, and which was passed by Congress overriding your veto. I am disappointed in the sense that I had expected this appointment, particularly as a few attempts in past years proved unsuccessful, too.

Before closing, I want to direct your attention to the further possibility of expanding the naval station at New Orleans for ship construction—possibly light cruisers—either or both of Navy and Merchant Marine.

I commend these thoughts and facts to you for your earnest and wise consideration, hoping that the outcome will coincide with the wish of Congress, at this time, insofar as the proviso in the Naval Supply Act of 1938 applies.

In esteem, I beg to remain,
Respectfully,

J. O. FERNANDEZ.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 10, 1938.

Hon. J. O. FERNANDEZ,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FERNANDEZ: Your letter of June 9 has been brought to my attention and I have read it with a great deal of interest.

Personally, I should have liked to have talked this matter over with you, but it frankly has been impossible for me to see everyone I should during these last couple of weeks.

The matter you refer to is being looked into at my direction. I think it is only fair to state frankly to you, however, that all the recommendations made to me—and we have gone into it very thoroughly—oppose any attempt to locate the construction yard at New Orleans.

I will be glad to go into this in detail with you at the first opportunity.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., September 4, 1939.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Kindly refer to my letter of June 9, 1938, and your acknowledgment of June 10, concerning my request and suggestion, as well as continued efforts, for the reopening of the United States Naval Station at Algiers, New Orleans, La.

I now believe that, in face of the European trend, the importance of this unit at New Orleans should not any longer be discounted or minimized.

Therefore, again, Mr. President, I implore that your Executive offices be used toward the attainment of this goal.

At the present time the Algiers Naval Station is under the supervision of the Louisiana National Youth Administration, which conducts an N. Y. A. training youth center there, which, of course, I understand, is subject to an occupational right by the United States Navy Department.

May I anticipate your wise consideration in this matter in connection with an expansive and necessary naval program?

In highest esteem, I remain,
Respectfully,

J. O. FERNANDEZ.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 14, 1939.

Hon. J. O. FERNANDEZ, M. C.,
3501 St. Claude Avenue, New Orleans, La.

MY DEAR MR. FERNANDEZ: In reply to your letter of September 4, 1939, I have given consideration to your request for the reopening of the United States Naval Station at Algiers, New Orleans, La.

The major part of the Algiers Naval Station is, as you know, occupied and operated at the present by the National Youth Administration under a revocable permit from the Navy Department. In large measure the Navy Department was motivated in its granting of this permit by the belief that the general condition of the plant would be benefited by occupation; long years of inactivity result in deterioration and I feel that the present use of the station should prove a useful step in preparing the station for reoccupancy by the Navy should necessity arise. Indirectly in this respect the Navy Department has made possible the expenditure of considerable sums in the New Orleans area for the dual purpose of furthering the projects of the N. Y. A. and some reconditioning of the naval station.

The prospective usefulness of marine facilities will always depend on the character and extent of operations in the vicinity and until such time as the national policy calls for naval operations in the vicinity of the Mississippi Delta, no expanded naval activities can very well be undertaken at New Orleans. At a time like this all of our available appropriations must be extended for the strengthening of the essential parts of the national defense, and at the moment those essential parts are the operating forces of our Fleet and the shore facilities to build them and keep them operating.

It may very well be that the United States may be forced to still further expansion of its naval activities and you may be assured that New Orleans will always be given full and careful consideration in studying our national-defense needs.

I regret that I cannot offer you concrete encouragement in this instance, but I wish to reemphasize the fact that the naval policy has already benefited New Orleans to some extent and I wish to reassure you that New Orleans will receive fair consideration in future studies.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 3, 1939.

Hon. J. O. FERNANDEZ,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERNANDEZ: I have your letter of October 31, 1939, relative to the removal of the floating drydock from the Naval Station, New Orleans, La.

The present limited emergency has dictated a redistribution of the units of the fleet and the assignment of certain vessels to the Naval Station, Pearl Harbor. The existing docking facilities at that station are entirely inadequate to take care of these additional vessels and it becomes imperative, in the interests of national defense, that this deficiency be made good at the earliest practicable date. Under present conditions the floating drydock at New Orleans serves no useful purpose to the Navy. On the contrary, the maintenance and guarding of the dock constitute an unproductive financial burden. As you are aware, the dock is not now equipped to accommodate vessels as the blocking has been removed. In the absence of any governmental vessels to be docked, there is no prospect that the dock would be placed in active service if it were left at New Orleans.

While it is to be regretted that circumstances make necessary the removal of the dock, I believe you will agree with me that the interests of the national defense are paramount in this case.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

My activity in behalf of the Algiers Naval Station dates back to my first tenure in office as a Member of Congress 10 years ago. I regret exceedingly the President did not view our local situation the same as I did, notwithstanding my own efforts, character of address, and the efforts of all labor and civic units of New Orleans, and the efforts of the newspapers themselves.

In order that a correct appraisal of the situation may be advanced, I wish to have inserted now the history of the naval station, New Orleans, known as the Algiers Naval Station, as furnished me by the Navy Department:

NAVAL STATION, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The naval station, New Orleans, was originally established in 1849 by the purchase of a tract of land consisting of water frontage on the Mississippi River, in the town of Algiers, 384 feet along the fiver front and extending inland 5,880 feet. No acitve use was made of this reservation until 1889, when a commission was appointed pursuant to an act of Congress, approved September 7, 1889, to determine upon a site on the Gulf of Mexico or its tributaries for a navy yard. The senior member of this board was Commodore William P. McCann. This board selected New Orleans as the most desirable location on the Gulf of Mexico for a navy yard. Its primary functions were determined to be the maintenance and repair of the naval-defense forces of the Mississippi River as formulated by the Board of Engineers on fortifications and other defenses of 1885. At this time the naval-defense force was to consist of 2 floating batteries and 12 torpedo boats, reinforced by submarine mines.

Pursuant to the recommendations of the McCann board, additional land was purchased in 1894, 1901, and 1904, augmenting the original purchase of 1849 and making the present area 214.76 acres, the total cost of which has been $148,002.

Active construction work was started in 1901 and consisted of a group of industrial buildings, storehouses, and quarters. The floating dock which is now located at the station was constructed in 1901 and put in operation in the latter part of 1901. The first ship to be docked was the collier Sterling of 5,663 tons. The battleship Illinois of 11,565 tons was docked on January 6, 1902.

The station was closed in 1911. In 1913 a board was appointed to inspect the station and report on the advisibility of its being reopened. This board reported against the reopening of the station but recommended that it be kept in its then present condition until other activities elsewhere could be developed and that the drydock be maintained for the continued docking of vessels.

In 1915 after the outbreak of the World War the station was opened and activities started leading to its emergency use. Following the declaration of war on April 6, 1917, these activities were greatly expanded, resulting in the establishment of an emergency naval hospital and training camp at the station.

The station continued in a more or less active status until July 27, 1921, when by General Order No. 63, it was placed on an inoperative basis. The equipment and appurtenances were not removed, only the stores being shipped away or sold. On February 7, 1923, the Board of Commissioners of the Port of New Orleans leased the water-front area with wharves, buildings, railroads, and other structures and agreed to keep and maintain the premises and superstructures thereon in a like state of repair.

No ships have been built at the station for the Navy.

The station plant is equipped with the necessary facilities for minor ship repair work, including shops of capacity for routine repairs upon ships which can be handled by the floating dock. The station plant consists of industrial buildings, all of brick and steel construction, and are in a generally good structural condition. The water front consists of 4,400 feet of wharves, of timber and steel construction, with 30 to 35 feet of water alongside. The station is protected from high water of the Mississippi River by a levee extending the full length of the property. A railroad track system connecting with the Southern Pacific Railroad serves the entire station and there are complete installations of service systems for water, electricity, compressed air, telephone, sewer, heating, and roadways.

Ships docked in the floating drydock since 1903 have been as follows:

1903	26
1904	19
1905	18
1906	12
1907	5
1908	4
1909	12
1917	17
1918	74
1919	77
1920	42
1921	19
1922	1
1923	12
1924	14
1925	10
1926	13
1927	13
1928	11
1929	13
1930	12
1931	8
1932	5

The dock was placed out of commission in the latter part of 1933.

The character of ships docked at New Orleans from 1903 to 1932 consisted of submarine chasers, light cruisers, gunboats, merchant ships, eagle boats, Army dredging equipment, station craft, and barges of the Mississippi Warrior Service. Most of the vessels docked were commercial ships, barges, and station craft.

The average number of civilian employees for the various years is as follows:

1901	6
1903	71
1907	450
1910	497
1911	191
1912–14	7
1915	242
1916	332
1917	1,205
1918	1,641
1919	1,317
1920	1,237
1924	80
1925	71
1926	54
1927	78
1928	126
1929	74
1930	130
1931	106

1932	34
1933	16
1934	11
1935	78
1936	23
1937	17

Briefly, the construction commenced in 1901. The station was closed in 1911. This station was only reopened at the outbreak of the World War in 1915, leading to its emergency use. Following our entry into that war its activities were greatly expanded for reasons obvious to everyone. Oh, yes, President Roosevelt was an Assistant Secretary of the Navy during the World War. He was familiar with the need, if any, of a naval base at New Orleans. Of course, since the last World War methods of warfare have changed, and I do not question the ingenuity of the President in having the drydock removed, but I regret it, as I wanted to see it retained for future use. We observe that this station was closed or placed in an inoperative status on July 27, 1921, by General Order No. 63. I was not in Congress in 1921, Mr. Speaker. No ships were ever constructed at this station for the Navy, but repairs were made to naval vessels—the battleship Illinois, January 6, 1902.

Yes, we see the station inoperative on July 27, 1921, and on February 7, 1923, the dock board leased the water-front area with wharves, buildings, railroads, and structures thereon. I was not a Member of Congress until 1931 and 1932, 10 to 11 years after this station was actually closed. When this station was closed there was a gentleman from New Orleans, under a Republican regime, as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, the Honorable Ernest Lee Jahncke, a Republican at that time. New Orleans at that time had two Congressmen and an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and still that power was unable to frustrate or prevent this closure. What am I to do?

The Item's editor says in his write-up March 20, 1940:

The Algiers Yard goes on rusting in Congressman FERNANDEZ's district—to get respectful treatment for it is a job calling for strong character, exceptional address, dogged persistence, and a willingness to be disagreeable, also for the talent to attract congressional allies in such efforts, and to get the ears of the President and those who run the executive department.

That is a reflection on me, Mr. Speaker, by the bold imputation that I am incompetent. After this summary of quotations from the RECORD, backed by my volume of papers of my activity on this matter, I hope the lack of veracity and lack of respect for a true factual situation on the part of this newspaper editor and publisher, another sufferer of avatism, is demonstrated. Mr. Speaker, I now insert a reprint from the Sunday Item-Tribune of September 10, 1939.

[From the New Orleans Item-Tribune of September 10, 1939]

ALGIERS NAVAL STATION BOOMS WITH PEACE ACTIVITY—TWELVE HUNDRED YOUTHS ARE LEARNING WAY TO ECONOMIC SECURITY—NAVY WILL FIND PLACE IN SHAPE IF CALL TO HELP BOLSTER FORCES COMES; FERNANDEZ HAS WAGED HARD FIGHT TO HAVE YARD REOPENED; SARRE AND N. Y. A. BOYS DOING FINE WORK

While the controversy goes on as to whether the United States naval station in Algiers will be reopened as such, because of the war situation, the activities in that $8,000,000 plant are almost as great as during wartime, but they are N. Y. A. activities.

It may be that the new war threats will call for the reopening of the naval station by the Government, as happened during the World War; but if so, the Navy will find their place shipshape.

Twelve hundred youths from families on relief in New Orleans have been a peacetime substitute "navy," learning various trades in the shops of the decommissioned station, at the same time putting the place in apple pie order.

FERNANDEZ FIGHT

Congressman J. O. FERNANDEZ has been one of the longest and hardest fighters in the move to reopen the naval station, but it was also through him that the permission came to allot the station to the National Youth Administration.

Mr. FERNANDEZ has recently urged President Roosevelt to carry out the plan of re-establishing the Naval station, but in the meantime, A. J. Sarre, State administrator for N. Y. A., has been the admiral at the helm.

Following a formal permit prepared by the Judge Advocate General of the Navy in October of last year the Navy Department on December 30 turned over to the National Youth Administration for Louisiana custody of practically all the properties now standing on the approximately one square mile of territory in Algiers known as the Algiers Naval Station.

Yes; that was a fairly good write-up, Mr. Speaker. The New Orleans Item had some good reason for that, I suppose. I did not ask them for it. Lest we forget the truth. Alas! The New Orleans Item has reformed—or has it? I remember the Item has always flirted with the old regular organization in New Orleans when it did not suffer attacks of atavism. For instance, it flirted with the old Martin Behrman regime. The late Martin Behrman was a long-time mayor of New Orleans. Between its reform fights it again flirted with the Walmsley regime and was benefited again as official mouthpiece for city proceedings in its Tribune. It also benefited from paid political advertisements. For the benefit of my friends back home, who may not know, advertising rates for political ads are the highest that are paid to a newspaper. Now read this: this same item decried the State machine, yet this same Item obtained forced subscriptions through that political organization. Of course, all employees of the State machine were forced to subscribe, not 1 subscription for 6 months or 3 months, but 3, 4, 5, and 6, and sometimes 12, according to salary received. Those poor persons earning 30 cents an hour did not want 1 subscription; no, they did not want one, did not care for the Item-Tribune if it were given to them, but were made to purchase 3 and 4 subscriptions each. Many of them in my own ward, the ninth, complained to me about it, and in some instances, I can prove, actually gave them the money to pay for their subscriptions in order that their families might not be deprived of the necessities of life, which they could not purchase when being compelled to subscribe to a newspaper they did not care for. O Mr. Speaker, the Times-Picayune, a contemporary of the Item-Tribune, did have a front-page box about this, but the Item denied it, saying it was a contest. But I stand ready to submit proof in sworn form, if necessary, to corroborate my charge that the New Orleans Item used the organization to force men to take newspaper subscriptions.

In closing I want to deal a little with a few of my accomplishments in the way of actual physical improvements I was responsible for obtaining in my district in New Orleans, contrasted with the loss of the floating dock at the Algiers Naval Station. Here is the record and score:

Lost: The floating drydock. But I promise to fight for renewal during an emergency, as well as for the complete restoration of this yard, and possibility of making a naval air base there:

Won: A new lighthouse supply depot—completed—my bill in Congress authorized this building.

A new Federal building at New Orleans, being completed. As a member of the powerful Appropriations Committee, wrote into the deficiency bill the funds to construct the building. Notwithstanding the opposition of certain business interests of New Orleans.

A Coast Guard station on Lake Pontchartrain. My bill passed Congress authorizing this station. It is hoped the people will vote the constitutional amendment again this November. You will recall it was defeated last election.

Surrender of the title of Bayou St. John to the city of New Orleans—my bill—resulting in local improvement of this section.

Surrender of the land fronting the United States jail to permit strengthening of the levee at that point, Esplanade Avenue and river, and shifting of the railroad tracks, street, and so forth—my bill.

A new post-office building at Arabi—completed—near the great American Sugar Refinery, Ford Motor Car Co., and oil plant.

A $300,000 customs appraisals stores building, money appropriated for, and Treasury Department considering a further budget request for, $300,000 additional for larger building.

My work on having the United States Department of Agriculture declare muskrat trappers, farmers, and placing a project in St. Bernard and Plaquemines Parishes, rehabilitating some three or four hundred families—spending nearly $1,000,000.

These are some citations of physical improvements, and do not include, for instance, the new post-office building to be erected in Algiers, funds for which I hope to receive in one of the deficiency bills this Congress. Also does not include other services and accomplishments obtained in my public service for the people of my district and our State. I am therefore proud of my record of accomplishments for my people.

Farmers and City Workers Should Unite on Sugar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, cane-sugar refineries are located, with a few minor exceptions, in the great seaports of the United States. Obviously Iowa has no cane-sugar refinery. As a consequence, it has no direct economic interest in the decision by Congress regarding the refined-sugar quotas. But the people of Iowa, I believe, favor the restoration of the refined-sugar quotas on Hawaii and Puerto Rico. The reason for this is that Iowans recognize the general principle that there must be a fair balance between industry on the one hand and agriculture on the other if there is to be a strong and well-knit nation.

Iowa is the very heart of American agriculture. For years it has battled for the defense of the American farmer, and it rejoices that this battle has been won in large part. The Nation recognizes today that a prosperous American agriculture is necessary to insure a prosperous American industry, and, conversely, a prosperous American industry is necessary to insure a prosperous American agriculture. The people in the great refining States of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and so on, know that their factories cannot sell goods unless the farmer has the money to buy them. And Iowa cannot sell its meat and grains unless the city people are employed. What the Cummings bill would do, unless it is amended, is to definitely create unemployment in those great industrial cities. It would wipe out the buying power of thousands of well-paid American workmen whose wives spend millions of dollars a year for farm products.

But going beyond this, the Cummings bill in its present form is bitterly opposed by millions of people in the industrial States. American organized labor is against it 100 percent. I do not see why any American farmer at this time would want to crush the feeling of good will and cooperation which now exists between the city and the farmer. In these perilous times the various sections of this Nation must be united in a common front.

Now, it has been stated by some people that all of this might be true, but sugar refining is an industry, and Congress should not include a sugar industry in a sugar-farm bill. At the outset, I want to make it perfectly clear that, although the Sugar Act affects some 85,000 mainland farmers, the production of sugar in Hawaii and Puerto Rico is not a farm pursuit at all. Anyone who has seen a sugar plantation in Hawaii or Puerto Rico knows that tropical raw-sugar production is an industrial rather than an agricultural operation. The tropical-sugar refining industry is corporate big business. The Serralles and Roig families in Puerto Rico, who want to expand their refining at the expense of the home industry, have combined assets estimated at $10,000,000.

But even if tropical sugar were produced on small farms of 2 or 3 acres, this would not alter the key fact that Congress could not, even if it wanted to, separate the continental refiners from a general sugar bill. The quota system controls the amount of refined sugar which can be made by the mainland cane-sugar refining industry. The Sugar Act prohibits the refiners from purchasing any more sugar than is allowed by law. If there were no prohibition on the business of the refiners through quotas, there wouldn't be any quota system. And if the refining industry did not pay into the Treasury some $47,000,000 a year as a manufacturers' sales tax, there wouldn't be any funds out of which the enormous subsidies could be paid to the tropical refiners. And mind you, the Roig and Serralles families in Puerto Rico have received some $2,000,000 in cash since the Sugar Acts went into effect.

Congress, in 1934 and in 1936, and again in 1937, recognized that quotas on raw sugar made it necessary to provide quotas on refined sugar. Congress in 1940 will again recognize that fact. I am glad that Congress has the opportunity, in a so-called farm bill, to protect the interests of the workers in the industrial States. The sugar bill gives Congress the opportunity to give specific effect to a salutary general principle, that is that in every instance a balance should be maintained between the interests of American agriculture on the one hand and American industry and labor on the other.

Youth Opportunities in Aviation

AVIATION: "BEST BET" FOR BOYS

(By W. Laurence LePage, president of Platt-LePage Aircraft Co. and aviation writer)

In this day, when the airplane has become a terrible weapon of destruction, it is both difficult and discouraging to attempt to speak constructively on the outlook for youth in aviation. When we think of 45,000 pilots in 2 years, 100,000 mechanics to keep 50,000 military planes in the air, and other gigantic plans to create a military machine, then the outlook is discouraging.

But this is a passing phase in history. In time aviation will again assume its true role as a peaceful tool of civilization and young men and women will devote their lives to an industry which has proved its inestimable value in our industrial and social life.

Basically, the aircraft industry means either transportation or manufacturing. In both spheres opportunities exist identical with those in other industries, with one exception—vision and enthusiasm commensurate with an industry as young and far-reaching are essential if one is to stay in the race.

The idea that taking up aviation as one's life work only entails going to a flying school and learning to be a pilot, or a mechanic's school and learning to adjust and repair planes and engines, is a short-sighted one which has brought disappointment and discouragement to many young people.

Cut a cross section through manufacturing, transportation, banking, insurance, accounting, advertising, writing, and so on, and you will get an idea of the infinite kinds of work open to you in the aviation industry.

Salaries and wages are the same or higher than those paid in other industries but the standards are harder to measure up to.

Why are standards so high? Because the business is new, because vision was necessary to bring it to its present high state of development, and because even greater vision will be needed to keep up the pace. Also, since an error in aviation work is likely to have more far-reaching results, only the most competent are acceptable and only those who can maintain the standards can keep up with the pace.

It is perhaps for this reason that the industry is, for the most part, made up of young men, men who have been keyed up to the pitch by aspirations of their youth and who have never allowed themselves to fall into careless habits.

Those who expected a recital of specific jobs available and advice on how to get them, are probably disappointed. But I have covered the things that really matter, the qualities which make the aviation industry the finest bet for youth on the horizon today.

Who Receives Nation's Wealth?

ARTICLE FROM THE HAVERHILL (MASS.) SUNDAY RECORD

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Haverhill Sunday Record:

[From the Haverhill Sunday Record of June 16, 1940]

WHO RECEIVES NATION'S WEALTH?—LABOR 65 PERCENT AND CAPITAL 35

(By F. G. R. Gordon)

For 50 years the Socialist leaders of this Nation have been circulating false propaganda about wealth production.

They have said a thousand times over that the workers receive barely 20 percent of the total wealth produced by the joint efforts of capital, labor, and brains.

Most important of these forces for wealth production are the men of brains. They are the men who invent machinery, organize the forces of production, direct the machinery of production. Labor today works 4 hours a day less than our fathers worked; they receive in wages three times as much as their fathers received. Why?

Because brains have organized, invented, and directed both capital and labor, making both far more efficient and vastly increasing wealth production under normal economic conditions.

Let's deal in facts. Facts show the truth. Facts are gathered by the census takers once in every 10 years. Their reports show the facts.

Here they are:

The official reports of the Federal Government relating to the great manufacturing industry of the Nation prove beyond any doubt by anybody anywhere that the Socialists and other radical leaders have for years, in speeches, editorials, and general propaganda, uttered the most monstrous lies about the division between capital and labor. Here are are solid facts as shown by the only method and the only body of men engaged in the business of stating the facts:

WHERE THE MONEY COMES, AND GOES, FROM ALL MANUFACTURING CORPORATIONS

Operating statement, 1929 to 1935, inclusive; 7 years of business (the latest full reports available)

Income:
Manufacturing goods sold and produced in 7 years	$316,205,286,000
Bad debts amounted to	1,974,152,000
Leaving a net return from sales of	314,231,134,000
Dividends from other corporations amounting to	2,896,041,000
Received from interest, rents, and other income	13,582,785,000
Which gave a total income of	330,709,960,000
Paid out:
Paid out for materials, fuel, transportation and other supplies	235,873,586,000
Set aside for repairs, wearing out of machinery	12,080,750,000
Paid interest for borrowed money, rents, etc.	6,172,632,000
Government taxes amounted to	6,490,598,000
Left for employees, management, and owners	70,092,394,000
Paid in salaries and wages	56,534,150,000
Management of the corporation for services	6,209,576,000
Leaving for stockholders net earnings of	7,348,666,000
Cash dividends paid to stockholders of	14,904,602,000
Leaving a deficit draft on capital and surplus of	7,555,934,000

The above table prepared by the National Industrial Conference Board, from governmental reports.

We must take into consideration that 1929 was a fairly normal, prosperous year; the other 6 years are depression years. The years from 1925 to and including 1928 would have made a far better showing for capital, management, and labor.

However, these facts confirm the statistics in National Income of the United States, 1929–1935, issued by the Federal Government. They show for the entire 7 years, that for every $1 the several million stockholders received, the workers received $7.

On page 26, national income paid out for all industries shows that out of a total of $78,632,000,000, there was paid to employees the sum of $51,487,000,000 for 1929 or 65.5 percent of the total. In item 7 it states: "Other income for labor, $937,000,000, this added to the $51,487,000,000 makes a total labor fund received by labor of $52,424,000,000."

On page 22 of this United States Government volume we find the following table:

TABLE 1.—National income paid out and produced, 1929

Income produced	$81,034,000,000
Business savings	2,402,000,000
Corporation savings	1,423,000,000
Business savings of entrepreneurs	979,000,000
Income paid out	78,632,000,000

All this confirms the above reports so far as percentages go. I took the manufacturing industries for details because the Socialists and other radicals generally take this great industry in an attempt to show the "robbery of labor."

In the above statistics I have said not a word as to any bonus, or pensions, or free service to the workers and their families, which amounts to more than a billion dollars annually and may be twice this sum.

THE RAILROADS

The railroads of this Nation, if built in 1940, would cost $26,000,000,000. This is based on wages and cost for materials. They are worth today not less than $24,000,000,000.

They are capitalized at $18,679,706,928 for 1929. From 1920 to 1929 new stock issued for class I railroads amounted to $8,502,673,410. This means that this sum was plowed back into the railways to improve their condition. Thus the real worth of this great railway plant today is around $7,000,000,000 more than its official capitalization.

WAGES FOR RAILROAD LABOR

In 1916 the average wage paid the 1,647,097 railway employees was $891.61 a year; in 1929 wages had increased to $1,743.95, and today the average is $1,831 per employee per year.

Besides the wages, the employees are given free transportation, and after a few years of service the families are also given free transportation. In addition to this, millions are paid for pensions. The average dividends paid by the railways in the last 19 years ran from 6 percent to less than 2 percent.

In 1929 the railways had an income of $4,638,377,000 and the total paid out that year amounted to $4,245,451,000. Out of this sum there were paid to salaried employees $820,605,000; total paid to wage earners $2,246,607,000 and there were paid in dividends $399,092,000. In other words, while $3,124,741,000 was paid to employees only $399,092,000 was paid in dividends. Labor received $10 for every $1 that went for dividends.

Thus in this giant industry we see that labor, salaried, and wage earners combined, received about 83 percent, and if we include Pullman employees, out of the railroad dollar received nearly 85 percent.

LION'S SHARE OF WEALTH PRODUCTION

Aside from calamity howling Socialists, Communists paint a doleful picture of the "poverty and misery" of the working classes. They pick out one class in a hundred and offer this as a general condition of the working class in this, our richest Nation on earth, with starving millions.

They don't offer any proof, because proof is lacking. They issue statements that are entirely wrong, or at best half truths.

In Socialism Made Plain, written by Allen L. Benson, Socialist candidate by the Socialist Party for President in 1916, he makes the statement on page 86:

"The wage earner now creates $6 worth of goods to get $1 in wages, the rest being wasted by capitalist employer in competition, or pocketed in the form of profits."

There isn't an iota of proof for any such statement. Mr. Benson didn't gather the census facts. He merely took a half truth and made it into a monstrous lie. Back in 1848, Karl Marx and Frederick Engles published the Communist Manifesto, an appeal to the workers of all the world. It has in the main been the Scientific Socialist handbook for the Socialists of the entire world; it has been translated into 67 different languages and has had the widest circulation of any book on socialism.

Says the Manifesto, page 21, published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago: "But not only has the capitalist forged the weapons that bring death to itself; it has also called into existence the men who are to wield those weapons—the modern working class, the proletarians."

Speaking of modern capitalism, the Manifesto says: "Hitherto, every form of society has been based, as we have already seen, on the antagonism of the oppressing and oppressed classes. But in order to oppress a class, certain conditions must be assured to it under which it can, at least, continue its slavish existence. The serf, in the period of serfdom, raised himself to membership in the commune, just as the petty capitalist, under the yoke of feudal absolutism, managed to develop into a capitalist. The modern laborer, on the contrary, instead of rising with the progress of industry, sinks deeper and deeper below the conditions of existence of his own class. He becomes a pauper and pauperism develops more rapidly than population and wealth."

Then the Manifesto goes on to assert that under modern capitalism the workers receive "only a bare subsistence wage," to keep him for all time as a laborer.

On page 34 Marx declares that they, the Socialists, "intended to do away with private property." And he further states that private property is already done away with; that nine-tenths of the population have no property, and then he adds this:

"In one word, you reproach us with intending to do away with your property. Precisely so; that is just what we intend."

The above then, is exactly what socialism is as preached and advocated by Socialist leaders all over the world.

Then Marx lays down a sort of platform:

"Abolition of property in land.

"Abolition of all right of inheritance.

"Confiscation of the property of all emigrants and rebels."

None of the things predicted by Marx have happened. The rise of the workers in all nations had been the outstanding fact that the blue books of every nation prove.

Our last census, that of 1930, shows that out of 29,000,000 families over 14,000,000 owned their homes; that out of 110,000,000 insurance policies more than 65,000,000 represented the working and middle class. Shows that the building and loan cooperatives in 1929 had 12,111,209 members, with total assets of $8,695,154,000. Does that look like a propertyless class? In the mutual savings banks, the kind that are known as "the workingman's banks," there were a total of 13,526,425 depositors with deposits of $10,163,740,000, moreover, the total deposits of $41,094,000,000 in all savings. No further proof is needed to show the absurdity of the Socialist propaganda. The middle class is not disappearing, the working class is not being pauperized; the rich may be growing richer, but the poor are growing better off.

THE FARMERS

The average value of the American farm in 1850 was $2,738. Eighty years later the average value of the American farm was $9,103. This means all farm property and includes stock. The total value of all farm property in 1930 was $57,245,544,000. In 1930 there were 2,149,276 farms owned free and clear; and 1,217,234 mortgaged farms. The value of the average mortgaged farm was for 1930, $8,895 and the value of the average mortgage was $3,521; in other words, the mortgaged farmer is not a propertyless man; he owns in farm values alone over $5,000, average.

Just around one-half of the mortgaged farms are owned by other farmers. In the town I was brought up in, one rich farmer owned 40 percent of all the mortgages on the farms of that town, Landaff, N. H. The number of tenant farmers has increased from 2,664,365 in 1930, to 2,865,155, but this was a 5-year depression period. The tenant farmer is not a propertyless class either; a lot of them are, but at least 34 percent have some property. They often have several thousands of dollars in machinery, stock, tools, and so on.

In the six New England States census for 1935 there were a total of 12,210 tenant farmers out of a total of 158,241 farms; in Mississippi for the same year out of a total of 311,683 there were 217,564 tenant farmers; Mississippi had three times as many tenant farmers as the six New England States and New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey combined.

FARMERS CAPITALISTS AND WORKERS

The great farming industry, like every other business, cannot be separated into capitalists and workers. Most farmers are workers, and half of them can justly be termed as capitalists; perhaps I should say middle-class capitalists. No one knows what percentage of the total wealth of the Nation is possessed by the farmers; it is, however, at least 25 percent, and it may be as high as 35 percent.

To illustrate: My brother began work at $15 a month and "found." When he was 21 he had $600 saved and invested this in buying a half interest in a farm that was worth $4,000. In a few years he owned the farm and had 20 cows and other stock. When he retired from farming he was worth six to eight thousand dollars; but he had earned it. He invested a part of this in the American Locomotive Co., and, of course, had an income from dividends. Would the Socialists confiscate his wealth in stocks?

Another farmer living a half mile away worked all his life but was a spender; when he quit farming he was worth not more than $150. That wasn't worth confiscation. But, how would a Socialist administration treat both these men? Both men had about same education; one was a thrifty man; the other was a spender. Would the Socialists confiscate the stock in the locomotive company? Would it tax all farmers who had "made good" in order to give the spending farmer as good an "abundant life" as the saving farmer? That would mean confiscation and yet it is "scientific socialism," according to Karl Marx and 99 percent of the Socialist leaders of the world.

New Deal Is Not Democratic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE CARBON COUNTY NEWS

Mr. THROKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I have included two editorials from the Carbon County News, Red Lodge, Mont. These two articles express the sentiments of many of the people throughout the United States and are somewhat along the lines of my remarks on June 10. In these remarks I suggested that the real Democrats and the real Republicans join this year and form one new Republican Party, of sound Americans, to return this Government to those principles upon which it was created. It should be evident that we cannot continue as we are, but must, instead, repeal all the extra powers given to the President of the United States, for they are not only dangerous but will lead this Nation into dictatorial control. If the people have any interest in the safety and security of their country, they should express themselves now, before Congress abandons all of its power and gives it to the most incompetent administration in the history of the United States.

The editorials follow:

[From the Carbon County (Mont.) News of June 14, 1940]

NEW DEAL IS NOT DEMOCRATIC

[Excerpts from an address by Mrs. Sarah Shields Jobe, of Hope, Hempstead County, Ark., before the Republican Central Committee at Little Rock, Ark., May 10, 1940. Mrs. Jobe is the widow of a former Democratic State Senator and has been chairman of the Women's Democratic organization in her county. She is a graduate of Vanderbilt University and a lawyer.]

This is the first Republican meeting or convention that I have ever attended. During most of my life I have been actively identified with the Democratic Party. I have served as county chairman of the Women's Democratic organization in my home county of Hempstead. I have done a great deal of other Democratic Party work.

Some of us who are Democrats have been slow to realize that the New Deal is not democratic but, on the contrary, seeks to destroy everything for which the Democratic Party has stood. I do not feel that I could be a good Democrat and vote for Franklin D. Roosevelt for a third term, nor do I feel that I could afford to stultify my conscience by voting for any set of candidates in the coming November election who are committed to or endorsed by the New Deal wrecking crew.

I have been saddened because of the desertion and betrayal of the Democratic Party by the New Dealers. We women of America are conservative at heart. We want security. We want freedom. We want government under our Constitution.

We women of America refuse to be hypnotized by "radio droolings" from Washington. We have the courage which American women have always exhibited in the history of this Republic to face the plain facts as they exist. No one free of bias can longer deny that Mr. Roosevelt and his New Deal scorn our Constitution; that Mr. Roosevelt and his hordes of political overlords are contemptuous of States' rights; that the New Deal has carried this Nation dangerously close to communism, nazi-ism, and a dictatorship by Presidential decree. No President in history has been so impatient of the wise restraints of power placed upon him under our Constitution as President Roosevelt. This menace to a government of free men and women is a bigger problem than food and shelter.

Every dime the Government spends belongs to the people; and we women of America purpose in our hearts that we will not surrender, at any price, to dictatorship and the "isms" of Europe, which today are producing so much havoc and destruction to mankind. Certainly yonder in Europe is an example of what the ultimate result will be when democratic forms of government have been replaced by dictators—dictators drugged with lust for power and conquest, and utterly unfeeling as to the helplessness of the subjects under their iron hands. When we view these conditions and take stock of what is happening to this country and what may happen, should the New Deal be continued in office, we then realize how important it is to put our allegiance to this American form of government ahead of mere party politics. I intend in every way possible, to the extent of my energies, to do everything in my power to mobilize our women voters against any further continuation of the New Deal or any of its offspring.

I am proud to stand before you as a constitutional Democrat—unafraid. God grant that millions more will stand with me.

THE PEOPLE'S DOUBT

In all former wars the President of the United States has commanded the confidence of the people.

If the people lack confidence in their present President it is not their fault. They still have confidence in the United States and are determined to defend it against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

As foreign war developments give warning that the United States must be adequately armed to defend this hemisphere, if necessary, it is unfortunate that the utterly improvident management of national affairs during the last 7 years has destroyed the confidence of the people. An administration that has piled up the peacetime debt by a sum nearly equal to the cost of American participation in the World War is now faced with need for the billions that have been wasted.

The people approve of immediate increase of preparedness for defensive war. They will take the risk of seeing additional billions unwisely spent, in the hope that in spite of an incompetent administration the country will be better armed. With deep misgivings they watch the course of the administration in handling foreign relations; but, whatever may come, they hope that the defensive strength of the United States will be increased.

Next to the ardent hope that war may be averted entirely is the hope that the people may in November place direction of their Government in safe and prudent hands.

WHY ROOSEVELT WON'T DO

President Roosevelt is not qualified to lead the Nation in war or in preparations for a possible war, because—

He is temperamentally unfitted for such responsibility.

He is incapable of delegating authority or sharing credit.

He places in position of command anonymous theorists, accountable only to the Executive.

He is inclined to make unconsidered judgments for spectacular effect.

He has no respect for campaign promises or party pledges.

He has brought the Nation to the brink of bankruptcy through mismanagement of Federal finances.

He is responsible for paralyzing private investment.

He has instituted bureaucratic control of business that has prevented industrial recovery and reemployment.

He has distributed billions in subsidies in vain attempts to circumvent natural economic laws.

He has created destructive class antagonisms through general indictments for crimes of the few.

He has more than doubled the cost of government.

He has established a chronic budget deficit of nearly $4,000,000,000 a year.

He has expended $7,000,000,000 for national defense and the Nation is almost wholly unprepared.

He now proposes with the expenditure of a few more billions to make the Nation secure.

He must be fully aware that the sum asked for defense is but a drop in the bucket; many billions will be required if the Army and Navy are to be thoroughly equipped.

He conceals the fact, but must assuredly know, that he is heading the Nation into a Federal Budget of $15,000,000,000 or more.

On the day that Franklin D. Roosevelt transferred the Immigration Service to the Department of Justice, the Dies committee denounced the Department of Justice for failing to act against criminal aliens.

Ten millions unemployed in the United States—more than are engaged in war in Europe.

Now that there's need of billions for defense, some of the billions squandered by the New Deal would come in handy.

Mr. Speaker, it is really refreshing to know that we have one or two independent papers, whose editors are not afraid to express their opinions. If the people of this Nation could be served by a free press, free from the antagonistic monetary influences, we could get somewhere and straighten this Nation out; but under the prevailing conditions, with a controlled and dominated press, the most vital information does not reach the American people.

Guarding American Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NEWT V. MILLS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, there are certain practical decisions which the American people and this Government must make if we are to escape being sucked into this maelstrom that threatens the extension of world civilization. With the world in flames and the evils of darkness spreading its tentacles almost into every land, it is my judgment our first duty is to recognize that power that has been able to combat the evils of darkness since the dawn of history and second duty is to effect a program of armed preparedness on land, sea, and air, so complete in every detail as not only to insure protection for our institutions of home, school, and church, which we hold so dear, but to place our country in a position to exercise its proper place of leadership and authority in a world of civilization.

Before the end of the week this Congress will have appropriated over $5,000,000,000 for defense; however, we must not neglect to recognize mankind stands today between two ages. It cannot be denied we are in the group of an immeasurable cosmic change. No nation and no section of the earth will be able to exist outside the orbit of the new age, be it good or bad; therefore, through preparedness we hope to find ourselves in the final form of the new world economy, thereby preventing this great land of ours from becoming a victim of circumstances, as so many great empires of the past have fallen into oblivion.

Believing as I do in the indestructibility of the two great forces of human life, I cannot surrender to despair even in face of the present apparent progress of triumph of brute force. The free peoples of this earth may suffer temporarily, but the spirit of freedom is endless and it will outlast machineries of tyranny. For a number of years the soul of our great America and of the other free peoples, has been lulled by material prosperity, losing sight of that force of destruction that has always been in combat with the good. But I am happy the great soul of America is once more awakening and girding itself for freedom as it has done so often in the heroic past. At any cost we will be free, and we will help to reestablish a just peace and a triumphant freedom throughout our world. We base our hope and our faith upon this immortal truth:

> Truth forever on the scaffold,
> Wrong forever on the throne—
> Yet that scaffold sways the future,
> And, behind the dim unknown,
> Standeth God within the shadow,
> Keeping watch above his own.

While various nations of the world were pursuing a policy of disarmament, and pledging their word each to the other that they would never again engage in war, then we followed a reasonable course in not building up a large army and navy. But today, when we see again the violation of sacred treaties, the invasion of innocent countries, and the wholesale slaughter of armies which are not adequately supplied with implements of war, then I say we must profit by these examples, and act quickly to provide proper protection for our people and beloved country.

Of course, we all cherish peace and I so well proved my position on this subject by introducing a resolution in 1937 advocating world peace, but the evils of darkness have come upon a portion of the world to such an extent in different forms of destruction such as the "fifth column," wholesale murder, the Trojan horse, deliberately planned propaganda and forces undertaking to abolish free institutions of home, school, and church, and making man a slave to State, that it would be folly for us not to build up our defense to safeguard our country from attacks of aggression. With an adequate defense no foreign army can invade us. Now that we have become one of the world's greatest nations, shall we throw away the independent American destiny which our forefathers gave their lives to win or shall we stop and read the sign that is plainly visible?

Preparedness is going to cost us something, but if we are clean in our endeavors there will be compensations. In undertaking this great venture in preparedness, we are doing it not with the idea of chastising the world or telling the other nations what they shall think and how they shall live and what they shall do, but with one great objective in mind, and that is to build ourselves so that we will be immune from attack.

My friends, man in this period must know his Government, must have a part in his Government, and must appreciate his Government. But, more than that, man must dedicate himself to preserve this Government. There was a time when our schools taught the youth of the land what a great place America was. I pray they will again—for America is a great country.

I am speaking to leaders—men whose thoughts and actions determine the course of other men and women. In our lodges, in our churches, in our business life we help shape the lives of others, and in so doing we help shape the destiny of America.

What is America's destiny? That depends upon all of us. It is necessary for us to see this is a great adventurous age, and by that I do not mean military adventure—I mean an age of adventure in science and in learning, to live nobly, to explore in scientific and industrial fields and in the realm of the spirit. If we do that, we will light a flame within ourselves and within those we contact that will never go out, and America will be a better place to live because we lived in this day and generation.

It has been suggested lately that Congress should adjourn very shortly; frankly, this suggestion amazes me, and I believe it amazes the good people who sent me here to represent them and those good people who sent my colleagues here.

The Congress of the United States, and more particularly this House of Representatives, is the truest barometer of what the people of this country feel and desire. Sent here by vote of the people, its Members constantly in touch with their constituents through a mass of correspondence and personal contacts, and constantly attuned to their wishes, the House of Representatives is in truth and in fact the voice of the people of this great Nation. Then shall this voice be silenced because it is a hot summer or because political parties are to have conventions? I say to you that there was never a time in the history of our country when sane, practical, level-headed leadership was more needed than today, when sparks from a flaming Europe threaten to fire our free and peace-loving Nation. Then are the people, whose servants we most surely are, to be deprived of leadership so that any individual or any political group can better win or hold political power?

Under no condition would I vote to adjourn Congress in this time of crisis so that I might go home. What political party gains advantage in any political contest is not as important as the security of our country, our people, our form of government, and our way of life.

To reduce this issue to very simple terms, we are hired by our constituents to serve them here in Congress, to work for their welfare. And, this is a big job today, a full-time job and one that will take every ounce of energy, caution, and good common sense that we can muster individually and collectively. So I say let us stay on the job as long as we are needed, and if we are needed only to watch and wait, to urge caution in international relations and to speed those important domestic undertakings we have so recently launched, then let us remain in session and assist the Government in expediting any additional defense measures which may become necessary. But let us not abandon the people we represent to the mass of conflicting propaganda, arguments, and appeals with which they are beseiged, while we go blithely forth not knowing what tomorrow will bring.

"ISM" IN AMERICA—NO IDLE DREAM

Deliberately planned propaganda has been and is now being spread throughout the length and breadth of our country in an effort to entice, mislead, and weaken our hopes in the face of danger, as other nations have been weakened. New forces are attempting to weave into the fiber of our institutions; therefore, it is not enough to strengthen our army, air, and naval forces, but the Federal Government must enforce the law against all subversive activities, and keep disruptive elements that are working within under control.

On the floor of this House since I have been a Member, I have heard it repeated over and again that groups unfriendly to our way of life were working direct in contact with foreign elements that stand for the destruction of our free democracy and even to the extent of destroying our churches; so we must prepare not only against aggression from without but from within.

CANDIDATE FOR REELECTION

Mr. Speaker, since I am a candidate for reelection, I shall devote the remainder of my remarks to my work in part as a Member of Congress, as it is the custom and common practice for national Representatives to make frequent reports to their constituents; therefore, to them I am reporting, as in reality I am only an employee not trying to unseat any public official, but only asking to be retained in the position my people so generously gave me.

VETERAN LEGISLATION

I have no hesitancy in stating I have given veterans and their widows throughout my district preference wherever I knew of said cases, as I am convinced that the veterans will never receive too much from the Government they tendered their lives to defend and protect; hence I shall continue to support all measures proposed and sponsored by the veterans of our country. As a member of the War Claims Committee I have supported every veteran claim and wherever a doubt existed as to the merit of the bill, I have given the doubt in favor of the veteran.

FLOOD CONTROL

The delta lands of northeast Louisiana are subject to overflow, therefore, knowing the question of flood control to be a paramount one in the minds of the people, I am exceedingly happy I was successful in having enacted into law a number of bills introduced by me dealing with flood protection; therefore, the Assistant to the Chief of Army Engineers advised me a survey is presently being made of each river of my district and that said report would be available on or about December 1, 1940, so it will be my aim in the next session of Congress to secure the necessary appropriation to carry out the recommendation of the engineers toward drainage of the delta lands of my district.

FARM LEGISLATION

For the farmers of this Nation, I have had one objective in mind and that has been to secure for them a net profit for their labors; therefore, I hold the least recognition that should be given our farmers is cost of production and proof of this contention can be shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as to my efforts in behalf of our farmers. I acknowledge I have helped to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for our farmers in an effort to increase buying power, but I believe the salvation and cure of our great agricultural problem can be found in my remarks on the floor of the House of Representatives, March 21, 1940.

LABOR

Having been reared a laboring man, I have consistently supported all legislation that tends to help the man and woman who lives by daily toil, as a result of said position, I now enjoy and have enjoyed the recognition and endorsement of the American Federation of Labor.

MAIL SERVICE IMPROVEMENT

I have obtained new rural routes, additional city delivery service, and rural route extensions, new post office buildings, better post office quarters, increased employee remuneration in a number of offices, and additional clerks. Also new equipment in several offices to meet the needs of the growing communities. And as a member of the Civil Service Committee I have worked for better legislation for all Government employees.

OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

I have worked consistently for an adequate old-age pension, as I felt and feel now our aged are entitled to this consideration, as we find throughout the country the aged needy only receive in certain cases a mere pittance, and I contend we must amend our social-security law.

CONCLUSION

I have given personal attention to every letter that was addressed to me upon the date of its arrival and at all times maintained the interest of my people at heart. Further, recognizing the fundamental hope of a happy people rests in our institutions, I never lost sight of a single moment to support all legislation and work for its passage in recognition of this objective, and I now pledge to my people the continuation of this service if reelected; therefore, I humbly acknowledge my indebtedness and gratitude to my many friends that have been so generous and kind to me.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ALEXANDRIA (LA.) DAILY TOWN TALK

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the Alexandria Daily Town Talk of Alexandria, La., carried an editorial in its June 5 issue which I think is very timely and I present it herewith:

BUCK UP, AMERICA

The people of the United States seem to be suffering from a sort of mental shell shock as the tragedy of Europe unrolls swiftly before their eyes.

There is greater panic in certain American circles than even in England and France, which lie directly under the guns of the Nazi invader. It is not fear—it is simply shock at seeing the anchors of civilization tossed overboard, one by one. It is horror at seeing an orderly world descend to chaos.

There are signs that this panic has already passed its climax, as it should. Up to now the whole thing has had the aspect of a too hectic melodrama. Now it is beginning to be real and already there are signs of that calm that comes with reality.

It is certainly true that the British and French, whose way of life is so much like our own, are fighting a desperate fight for existence. None would dispute the gravity of the situation as it affects the future of the free political and economic life we love.

But at least our own course is clarifying, and as our task becomes clearer we begin to bend to it and we find relief in action. Our own defenses have lagged. No nation has had to arm itself for fear of us. Now, in a world which has forsaken order and justice and peace we must prepare to defend by force what we have failed to defend by negotiation.

Very well. Is there any reason why we cannot defend ourselves? There are no supermen who have overrun half of Europe. They are men. They have succeeded up to this point because they have converted all life into a military machine.

Have the Germans built tanks? So can we. Have the Japanese built big ships? So can we. American planes and pilots have never feared to take the air with any others.

Hitler himself in Mein Kampf, wrote: "The gigantic American State Colossus, with its enormous wealth of virgin soil, is more difficult to attack than the wedged-in German Reich."

It is true that the Reich is less "wedged in" than it was when Hitler wrote. It is true that we are badly unprepared in material and training. But we have had our lesson.

Calmly, steadily, wisely, we now prepare such military machinery as will enable us to defend our own. We have no illusions about untrained volunteers. The day of "one good American boy can lick three furriners" is gone. But one good American boy with equal weapons is still as good a boy as lives on this earth.

With calm confidence and reliance on our own emerging strength, America goes forward unflinching and unafraid to meet whatever the world has in store.

ARTICLE BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson from the Washington Daily News for June 17, 1940:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 17, 1940]

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

This talk about using the Navy to convoy shipments of munitions is incredible lunacy. Munitions are direct contraband. At international law and under invariable American policy, a ship known to be carrying such stuff through an actual blockade is subject not only to search and seizure but to sinking.

What is going to happen when a German submarine or airplane has blatantly advertised to it by the mere presence of an American naval convoy, off a blockaded English coast, that merchant ships are loaded with direct and unconditional contraband? It is going to exercise a clear, immemorial right of the sea and try to sink it. If any nonbelligerent naval vessel attempts to intervene, it is committing an act of war. So the German attacks the American—and we are at war—not for vindicating a right but for violating one.

There is no longer any question that Mr. Roosevelt is exercising no effort whatever to keep us out of war. It may not be so fair to say that it is his purpose to exert every effort within his supposedly limited powers to get us into war. But at least this statement is incontestable—every act of his in the past 3 years is consistent with such a purpose and no act is inconsistent therewith.

This column claims to be no "inside news" or tipster oracle. Such designations give me a pain. The working press in Washington, just the plain efficient reporters, are the most efficient in the world. The claim to get more necessarily involves a confession of special hand-outs for a price, publicity favoritism—which is a sell-out of the public. Or it involves subterranean methods depending on the disloyalty of public servants, which stinks from every point from which wind blows. So I hesitate to hand out the kind of "inside" dope which follows, but you can rely on it.

As predicted by this column for 2 years, Mr. Roosevelt has at last "reluctantly decided" to attempt to hurdle the third-term barrier. He will be nominated by acclamation. He has asked Mr. Farley to manage his campaign and the dope is that Mr. Farley has refused.

Mr. Roosevelt knows and has long known that this unprecedented feat of political legerdemain would be impossible without war hysteria. Therefore, we have war hysteria and I would like to have somebody show me an incident in his recent conduct that did not tend to create it.

It is shooting craps with the country's destiny and the lives and fortunes of our people for the pride of a single man. This pressing of our country to the edge of the abyss is the craziest diplomacy in the history of nations.

Apart from emotion, there are three compelling reasons why we should now stay out of war. (1) We not only have nothing to put in but, due to criminal neglects, we are defenseless on our own shores. (2) Our great need is time to prepare our defense and, on all the facts and the opinion of all competent experts, we could have from 18 months to 3 years if we do not invite every danger we fear and rush headlong into a situation we are now totally unable to handle. (3) If we say out of this thing and become strong, we shall have a voice in the outcome. If we go in, by our present weakness foredoomed to defeat, we shall just be another Hitler trophy—"voe victis"—woe to the vanquished.

In the post-World War "Cordon Sanitaire," France incited the little countries to threaten Germany on her promise of help—and then neglected to remain able to help. On the same formula, Britain encouraged Poland to resist on England's guaranty of assistance and was wholly unable to help. Similarly, for domestic politics, we are holding out false hopes to England and France and have incited them to war.

All those small nations are gone—nine of them. France and England are responsible. France also is gone. England is going. We are repeating the same ghastly international immorality and suicide. For God's sake let's keep out—at least long enough to get ready to get in.

A Pilot's Advice

REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I also, with my colleague from Minnesota, Mr. KNUTSON, want to say a few words in behalf of Colonel Lindbergh in order to refute the attack made upon him by the gentleman who spoke for the New Deal and war, Sunday night.

I grant that the Administration has been able to organize a large and expensive war propaganda machine to confuse the public and to bring about fear of invasion and war. The Administration mouthpiece who denounced Colonel Lindbergh Sunday evening, and accused him of associating with false political advisers, are unjust both to his associates and to Colonel Lindbergh, who has proved that he has the best interests of this country at heart.

Why is Colonel Lindbergh criticized? A year and a half ago, he said that Germany had the best air force. Today, we know he was right, so that was the truth. On June 15, Colonel Lindbergh gave very constructive and sound advice on staying out of war, which the Administration criticizes and scorns.

If the administration speakers are so anxious to go to war, why in the love of Heaven do they not resign from the Senate and from Congress and go to war? They should have sense enough to know that the American people do not want to go, and also, they should be intelligent enough to know the background of this propaganda which is purely internationalistic and English.

Let us look at this for just a moment. Publicity costs money. And propaganda for war is a most costly publicity, which, if the people could know the truth, is charged up to the taxpayers of the United States by those who own and control gold money and credit.

The propaganda for war is launched by the highest officials in the administration at graduation exercises—a place where the speakers should talk on life, instead of death; talk on construction, instead of destruction.

The national press should never be used as an agency to promote war, as was done in 1917 and is being repeated today.

Lindbergh in his broadcast on June 15 gave very sound advice when he suggested that we stay out of war and attend to our own business. No one can read his address, as inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 17, by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], without giving Colonel Lindbergh credit for a true appraisal of international affairs. One needs but to contrast the address delivered by Colonel Lindbergh and the address delivered by his critic to realize that it is his critic who does not know what he is talking about. Or if he does know, he is only expressing the real wish of the administration—which is war. This is clearly evident from the action the administration has taken, and it is exactly in line with the prediction that I made when the arms embargo was repealed in 1939. I said then that the repeal of the arms embargo should not in any sense be considered an act of neutrality, but should instead be looked upon as a tentative alliance with England to participate in the present war, and that statement is proven today by the administration itself.

I wrote the history of what has happened today into the RECORD during the special session last fall. I was not fooled then, and I am not fooled today.

What have we to show for the $7,000,000,000 that has been appropriated for the Army and Navy during the past 7 years? We have absolutely nothing to show for this seven thousand million dollars—an amount of money which should have given us a first-class Navy and Army. Now what became of this $7,000,000,000? What became of the $100,000,000 that was appropriated, and to which Senator Copeland added $25,000,000 for antiaircraft defense? The administration opposed the $25,000,000 for antiaircraft guns, and told General Craig, according to his own statement, not to use the $100,000,000. What became of that $100,000,000?

Who knows anything about our foreign policy? And how can anyone be familiar with a policy that the Executive has projected to the Maginot Line? To read his own remarks, one would think that we had undertaken policing of the world, a grandiose dream of administration leaders which displayed nothing so much as complete ignorance of the foreign situation. The great trouble with the administration is that it has no foreign policy, except that written at 10 Downing Street. It was to fulfill the promises in that policy that we were called back last fall, to repeal the arms embargo and go through the farce of enacting neutrality legislation to exempt the President from all responsibility of any acts that he might commit under that act.

In other words, the Neutrality Act is nothing but a law to relieve the President of responsibility, should he permit an "incident" to occur that might jeopardize our peace. If this should happen, however—if one of our ships should be sunk—the charge for such neglect should be placed where it rightfully belongs, namely, on the Chief Executive. We have no business to have a fleet in Europe. Our war ships belong on our own coast. Our own nationals have had plenty of time to return to the United States, and those who remain in Europe have done so at their own risk. If an "incident" should occur in which one of our ships is sunk while jolly-sailing in European waters, inviting trouble, impeachment proceedings should be filed against those responsible for such incidents, no matter whether it be the Chief Executive or any other public official.

The administration, if it understands the fundamental laws of this Nation, knows that the people are the power and that Congress was elected by them to legislate and regulate the affairs of this Nation. That duty was never supposed to be transferred from the legislative to the executive department. The reason for that was that the people 152 years ago realized that the power of this Government should be in their hands and in the hands of the people they elected to represent them. And I may say that they recognized, in addition to that, that when such duty is transferred to one man, their own rights are jeopardized and finally lost.

That is precisely the condition that exists here today. The administration's mouthpieces, dupes, and pawns "boo" when this statement is made, but they will cringe and creep when the people of this Nation awaken to the real truth.

Our foreign policy, like our domestic policy, is completely confused, and the New Deal administration is in a state of pandemonium. The administration leaders have run hither and thither, and have worn themselves out until they are now on the verge of collapse. The whole New Deal structure is built upon an emergency platform, constructed by the help of an acquiescent and supine majority in Congress which has overlooked the fact that they were elected to build a house on constitutional rock instead of a skyscraper on their emergency platform.

The administration talks about war and the administration's mouthpieces shout for war. Under the direction of whom? Under the direction of those who pay for the war propaganda in the press, in the movies, over the radio, and for the well-prepared and finished printed matter that costs thousands and thousands of dollars. All of this propaganda is nothing but pure, unadulterated lies, which the American people should resent.

Anyone who will give this subject just a little thought will admit that it costs money to produce moving pictures to bring about war hysteria. It costs money to pay for radio time. It costs more money to pay the traveling expenses of paid propagandists speaking from public platforms and at public or pretended charitable or philanthropic meetings. Do not, however, forget that the purpose of all of these in some manner, shape, or form is to confuse you, Mr. Citizen, to make you believe and to convince you that you should immediately start out to kill others and get yourself murdered in order to save and perpetuate those who are paying for this propaganda machine.

Who are they?

They are the same people who promoted the World War by propaganda. They are the people who own the iron, coal, steel, and war manufacturing industries, the people who own the world gold and control money and credit. This should be clear to you, for no one else could meet the expenses of this propaganda machine except the money changers and the money barons of the world. And it is from that source that we get our news today.

Mr. Fritz Thyssen, who is now in the United States, is one of the very people who was interested in the coal, iron, steel, and arms manufacture in the Saarbrucken Basin. The Thyssen family was associated with the Vendels, the Krupps, the House of Rothschild, and other French and English interests, and these families not only prolonged the World War in order to make more money, but are the actual personalities who were largely instrumental in bringing about the World War. And now the gentleman is here advising the United States to do as we did in 1917.

Those who are interested in this information should read my remarks in the RECORD of September 25, 1939, entitled, "Can the American People Be Fooled Again?"

I may say, in addition, that it is Mr. Fritz Thyssen himself and other international bankers who have armed Germany and made it possible for Mr. Hitler to do exactly as he is doing today. Mr. Thyssen now calls Hitler crazy, but I wonder who is crazy? It certainly would be us, if we listen to such warmongers and war promoters as Mr. Thyssen and Lord Lothian and the others who are now traveling throughout the country disseminating propaganda calculated to involve us in the present European conflict.

England has appropriated $165,000,000 for propaganda in the United States, $15,000,000 more to involve us in this war than she appropriated to involve us in the World War, and at that time there were 10,000 persons employed by Great Britain to convince us that we should fight for Albion.

The total of all these sums reaches into many millions. Now, let us use our heads. The American people have no money to pay for publicity to express their views against war. They have not the money to buy control of the Nation's press, movies, and broadcasting stations to express opposition to war. The people have not the money to travel and to lecture in competition with those who are backed by the international war machine.

It is for the lack of money that your and my people are sending letters to us, appealing to us to remain in Washington to counteract the administration's insane desire to lead this country into war. What Congress really should do is repeal the emergency powers given to the President, so that it would be safe for us to go home.

We are in no position to give aid to England. We have nothing to give, for she has already received our airplanes and many of our ocean-going ships. The population of England and France is more than 600,000,000 people. If they cannot defend themselves, it certainly would be foolish for us to try, particularly from a distance of 3,000 miles.

Great Britain has plenty of credit, for the Bank of England owns or controls over $13,000,000,000 of gold now in the Treasury of the United States. The grand scheme, however, is to save this money for the British Empire at the expense of the American taxpayers. Those who believe we should give further aid should bear this in mind in the next letter to their Congressmen.

We have given the English the shirt off our back, and in return we have received criticism and abuse. The English call us Uncle Shylock, but the fact remains that they have never paid even the interest on their obligation to us or any part of the principal.

LETTERS FROM KALTENBORN TO MUNDT AND MUNDT TO KALTENBORN

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, since June 4, when I put in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, beginning with page 3546, a discussion of some pertinent questions which now face radio executives in America in view of the part which radio is now playing in conveying war news and comments thereon to the American public, I have had considerable correspondence on this subject from many people interested in or supported by radio, as well as from many radio listeners. Some Members will recall that starting with page 3644, I reprinted in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I received from Harry C. Butcher, vice president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, on the perplexing problem of the responsibilities which a free and uncensored radio system must accept in order to best contribute to the public welfare of a free people.

In addition to that letter from Mr. Butcher, I have had other communications from him and other officials and individuals which leads me to feel that a large part of the radio industry is alert to the growing importance of maintaining radio on a high plane of impartiality and of protecting, through self-discipline and self-established restraints, the unique privileges which American radio enjoys in this world of Government-dominated or owned radio broadcasting. American radio leads the world in its service to the public and in the caliber of its programs. It is with the devout hope that a careless disregard for the high responsibilities which repose upon the radio industry may not destroy the freedom of the air which has so largely contributed to the eminence of American radio that I continue to interest myself in this subject.

LETTERS FROM KALTENBORN TO MUNDT AND MUNDT TO KALTENBORN

Included in the correspondence which has come to me as a result of my study and statements in this connection is the following letter from Mr. H. V. Kaltenborn, which I am reprinting as a part of these remarks together with a copy of my reply to him. I want to add that I have confirmed the accuracy of Mr. Kaltenborn's statements with regard to his transfer from Columbia to N. B. C. and that no stigma of any kind should attach itself to Mr. Kaltenborn by virtue of this transfer since it was occasioned by the decision of his sponsors to place an advertising contract with another broadcasting system. This confirmation came to me in a letter from the Leo Burnett Co., of Chicago, which handles the advertising for Mr. Kaltenborn's sponsor, and says in part:

> We moved the Pure Oil broadcasts over to the National Broadcasting Co. on May 14 due to the fact that their station set-up would give us greatly improved coverage of the territory served by the Pure Oil Co. and also due to the fact that NBC offered us a much better time period. * * * We agree with you that at times Mr. Kaltenborn has allowed his feelings to carry him away and that he has been indiscreet on occasions. We feel, however, that this fault is far overbalanced by the service he has rendered the listening public in his keen and masterly analysis of the news.

An examination of the mail he receives indicates that the vast majority of his listeners agree with him absolutely and approve his stand. * * * However, in deference to the feelings of the articulate minority, we have admonished Mr. Kaltenborn to exercise more restraint in his broadcasts and he has agreed to do so.

(Signed) P. C. HARPER.
For LEO BURNETT CO., INC.

Mr. Speaker, I now offer for the record Mr. Kaltenborn's letter to me in toto and the full text of my reply to him:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 12, 1940.

The Honorable KARL MUNDT,
Member of Congress for South Dakota,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I know that you have long been interested in the proper development of American radio. I, naturally, share that interest, since I have analyzed news on the air for the past 18 years. I was the first man to perform that service for the American public and have carried on this work without interruption and, I believe I can honestly say, with steadily increasing success, if we measure success in terms of public confidence and recognition. In view of your distinguished position and achievements, I know that you would not voluntarily do me an injustice. Yet you have done just that, inadvertently, to be sure. You appear to have given credence to an unfounded report that I was dismissed by the Columbia Broadcasting System because I excited people's emotions concerning the war. This is absolutely untrue. I was not dismissed by Columbia. What happened was this: My commercial sponsor, the Pure Oil Co., was unable to secure a satisfactory quarter-hour three times a week on the Columbia network for my broadcasts. The hour they had—6:30 p. m.—brought my program into their main selling area at 5:30 p. m., which was too early, and during the daylight-saving period at 4:30 p. m., which was unacceptable to any sponsor appealing primarily to a male audience. For this reason my sponsor asked permission to negotiate with the National Broadcasting Co. for a more favorable period. I granted that permission, and the negotiations succeeded. When I announced the transfer of my program to the officials of the Columbia network, they were extremely disappointed and asked me if there was no possible way in which the situation could be readjusted so that they might be able to retain my services.

I have in my possession letters from the president of the Columbia Broadcasting System and various other officials, expressing the highest appreciation of my services to that organization and expressing the greatest regret at losing my services. Under these circumstances, I feel sure that you will not wish to do me the disservice of suggesting publicly or privately that my separation from the Columbia Broadcasting System arose from any fault of my own. You can understand that my professional reputation is an extremely valuable financial asset, and I should be obliged to take whatever action lay in my power to prevent its deliberate undermining.

I will, therefore, very much appreciate your advising me from whom you secured the information that Columbia discontinued my broadcasts because of their character.

As a public man, you know that anyone who speaks about the war these days is bound to be misquoted and misunderstood. I receive an overwhelmingly favorable response to my comments. I am keenly conscious of my responsibility to public opinion, and am making every effort to remain sane, balanced, and objective in the face of a situation which is inevitably charged with high emotional content. That is why I am constantly getting such comments as have just been published by W. D. Jamieson, the former Iowa Congressman, in his largely circulated publication, The Window Seat. In the June 5 issue of this publication, he says: "Don't get all worked up. I refuse to listen to the newsflash details of this terrible war, or to read the pages on pages about it in the papers. If we listen to 2 or 3 good commentators, like Kaltenborn, we can keep up fairly well with what's going on without getting all unstrung."

The next time I come to Washington, I am going to take the privilege of calling on you, and hope that you will be able to spare me a few minutes for a general discussion of those radio problems with which we are both intimately concerned. But in the meantime, may I have your reaction to the contents of this letter?

With all good wishes,
Sincerely yours,

H. V. KALTENBORN.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 15, 1940.

Mr. H. V. KALTENBORN,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. KALTENBORN: I am glad to have your letter of June 12 setting forth the reasons for your transfer from the Columbia Broadcasting System to N. B. C.; the same mail bringing me your letter brought me a letter from the Leo Burnett Co., of Chicago, conveying the same information and I am happy to be set right concerning the reasons for your transfer. I am enclosing herewith a copy of my letter to the Burnett Co. However, I shall not send the Burnett Co. a copy of my reply to you.

I want to assure you, Mr. Kaltenborn, that I am most eager not to do you an injustice. While both the Columbia Broadcasting System, in speaking with me over the telephone, and the Burnett Co., by letter under date of June 12, commented upon certain indiscretions and emotional excesses appearing in your radio reporting, I am also sure that both organizations realize, as I do myself, that you have many splendid talents and virtues as a news commentator. It was with the sincere hope that your occasional excitable and exciting excesses—that those of other radio commentators—would not cause the presently existing murmurs asking for more control of radio broadcasting of war news to mount to a demand which would further restrict free radio in America that I got into this matter in the first place. In other words, I am fighting in radio's corner. But like a drop of ink in a glass of water, these emotional excesses which do at times occur form the dark cloud which is likely to color the whole situation unless you and other commentators and radio itself hold them in check. These times are far too trying and momentous, and with this I am sure you will agree, to permit emotionalism to replace clear-headedness and hysteria to color sound judgment on decisions which mean war or peace for America. We must meet these problems deliberately and thoughtfully—it is no time to engage in histrionics, however innocently conceived, in presenting factual matter to the public. It is far better to err on the side of underplaying emotionalism, now, than to err on the side of excitable excesses.

You indicate that when you are next in Washington you may call my office for an appointment. I shall be delighted to have you do so and shall enjoy discussing this whole problem with you. At that time, I shall also be glad to let you see some of the correspondence I have had on this subject, including the letter from the Burnett Co., Columbia, and other communications. I have met you on different occasions, have addressed numerous conventions at which you have also spoken, and have a high personal regard for your integrity, intelligence, and patriotic sincerity. I realize, too, the manifold difficulties your work involves in controlling your emotions and in preventing the sympathies which we all hold at this dark hour from speaking more loudly over the air than the facts themselves.

In my opinion, if we are to succeed in maintaining American radio on its present very fine and serviceable basis of private ownership and sponsorship with no more Government restrictions than positively necessary to prevent it from exercising monopolistic practices, it is essential that radio itself and those whom it supports must exercise self-restraints and self-control which will keep it from developing into a detriment to the public interests. By and large, it is today doing that; by and large, you are today helping it to maintain its high reputation. But it is the exceptions which must give us all concern.

I feel that sponsored programs, professional commentators, speakers working for pay, and salaried reporters should not permit their personal prejudices, their individual opinions, their political philosophies, and their viewpoints to color the programs in which they participate. To follow this practice would be to permit the opinion backed by the biggest purse to propagandize the Nation. It would enable radio to utilize the special claims it exercises to preferential air waves (by grace of Government permit) as a device for molding public opinion along the lines which these broadcasting companies prefer or which are designated by organizations or individuals having big sums to spend for controlling public opinion. That would, in my opinion, be using free speech to circumvent free thinking.

Please believe me, sir, I am not contending that radio makes a practice of using its unique Government concession to color public opinion on governmental or international issues. It is the exception, again, which worries me and many of my colleagues with whom I have discussed these matters. The normal practice of restricting opinionated programs on governmental issues to free time with the laudable policy of permitting all sides to share alike in the free time to voice their position is Americanism in action. I favor it. I want to see it preserved. I do not want to see it perverted by too many programs in which paid time—by commercial sponsors or by sustaining programs by the chains themselves—are devoted to an effort to mold public opinion on national issues. I shall be glad to have your reaction to my philosophy of the true function of radio as outlined in this paragraph and in the foregoing. I dare to hope you will agree with me. But, in all events, I shall appreciate your reaction as it is a problem being increasingly discussed in informal talk on Capitol Hill. If I am wrong, I want to be set right and work for a free radio in America as it should be.

Finally, I am sincerely sorry if anything I have said or written has in any way injured your professional reputation or private feelings. My concern is with the problem we confront, not the personalities involved. I am sure you are steadily trying to keep within the confines of good taste and good judgment. I am confident that you would not wittingly contribute to the confusion and hysteria of these most significant days. If you feel that in any way I have injured you, I shall be glad upon your request to publish in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD your letter of June 12 and a copy of this reply. I shall look forward to your visit in my office when you are in Washington.

Cordially yours,

KARL MUNDT.

RADIO'S RESPONSIBILITIES EXPAND WITH RADIO'S PRIVILEGES

Mr. Speaker, all Members of Congress are aware of the severe charges recently leveled at the American radio industry by certain Government officials charging it with monopolistic practices and other unfair policies. Personally, I am unwilling to subscribe to these charges on the basis of available evidence. I think that the record of American radio, taken as a whole, is highly commendable. Great public service is rendered the public by radio through its practice of making available to speakers of opposing sides on controversial issues like periods of free time to present their arguments. To my knowledge radio has not yet been guilty of using its monopoly of favorite air waves and its protective licenses and permits to sponsor one set of protagonists against another or to freeze out opposing viewpoints. It is my sincere hope that radio will never permit itself to become guilty of such prejudicial practices because to my mind that would be a big step backward through providing potent arguments for more Government control or supervision and for substituting bureaucratic control—never very satisfactory and seldom very equitable—for self-restraint and fair-play codes which radio can much better provide for itself by a faithful recognition of the responsibilities which always attach themselves to such special privileges as radio presently enjoys.

With the hope that radio may redouble its efforts to avoid justifiable criticism and that it may reexamine its practices to the end that the best public interests may always be served, I summarize herewith some considerations which I believe radio executives should carefully ponder and not lightly shunt aside on the basis that at this time no great complaint is evident in demands for legislative reforms or executive restraints. The time to eliminate a widespread public demand for governmental correctives is before the complaint is crystallized—once the crusade is on and a chorus of demands for Government action is apparent, it is frequently too late to stem the tide and all too often the alleged correctives go too far and impose new vices more pernicious than those they would eradicate. No business enterprise is ever so strong or so safe that it can afford to discard substantial segments of its goodwill by turning a deaf ear to sincere critics and trusting to time alone to quiet valid criticisms. For that reason, I list the following factors for whatever value they may have in stimulating thought leading to the preservation of free radio in America and the nipping in the bud of any proposals that Government action be utilized to eradicate such minor deficiencies as radio may now be heir to. American radio is good and it is getting better. It is entitled to a fair chance to demonstrate that its self-imposed regulations are adequate to serve the public interest and to protect the functions of democratic government in this great Republic.

A SUMMARY OF FACTORS FOR RADIO EXECUTIVES TO CONSIDER

First. Ninety percent of present-day radio programs are free from substantial criticism by the public. That in itself is a high tribute to American radio. The 10 percent of radio programs which cause concern are the opinionated observations of speakers who are either on the pay roll of the radio companies themselves or who speak for hire for commercial sponsors. Radio cannot afford to ignore the significance as molders of public opinion which these opinionated observers have and the delicate problem growing out of them concerning how far radio or commercial sponsors should go in employing speakers for hire to shape public opinion.

Second. Radio executives should study the advisability of setting up self-imposed regulations whereby sponsored programs by commercial groups, professional commentators, speakers working for pay and salaried reporters on sustaining programs, should not permit their personal prejudices, their individual opinions, their political philosophies, and their own viewpoints to color the programs in which they participate. To expand this type opinionated program to its full extent would be to permit the opinion backed by the biggest purse to propagandize America and dominate the air waves. Carried to its ultimate degree, a billion-dollar sponsor could purchase time enough and sponsor speakers and commentators enough to superimpose its philosophy or policies upon an entire people. Thus such free speech on the air could be used to circumvent the free thinking of a nation.

Third. Radio's current policy of permitting conflicting sides of controversial questions to have equal opportunity with free radio time to present its arguments is Americanism in action. It is the essence of democracy and is highly commendable. But if speakers on commercial programs and those speaking on the sustaining programs of the big radio chains themselves attempt to influence public opinion and present lopsided arguments on public questions they can well destroy and nullify the great democratic value of the prevailing policy of giving free time to all sides of a controversial question, because the professional commentators and speakers are on the air so much more frequently than the laymen.

Fourth. Radio should recognize a responsibility for not permitting itself to be for sale to the highest bidder on controversial questions, which is not shared by the newspaper business. The difference is clear-cut and obvious. As many newspapers can present themselves for public approval in any State or community as the public will support, they seek and secure no governmental license and obtain no governmental monopoly of favored channels of presentation. Thus editors have an independence which radio systems cannot rightfully exercise because radio by its very nature is more monopolistic than are the newspapers. Too many radio stations find too few choice air waves to share for day and night broadcasting. Therefore the Government licenses some and must refuse concessions to others. While no legitimate complaint can attach to this necessity, it does impose upon those radio units favored by Government permit to own an air wave the obligation not to exercise that concession to plump for one opinion or to play down another.

Fifth. Excesses and abuses in the realm of these opinionated programs by speakers for hire are the danger zone around free radio in America. Government regulation could correct the abuses but I hope it will never have to come to that. In my opinion such coercion is unnecessary. Radio deserves the opportunity to eliminate these abuses for itself where they occur and to guard against their extension. To say they never occur, is to blink at the facts; to say they are the prevailing practice, is to exaggerate the exception. Between the extremes of too many, too highly opinionated commercial or sustaining programs, and a ban against all interpretative speakers and personal commentators there is surely a happy compromise at which point such speakers for hire can be selected who will exercise good taste and opinions balanced by open-minded recognition that others equally wise may hold differing viewpoints. Such speakers can be secured, I believe, who will stress the factual over the prejudicial elements of news and who will avoid taking sides on issues of political importance or governmental significance at times and on points which comprise periods of our national history when the general public is seeking to formulate clear-headed and far-reaching decisions which may determine our national destiny for many years to come.

FOR FREE RADIO, FREE SPEECH, FREE PRESS, AND FREE DECISION

Mr. Speaker, the question of the part which a free radio should appropriately play in molding public opinion by use of commercial programs and professional speakers on sustaining programs is not solely a question of what part radio should play in conveying and interpreting war news. It is a permanent American question which prevails in wartimes and peace, in election years and in off-election years. It is perhaps well that the exigencies of war and an election call this problem to our attention most vigorously at this time because a careful study of its factors now, and studious attention toward its solution, may help eliminate flagrant excesses and develop self-controls by radio itself which will go far toward retaining free radio as an integral part of our great American system of free speech, free press, and decision.

The American Alien

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. H. SCHWARTZ

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY SOLICITOR GENERAL FRANCIS BIDDLE

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, last Sunday evening Francis Biddle, Solicitor General of the United States, delivered over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co. an address explanatory of the Department of Justice program for administration and enforcement of our immigration and naturalization laws, the laws against espionage and sabotage, and the laws for the protection of civil liberties. This address, entitled "The American Alien," is a valuable and timely contribution in view of present conditions in America. I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am glad to have this opportunity tonight of speaking directly to my fellow Americans, to those who are citizens of the United States because they inherited that right by birth, or who have become citizens of this country by their own free choice. And I want to speak to people of other nationalities who are living among us, whom for lack of a better word we call aliens. I shall call them American-aliens, foreigners who are making their homes here but who are potential Americans.

Under our Constitution and laws the control of naturalization and immigration to this country is vested in the United States Government. Until recently those duties have been under the direction of the Department of Labor, probably because immigrants to this country were considered largely in relation to labor problems. The first great masses of people who came here from overseas were manual workers. They helped to build our highways, our railroads, and our cities.

For some time, as you know, President Roosevelt has been sending to Congress various plans calling for the reorganization of different branches of the Government. On May 22 he submitted a plan transferring to the Department of Justice the Immigration and Naturalization Services, including the Border Patrol. In a message explaining this transfer he said—I quote:

"The startling sequence of international events which has occurred * * * has necessitated a review of the measures required for the Nation's safety * * * I am convinced that under existing conditions the immigration and naturalization activities can best contribute to the national well-being only if they are closely integrated with the activities of the Department of Justice."

This order of transfer was duly approved by Congress and took effect on June 14. The Attorney General of the United States has directed me to coordinate this work with other services of the Department of Justice—primarily the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Civil Liberties Bureau, and the recently organized Neutrality Unit. Lemuel B. Schofield, a major of Infantry during the World War and former assistant district attorney and director of public safety in Philadelphia, has been appointed as a special assistant to the Attorney General to be Administrative Head of Immigration and Naturalization.

The Federal laws against espionage and sabotage apply alike to aliens and citizens. The Department of Justice is charged with the duty of detecting and apprehending all violators of those laws, whether citizens or aliens, and of prosecuting violators. In the case of a citizen arrest and prosecution are the remedies. When aliens abuse our hospitality there is a further remedy—deportation. The reorganization plan will enable the Government to deal more effectively and more promptly with alien violators of our laws because it will integrate all activities dealing with aliens in the Department of Justice, whose duty it is to enforce the law. The work of the border patrol, the immigrant inspectors, and the naturalization officers will be brought together but not merged with the two Department of Justice units concerned with subversive activities, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Neutrality Unit, which enforce the law and deal with lawbreakers, and with the Civil Liberties Division, which sees to it that the rights of individuals are not violated.

In the administration of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the policies of the Department of Justice will be dominated by two major objectives: The vigorous and effective enforcement of our laws and the full protection of the civil rights of all persons in the United States. Both these objectives were clearly recognized by the President. He said of this plan—I quote:

"While it is designed to afford more effective control over aliens, this proposal does not reflect any intention to deprive them of their civil liberties or otherwise to impair their legal status. This reorganization will enable the Government to deal quickly with those aliens who conduct themselves in a manner that conflicts with the public interest."

The tragedy to western civilization through which we have been living during these last terrible days has made us alive to the threat of espionage and treason within our democracy—a feared danger which we cannot see but which we must be alert to discover and destroy before it is too late. The individual citizen, of course, feels powerless to combat this subversive evil, and the fear of "fifth column" activities has naturally made some sections of our population hysterical.

One form that this hysteria has taken is the wholesale denunciation of all aliens living in America—a confession of fear and weakness that sees a spy behind every foreign accent. Where individuals have taken the law into their own hands, there have been instances of mob violence. A religious sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses have been repeatedly set upon and beaten. They had committed no crime, but the mob adjudged they had and meted out mob punishment. The Attorney General has ordered an immediate investigation of these outrages.

There is no cause for mass hysteria, no justification for mob violence. As a peaceful Nation we have, perhaps, been slow to realize the danger. But today we are all of us alive to the immediate threat. The Department of Justice is well equipped to recognize the real danger spots and to deal with them vigorously. With the cooperation of the American people the Justice Department will root out espionage and sabotage wherever it threatens. The people must be alert and watchful, and above all cool and sane. Since mob violence will make the Government's task infinitely more difficult, it will not be tolerated. We shall not defeat the Nazi evil by emulating its methods. As Thomas Jefferson said:

"I have ever deemed it more honorable and profitable too, to set a good example than to follow a bad one."

We are equipped to meet all dangers that come from within. Our laws are adequate to cope with those dangers, and if there is any point at which they prove inadequate, we shall ask the Congress to strengthen them. For the enforcement of those laws, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has a competent group of trained men. It has the cooperation of State and local police agencies throughout the country. In adequate laws and competent loyal officials to administer them, the American people place their reliance.

This transfer of immigration and naturalization activities to the Department of Justice has raised the question in the minds of a good many noncitizens as to whether it was effected with a view to making far more drastic the regulations governing their status in the United States. I have in mind particularly those refugees who have sought shelter with us from the horror of war and persecution in their own countries. Our policy must, of course, be worked out to fit the needs of a rapidly changing world, but I want to assure you that we shall not abandon the fundamental principles of American democracy which include a generous and just treatment to innocent sufferers from any country, who have sought refuge with us.

The footprints of the Trojan horse are first found in the treacherous propaganda which leads to the ruthless persecution of minorities, and thereafter their purpose is to make us break down our American democratic insistence on freedom of speech, religious worship, and freedom of assembly by stirring up religious and racial hatred within the United States. Let me speak one familiar word of warning to all Americans. Remember, "A house divided against itself cannot stand." Do not let the subtle propaganda of race hatred turn you against any group in this country as a group. Remember that internal dissension is what the would-be "fifth column" hopes for. It weakens our inner strength.

Let me in closing return once more to what I said at the beginning. I do not like the sound of the word "alien." It is like a brand on the law-abiding foreigners who have come to America as the land of justice and opportunity for all. I prefer to think of them as American-aliens, those people who have lived here in peace, whose children, born on our soil, are American citizens today. There is no necessary relationship between the length of time a man has been here and his loyalty to American institutions. A survey made recently in one of our States showed that 70 percent of the people belonging to families headed by aliens were American citizens. As one writer has put it, "Ellis Island is beginning to share honors with Plymouth Rock." These American aliens have helped with their strength to build the physical and spiritual greatness of our Nation. They have shared with us the good and bad days of prosperity and poverty. The old people may speak only the language of their fatherland; they feel and dream our American aspirations.

There are the Slavic-Americans who have created our empire of steel—rail and bridge and skyscraper; the Scandinavian-Americans whose industry and honesty have built up the great Northwest; the German-Americans whose ancient gentle culture is still preserved here on our shores; the Italian-American stonemason, skilled artisan, artist—and those Italian-Americans who, with torn hearts, have recently had courage to denounce the acts of a totalitarian dictatorship which they hate; the countless other races who have become a very part of it. It was of them, and others like them, that President Wilson said, on May 10, 1915, in the early stages of the other Great War, when feelings were running high in this country, as they now are, addressing 5,000 of them who had been newly naturalized:

"This is the only country in the world which experiences this constant and repeated rebirth. * * * This country is constantly drinking strength out of new sources by the voluntary association with it of great bodies of strong men and forward-looking women out of other lands. And so by the gift of the free will of independent people it is constantly being renewed from generation to generation by the same process from which it was originally created. It is as if humanity had determined to see to it that this great Nation, founded for the benefit of humanity, should not lack for the allegiance of the people of the world * * *."

The Department of Justice is dedicated to its name—to the task of justice. It is here to see that the rights of free speech, free worship, free assembly are not violated. It is here to apprehend those who would undermine our national life and security and destroy those rights. It is your safeguard of democracy.

And They Were Unprepared

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post of June 22, 1940, entitled "And They Were Unprepared."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of June 22, 1940]

AND THEY WERE UNPREPARED

We trust history to erase or disregard the fact that there was a moment when the thought of having to stand alone in its own hemisphere against the European aggressor made the great American democracy seem to be afraid. Alcibiades explained it when he complained of his Greeks—who were often scared, but never afraid—that he could not get them to act until he had made their flesh to creep. That is a weakness of democracies still. Their emotions are quick, but their minds are dilatory. They trifle with time and are never ready.

For how long did England and France watch the Germans at the work of building the most frightful war machine of all time? They knew well enough what it was for. They could have stopped it. Their resources were in every way superior. At least they could have prepared the invincible defense. But they were unwilling to forego in time their customary ways and comforts, unable to forget their internal disputes, incapable of bringing their lives, their powers and intelligence under discipline of a single grim purpose, as they saw the Germans doing. So it was that when the terror struck, they were not ready, and began calling to the great young democracy across the Atlantic to save them, or, if not to save them, who had been saved once before, to save civilization.

And what had this romantic democracy been doing? It had been indulging its moral passions. Conscious of having in its hands the balance of all power in the potential sense, with two-thirds of the world's gold in its vaults, with an unlimited surplus of essential resources, it had been saying to the aggressor, "You and who else?" It had been pursuing the phantasy that, merely by threatening to put its weight in his path, it could stop him.

The origin and growth of that phantasy may be said to date from the President's quarantine speech in Chicago, in October 1937. He said: "Let no one imagine that America will escape, that it may expect mercy, that the Western Hemisphere will not be attacked." And what he proposed was that the peace-loving nations should "quarantine the aggressor."

No one asked how or with what means. Had we not our mobilization-day plan in the files of the War Department, an army of 4,000,000 men on paper, and a law all written and ready to be passed, turning the economy of the entire country from peace to war overnight?

Whether the Germans knew that or not, they went on building their war machine.

Nothing came of the quarantine idea. The next shape of the phantasy received from the President was, "Methods short of war, but more effective than mere words." What methods? What measures?

Anyhow the Germans went on building their machine.

Then the President began to say that the old 1937 neutrality law, forbidding the sale of arms and munitions to belligerents, was the reason why he had been unable to awe the aggressor. He wanted it repealed, and in place of it a law that would give him almost unlimited discretion to employ the economic power of the country in foreign wars. The Congress, after a very bitter fight, refused to give him such a law. It was then that the controversy arose over whether he had said to Members of Congress, in a confidential White House interview, that our first line of defense was in France, or what exactly he did say to make them think he said that. Yet suppose he did say it, and suppose he had been right. What were we going to put there? A typewritten statistical statement of our potential power? Another warning to the aggressor of what we could do?

The Germans went on building their machine; and when of a sudden they released it fully and went crashing through Holland and Belgium with it, the President announced that we were "shocked and angered." We were. Rising in millions of American hearts that day was the passion to put forth the arm of the most powerful democracy and smite that aggressor. Yet again, with what? With shock and anger. Shock is sensation and anger is emotion, and neither one has ever yet shot a bombing plane down.

It was then, and as if for the first time, that a country hitherto boasting of its offensive power looked to its weapons. That was the moment we spoke of in the beginning—the moment of panic. Its weapons were not fit. They were not fit for self-defense even. If its entire military strength had been there to meet the aggressor, it could not have saved Holland, to say nothing of civilization. What would happen, therefore, if the Germans should suddenly win, capture the British and French navies, and then turn their frightful machine against us? Could we defend ourselves?

The truth, or quite enough of it, concerning our state of military and industrial unpreparedness now is notorious. Such sayings as that in these days of "swift and shocking developments" a nation must "look to its defenses in the light of new factors," or that the Administration had not at its disposal the means necessary to prepare an adequate national defense—for that matter, a hemisphere defense according to its own thesis—are but suavities and gloze. The Administration did know. Its files are heavy with neglected information. Our foremost authority in industrial preparedness is Bernard M. Baruch, who, as chairman of the War Industries Board, commanded the country's economic exertions in the World War 22 years ago. Ceaselessly for 3 years he importuned the Government and the President personally with oral statements and written memoranda on the necessity to prepare and organize industry for national defense and on the rise and character of the German menace. After the appeasement of Hitler at Munich, he returned from Europe and stood on the White House steps saying, "The condition of American defense is unknown only to Americans. Every foreign power knows what we are doing and exactly what we lack." And to the Government he addressed another memorandum, saying, "I do not know whether the special machinery that is necessary for making power has been bought. That should be top priority. Next should be the shortage in antiaircraft and antitank guns and semi-automatic shoulder rifles, with a reserve of special machinery. Then airplanes and more airplanes."

And as for means, there was a dispensation of chance such as will never occur again. For his recovery program the President received from Congress billions to spend in whatever way he would. Under the National Industrial Recovery Act alone, to begin with, he got $3,300,000,000. The Congress did not say what he should do with the money; it did suggest to him, among other things, naval construction, aircraft, and mechanization of the Army.

What did he do with it? In the next fiscal year total emergency expenditures under the recovery program were four billions; and of this four billions, less than sixty-one millions were spent for national defense. Billions out of that first free purse and billions since for relief, for social security, for the more abundant life and to make work—save the word!—at a time when in Germany every ounce of human labor was employed and people were on short rations in order to build a war machine with which to destroy the soft-living democracies.

That is not all. Besides the free billions that might have been spent in works of preparedness, Congress has directly appropriated for national defense in the last 7 years the enormous total of seven billions. Seven years was Germany building her war machine. In those 7 years, with the money that we might have spent under the recovery program for national defense, plus the seven billions appropriated for that purpose, we could have made this continent impregnable. What have we got? A first-class Navy, yet one not large enough to defend both coasts at once or to defend the line of neutrality we have cast upon inter-American waters; hardly more than the fine nucleus of an adequate air force; an Army waiting for guns and instruments, with fewer tanks to its name than the number in one German division.

So it is that in a time of the world without reason, no law extant but the law of force, the richest and most powerful democracy in it, this Cathay that has been sending insulting messages to Genghis Khan, is unprepared to fight.

But we are going to be prepared. The first thing shall be unity of mind about it. In unity of mind we adjourn politics. To adjourn politics means that we shall say of what might have been, "What's over the dam is forgotten." To speak of it further would be partisan. Then we are going to begin. There is nothing the Germans know that we don't know; nothing they can do but we can do it more so. Mechanization? We are the famous mechanizers. We are going to defend this hemisphere. We are going to have a power of defense that will enable us to attack an aggressor on his way hither. We are going to have an air armada of 50,000 planes, and bases everywhere, and the personnel and everything.

When? As soon as possible. We are going to "speed up to a 24-hour basis all the existing Army and Navy contracts" without saying why they were not speeded up before. We are going to resurrect the old spirit of industry and embrace it and then require of it, says the President, "the ability to turn out quickly infinitely greater supplies." Infinitely greater.

And toward all this going to be and going to do and infinitely greaterness an immediate appropriation of how much money?

Roughly, one and one-half billions.

Less than one-half the size of the first free purse for the recovery program.

Less than 2½ percent of the national income, whereas Germany, to build her war machine, had been spending at least one-third of her national income for 7 years.

We mention the sum, and scale it thus only as a measure of discrepancy. Money will not buy preparedness. The price of defense is sacrifice.

Regard the German machine. Money did not build it. Nor did credit. It represents grueling work, heroic privation, and what people did without, including butter. They could have butter, or they could have guns; not both. It is a monstrous thing, and yet so it was done. And so only may the power of defense be achieved. It is evident that even yet we are wishfully thinking. We think we can prepare our defense by passing an appropriation. But what is it we are willing to consume less of in order to produce armaments? By how much are we willing to lengthen the hours of labor? How much profit, income, comfort, and pleasure are we willing to surrender? To work harder or to consume less—it is one or the other. In the heroic mood we should do both.

The difference between a totalitarian state and a democracy is that in one the people are commanded to do it, and in the other they must be persuaded. In England and France they could be neither commanded nor persuaded enough.

We have the billions, and they are nothing. We have the resources. We have the labor. What has been wanting is grim leadership calling to the grim spirit in us to rise again.

How Strong Is Our Fighting Spirit?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY FRANK C. WALDROP

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in this morning's edition of the Washington Times-Herald is an article by Mr. Frank C. Waldrop which contains a suggestion so sensible and so novel in the interest of national defense that I think it should be called to the attention of the country. It is a suggestion no less revolutionary than raising the armed forces of the United States by taking all the columnists and newspapermen and advertising men and other publicists who have been trying to steam up a war for the United States and volunteering for purposes of publicity or propaganda service in that war, and inducting them into the service, and then transferring them to the Infantry.

I quote one paragraph from Mr. Waldrop's article:

There is a mutter in the War Department that the fastest way to build up the Army is not with recruiting stations and placards, but by accepting all the volunteers for propaganda and intelligence duty at headquarters (certain offices are overrun with advertising and newspapermen eager to take such assignments) and then transfer the patriots to the Infantry after they are sworn in.

Why are the first volunteer enlistments so far out of balance with population?

I ask unanimous consent to insert Mr. Waldrop's article in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 19, 1940]

HOW STRONG IS OUR FIGHTING SPIRIT?—HERE'S A LITTLE EVIDENCE FROM THE RECRUITING OFFICE

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Deep down in his heart every American today has a chill, hard knot, signifying:

When war comes, what happens to me?

Let's not fool ourselves. Every man is thinking about how he will have to give up what he has been doing, forget what he had been planning, and take up a course of living contrary to all his instincts. Every woman is thinking of what women always think about as war approaches.

Whether more of the people are phrasing the question "When war comes?" or "If war comes?" Nobody really knows.

But when, as, and if war comes, how will the American people behave?

It is no good to talk about our great, martial past, or to say we are all patriotic, tough, and determined to defend ourselves to the last. The French have a great martial past, too. They have been patriotic, tough, and determined, too. Also, they were unprepared, physically.

The United States has not been in a really rough war for 75 years. Is it prepared for war, spiritually?

The Spanish fandango was a fandango. The World War, for us, was more of an ether jag than a war. True, we spent better than a million dollars an hour from April 1917 to April 1919, and billions more after the shooting was over in one way or another, as a part of the same old war.

But the A. E. F. lost only 50,280 men in battle. Another 57,460 died of disease. Accidents, suicides, and the like accounted for 7,920 more, to roll up a total of 115,660 dead American soldiers in that venture. In an ordinary year about 35,000 Americans are killed in traffic accidents.

Yet how did we behave about the last war? Our revulsion hardly needs recalling. It is a grim truth that the War Department is more than a little anxious to know how the present-day America is going to accept the new order after 20 years of pacifism and ease.

Unpleasant as it may be to say, we must face the fact that we are an unknown factor as a fighting nation. The General Staff has been having a very painful debate on the subject. It would like to know how fast the young men of this great business Nation would spring to arms if there were any overnight demand. Some of the generals have a strong contempt for the "undisciplined, uneducated sprats," and say that out of our 130,000,000 people a call for volunteers would bring out a bare 300,000 willing to die.

And they estimate it would take 9 months to get the 300,000 up to fighting pitch.

Even the most optimistic say 500,000 would be a top limit on volunteers.

Well, it is embarrasing to bring these matters into public discussion, but they have to be discussed in public for they are the test of the Nation's fitness to preserve itself. The Army has not only been talking but it has also been making a few trial runs. On May 1 it set out to enlist 15,000 volunteers before July 1. Enlistments were called for in each of the 9 geographical divisions of the country designated as "corps areas."

Here is the register of success from each corps-area headquarters, with 12 days to go in the drive.

First Corps Area (Boston)	387
Second Corps Area (New York City)	364
Third Corps Area (Baltimore)	986

Most of the War Department agrees this is a better total than had been expected. But it is obvious that the rush to arms is not in balance with population and nothing to be overly proud of as a show of martial spirit.

There is a mutter in the War Department that the fastest way to build up the Army is not with recruiting stations and placards, but by accepting all the volunteers for propaganda and intelligence duty at headquarters (certain offices are overrun with advertising and newspapermen eager to take such assignments) and then transfer the patriots to the infantry after they are sworn in.

Why are the first volunteer enlistments so far out of balance with population?

Are the early birds in the desk-defending "intelligence reserve" less than Nathan Hales?

Maybe it is too early in the progress of affairs to form a judgment. But sooner or later we are going to have a judgment thrust upon us, if, as, or when, we go to war.

A Voice From the Pacific Coast in Favor of My Peace Measure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, those of us who were privileged to serve in Congress with John S. McGroarty will always remember his fine altruism. It is impossible for those who know Mr. McGroarty to speak of him in anything but superlative terms. In his overflow of love for humanity the poet laureate of California—so designated by official action of the State legislature—is one of the finest characters that ever graced this planet.

He is a Democrat from the topmost hair of his head to the soles of his feet. When years ago I first proposed an amendment to the Constitution permitting the people to vote on proposals to send our boys into overseas wars he was one of the first of the distinguished men of America to approve that democratic principle. He took his stand by my side and he never has faltered or wavered in giving me the encouragement and inspiration that come so abundantly from a right-thinking and gifted mind.

To him it has always been one of the anomalies of our so-called democracy that while the citizen can vote on the election of a constable or a dog catcher he is denied a vote on the most tragic of all questions. The question as to whether the flower of our youth shall be hurled into the hell of an overseas war.

This great Californian, upon whom the honors of two hemispheres have been heaped, who was made a Knight of St. Gregory by Pope Pius XI, who has touched the hearts of millions by the uplifting messages of his golden tongue and pen, is still urging my peace measure for adoption as a fit climax and cap sheaf of the Bill of Rights. With many persons contending that the time will come when we must send our soldiers overseas, and with many more taking the opposite view, he sees no reason why in a democratic form of government, dedicated to rule by the people, the question should not be submitted to the citizens for their decision under constitutional processes.

Mr. McGroarty edits a very interesting department in the Sunday magazine of the Los Angeles Times, a newspaper with which he has been connected for 38 years. In the issue of that magazine for June 9, 1940, he discussed the international situation, and I quote from his remarks, as follows:

If there were ever a time when voters in the United States should exercise the most anxious care as to the selection of Members of the next Congress it is now in this year of our Lord, 1940. The reason for so saying is that the same dark shadow of war that darkened our skies in 1914 raises its black pall again on our horizon.

IS HISTORY REPEATING ITSELF?

At the present hour the same state of affairs exists that prevailed during the Presidency of Woodrow Wilson. Mr. Wilson had decided in his own mind that the United States would enter the combat against Germany. Propaganda was rampant and of such weight that the minds of the American people became wildly inflamed. When this propaganda was fully aflame, Wilson asked Congress for a declaration of war against Germany. His demand was granted by Congress almost unanimously. The result of the entry of the United States into the World War is still apparent. One hundred thousand of the flower of American youth sleep the sleep of death under little white crosses in France and Flanders. Government hospitals are crowded with the living wrecks of that useless and misguided carnage. Billions of dollars loaned to the Allies remain unpaid. An economic disaster followed which still leaves our country in a deplorable financial condition. But great as all these economic disasters have proved to be the moral disaster is still greater.

HOW DO YOU STAND ON THE LUDLOW BILL?

With the increasing ramifications and complexities of the present situation, every voter in the United States should put to each aspirant to the Congress of the United States one question above all others, namely, how do you stand on the Ludlow bill, defeated in the last Congress but still pending?

The Ludlow bill, introduced and sponsored by Congressman LOUIS LUDLOW of Indiana, if enacted into law would take the power of waging war overseas out of the hands of both the Executive and the Congress, and would leave the decision entirely with the people themselves. This country could never again engage in war except in its own defense, unless the people themselves, by their votes, sanctioned and authorized the movement.

Ourself, we had the great honor and privilege of voting in favor of the Ludlow bill when it came up for passage in the House of Representatives. Although the measure was defeated it had strong backing. A few additional votes would have passed it.

It is an entirely logical and constitutional measure. If this Republic be a government of and by the people, and for the people, surely it is the people themselves directly, and not even through their chosen representatives, who should have the responsibility of declaring war.

One Way to Deal With French Possessions in the Caribbean

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Daily News of June 18 entitled "One Way to Deal With French Possessions in the Caribbean."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily News of June 18, 1940]

ONE WAY TO DEAL WITH FRENCH POSSESSIONS IN THE CARIBBEAN

Apparently Germany intends to impose upon stricken France terms that approximate unconditional surrender. Equally plain is it that France can do no otherwise than accept. That means that French possessions in the Western Hemisphere will fall under the direct, or indirect, but nonetheless effective, control of Germany.

This presents to the United States, not a question of policy, but an actual condition that must be met—and met at once.

Shall we permit the practical transfer of political and military control over islands in the Caribbean Sea to pass from French into German hands?

The Monroe Doctrine, about the only clearly defined foreign policy we have, negatives such a change.

The safety of the Panama Canal, the uninterrupted operation of which is vital to our national defense, forbids it.

Congressional action, not 10 days ago, specifically declares against such a change in sovereignty.

It is clear that we must act—and act promptly.

How shall we act?

The safety of the Western World from invasion by European or Asiatic powers is not the safety of the United States alone. There are 20 other nations whose safety is just as much involved as is the security of this country. Prevention of any attempt by predatory nations to gain bases for military operations on this side of the Atlantic is of as grave concern to the nations of Central and South America as it is to us. Our defense to be effective must be hemispheric.

If this is true—and no one denies it—why, then, should not the measures we take for the common safety of the Americas be representative of the 21 nations that comprise the Americas?

This would mean that the United States, acting as a sort of trustee for the whole western world, would take over French possessions and set up a government for them with, say, three or five of the American governments given representation.

Such a device would certainly avoid any possibility of the charge that we were acting selfishly, with imperialistic designs in the matter. And if Germany thought to challenge such action she would have to defy, not the United States alone, but the entire western world. This she might be loath to do.

Practically, as the most powerful of the American nations, we would have to supply the most, if not all, of the military means to make the trusteeship a reality, but we would surround our action with moral justification in the eyes of the world.

Furthermore, in the new world created by new and undreamed-of dangers, we, here in the Americas, must begin to think hemispherically.

Our danger is a common danger, and our defense must be a mutual defense. In what better way could be begun this new mode of thought than meeting the first tangible danger by common action?

Broadcasts as Aid in Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, because of its widespread interest, I ask to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Times of Sunday, June 9, 1940, entitled "Urge Broadcasts as Aid in Defense."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of June 18, 1940]

URGE BROADCASTS AS AID IN DEFENSE—FOES OF CONGRESS MOVE TO END FUND FOR FEDERAL PROGRAMS; CITE NEW NEED FOR DATA—COST HELD WELL REPAID—OFFICE OF EDUCATION PROJECT IS UPHELD AS MEDIUM FOR COMBATING "FIFTH COLUMN"

WASHINGTON, June 8.—Educational and military authorities interested in the psychological preparation of the Nation for defense against subversive propaganda are preparing to take up the cudgels on behalf of the radio activities of the Office of Education, which are threatened with stopping as a result of the elimination by the House of a $40,000 appropriation which had been approved by the Budget Bureau.

The Senate voted a mere prohibition of the buying by Government agencies of radio time, which the Office of Education has never done. The fate of the fund rests on the conference between the two Houses.

Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah came to the defense of the radio project in a statement today.

"Democracy assumes that the people as a whole through their representatives can make wise decisions," he said. "This makes it necessary for the people to have access to and familiarity with the facts in order to make wise decisions.

HAILS SPREAD OF SERVICE

"Radio is an additional and new medium for bringing facts swiftly to the attention of all citizens of a democracy. The national, State, and local educational forces of our Nation and the broadcasting industry deserve praise for the wider and improved use of radio for education.

"One of the most helpful evidences of this has been the cooperation brought about through the radio division of the United States Office of Education by producing cooperative programs such as 'The World is Yours,' 'Democracy in Action,' and 'Gallant American Women'

"In this present hour of world crisis these educational channels can render splendid service in helping to maintain free interchange of ideas. This process is the fundamental strength of our country."

The National Association of Broadcasters was a leader in directing public attention to the fact that Congress had put a tentative end to a program which, in the interest of public enlightenment, had been for 5 years dramatizing the fundamentals of American democracy for millions of listeners. The bill not only eliminated the appropriation with which the educational radio project was to be continued but it added a clause forbidding W. P. A. to carry out radio projects.

FEDERAL COST IS MINOR

Since the National Broadcasting Co and the Columbia Broadcasting System and their affiliates have been contributing, according to the Office of Education, $5 to every $1 spent by the Government, and such bodies as the Rockefeller Institution and the Smithsonian Institution had also advanced funds, the effect of the elimination of the Educational Radio Project appropriation is far wider than it might appear.

A description of some of the programs the Office of Education has presented over the radio is as follows:

Brave New World, which told the story of Latin America; Let Freedom Ring, a new series which dramatizes and explains the Bill of Rights, trial by jury, freedom of speech, of the press, and of religious, racial equality, etc.; The World Is Yours, which described the opening of the far West, American inventors; Whistler, the artist and the man; Wilkes, an American who discovered a continent; the natives of Hawaii, etc.

If democracy is to defend itself and to be made worth defending against totalitarian propaganda, it is declared by supporters of the project, it must be expounded to the people.

Presentation on the air as a live broadcast is only one phase of the use of Office of Education programs. Hundreds of performances of the dramatizations are given by schools, colleges, and civic groups, and over local stations. This is made possible by the script-exchange feature of the project. Scripts are lent for local, noncommercial use, and recordings are made available at low cost.

For instance, using the subject City Government Is a Business—Make It Your Business, 15 original radio dramatizations on municipal government have been made available free to local school and civic groups. As a result thousands of letters have come in asking for further information on the general subject and suggestions for reading.

LARGE RESULTS AT SMALL COST

The Radio Division of the Office of Education has probably been one of the most economical agencies in the history of government.

Listeners are reached, it is estimated, at a rate of about 16,000 to each nominal cost of $10.

There are actually three educational radio services operating within the Federal Government, one of the others being in the Department of Agriculture, and the third an integral part of the Interior Department. The latter service has produced many radio programs similar in tone to those of the Office of Education, which operates through the Federal Security Agency.

The Interior Department organization is preparing to release a new series, in collaboration with a number of other Government agencies, which, as part of the national-defense program, will inform Americans on the diversity and extent of our natural resources.

Still another educational project, the United States Film Service, which produced several highly praised documentary films, is suspended, and may never be revived.

Advocates of the film and radio services insist that it is a poor time to eliminate or curtail such agencies, when "fifth columnists" and other subversive groups are becoming increasingly active. Sound publicity for America to Americans, they declare, is now more important than ever.

Scroll of Merit Awarded to Theodore Granik

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

NEWS RELEASE FROM THE UNITED STATES JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, on Sunday evening, June 16, the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce awarded a Scroll of Merit to Mr. Theodore Granik, director of the "American Forum of the Air," heard over the Mutual Broadcasting System each Sunday evening. This was notable and deserved recognition of the efforts of a young man who has contributed greatly to the development of interesting and educational radio forums. I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, a press statement issued by the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce on June 17, 1940, together with the text of the Scroll of Merit awarded to Mr. Granik. I also ask that Mr. Granik's remarks in accepting the award be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BESTOWS AWARD TO GRANIK AND AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR

Delegates of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce from all sections of the country now in convention here attended last night's (Sunday) broadcast of the American Forum of the Air held in the Willard Hotel and awarded the forum's director, Theodore Granik, a scroll of merit "as the outstanding person in this field who has rendered most conspicuous service in the furtherance and betterment of American ideals and democracy."

The award was made during the broadcast discussion of the topic How Can Young America Aid National Defense?—the Junior Chamber's convention theme—heard over the coast-to-coast network of the Mutual Broadcasting System. Among those participating in the Forum of the Air broadcast were Perry Pipkin, president of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, who made the award; Francis Biddle, Solicitor General of the United States, and defense coordinator of the Department of Justice; Robert Hinckley, chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority; Brig. Gen. George V. Strong, chief of war plans of the United States Army; and Rear Admiral E. J. King, member of the General Board of the United States Navy.

Following are the texts of Mr. Pipkin's address of award and Mr. Granik's reply:

"The United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, to further the principle—individual expression and unified action make democracy work—salutes the American Forum of the Air, a public-service feature presented each Sunday night by radio station WOL in cooperation with WOR, over the coast-to-coast network of the Mutual Broadcasting System, which was originated and is directed by Theodore Granik, distinguished attorney and pioneer in the field of educational radio discussion.

"Mr. Granik, one of the earliest pioneers in the presentation of radio forums, has devoted more than 12 years of continued and conscientious efforts in the interest of education, and has given unstintingly of his time without compensation to make possible the discussion and better understanding of the many vital problems affecting the lives of the citizenry of America.

"As chairman and director of these radio programs as well as of the American Forum, a nationally syndicated newspaper feature more recently founded by him, he is greatly contributing to the cause of liberal thought and free speech, in presenting the pros and cons of controversial timely topics of the day by outstanding leaders in the fields of labor, business, science, education, government, national and international affairs.

"He has succeeded in making his radio and newspaper forums a balanced and unbiased indicator of American public opinion by giving every citizen a true opportunity to judge fairly the views of those who make and mold our laws and public policy.

"It is a real pleasure and a distinct privilege to express the sincere thanks and gratitude of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce to Theodore Granik for making possible these great contributions to American freedom of discussion, especially at a time when our precious liberties are threatened by the onrushing forces of ruthless dictators in other parts of the world. We award this scroll of merit to him as the outstanding person in this field who has rendered most conspicuous service in the furtherance and betterment of American ideals and democracy."

Mr. Granik's reply:

"Thank you, Mr. Pipkin. I am deeply grateful to your organization and to each of your members for their kindness in awarding this scroll to me.

"As I was listening to your generous remarks more than 12 years passed in review. Back in 1928 I conceived the idea of a series of programs entitled "Law for the Layman," presenting from the New York studios of WOR members of the bench and bar in discussions on legal aspects of our citizens' daily lives. The splendid public reaction developed my thought that the public would be interested in hearing the discussion of both sides of timely topics of the day. Alfred J. McCosker, president of WOR, immediately recognizing the significance and importance of this type of informative program, and the WOR Forum Hour came into being. Each week I was privileged to present outstanding men and women in public life in debates on controversial issues affecting America's welfare.

"In 1937 my legal activities took me to Washington. This was shortly after the formation of the Mutual Broadcasting System, and I discussed with William B. Dolph, general manager of WOL in Washington, the idea of expanding the local WOR forum into a national program. He also recognized the value, the need, and the importance of presenting this type of discussion to the American people. Thus the American Forum of the Air came into existence. I am proud to say that it has become a national institution. We have presented the views of outstanding leaders in Government and Congress, as well as of other national figures—of those who make and mold our laws and public policy—so that our people may better understand all phases of the vital questions being debated in our legislative halls and better enjoy the American right of voicing their own opinions to their representatives, a true symbol of America's democratic traditions.

"The response from our listeners in all parts of the country has been most encouraging and complimentary, and I would like to take this opportunity to thank the many thousands who write to us each week. I am also grateful to the newspapers throughout the country for devoting column after column in reporting these broadcasts. And, of course, our deepest gratitude to our speakers, all busy in the affairs of our Nation, who devote so much of their time and energy to bring you their important messages."

A Tip to the Politicians—Delegates to the National Conventions, Please Take Notice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time today in order that I may give a tip to the politicians. It is a free tip and a valuable tip. Delegates to the Republican and Democratic National Conventions please take notice. The tip I offer tells you how to win the 1940 national election.

Naturally, being a Democrat, I would prefer that the Democratic National Convention would accept my tip, as my proposal is the very essence of democracy and it would fit perfectly into the platform of the party whose father was the author of the Bill of Rights. However, my proposal also is Americanism in its finest form and flower and if both political platforms choose to adopt it I will be happier still.

The 1940 national election will be won or lost on the issue of our foreign relations. Be not deceived about that. The party that adopts the best antiwar plank will win.

The people of the United States are grimly determined, first, that we shall build up our national defenses to the highest point of perfection so that there will be no doubt of our ability under any and all circumstances to defend ourselves and to perform our obligations under the Monroe Doctrine, and second, that we shall stay out of wars that are being waged, and that will be waged, overseas.

The sort of foreign-relations plank that will carry the national election will contain two substantive declarations, as follows:

First. For the strongest possible national defense.

Second. For a referendum by the people on participation in overseas wars.

Not one of these declarations alone, but both of them, will be required to insure carrying the election. For instance, let us suppose that one political party declares for the strongest possible national defense, and stops there, while the other declares for the strongest national defense, plus a referendum on overseas wars.

The party that declares for the strongest national defense, plus a referendum on foreign wars, will sweep the country.

I would propose as a referendum plank the resolution adopted by the Young Democrats of America, 5,000,000 strong, at their national convention held at Indianapolis in 1937 with a slight change, to cover our obligations under the Monroe Doctrine, the text reading as follows:

Resolved, That we favor a Nation-wide referendum before declaration of war, except in the case of invasion of the United States or some other country in the Western Hemisphere, or internal rebellion.

Correspondence coming to me from all over the country and five Gallup polls have shown an overwhelming majority in favor of my proposal, which is convincing evidence that this is the platform declaration on foreign affairs that the people want and that they will support in the election next November. The people have never had a chance to vote on the question of sending our boys into war overseas. The plank I propose would promise to give them that right. It would receive widespread popular support. The politicians may not accept this tip but it is a good tip and it comes from the grass roots of America.

The Monroe Doctrine and House Joint Resolution 556

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to reaffirm the Monroe Doctrine by enacting House Joint Resolution 556 into law. Let us look at the terms of the resolution and at the text of the so-called Monroe Doctrine.

The resolution provides, first, that the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power; and second, that if such transfer or attempt to transfer should appear likely, the United States shall in addition to other measures immediately consult with the other American republics to determine upon the steps which should be taken to safeguard their common interests.

Now, the text of the original Monroe Doctrine, which I am inserting in the following remarks, contains what seems to me to be three distinct propositions which we should take cognizance of at the present time.

NO COLONIZATION OF AMERICAN CONTINENTS

The colonization of the American continents by any European powers is interdicted in the following language:

> In the discussion to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

NO EXTENSION OF ANOTHER POLITICAL SYSTEM TO OUR HEMISPHERE

President Monroe was particularly emphatic in his opposition to the extension of another political system to our hemisphere. He stated:

> We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere.

Further in his remarks President Monroe said:

> It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference.

NONINTERFERENCE IN EUROPEAN INTERNAL AFFAIRS

An important part of the Monroe Doctrine lays down the rule that we will not interfere in the internal affairs of the European powers. The following language of President Monroe is unequivocal:

> In the wars of European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense.

Further we find this statement:

> Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power; submitting to injuries from none.

TEXT OF THE ORIGINAL MONROE DOCTRINE

In The Monroe Doctrine: An Interpretation by Albert Bushnell Hart, the following is given as the text of the original Monroe Doctrine:

TEXT OF THE ORIGINAL MONROE DOCTRINE

The form of statement made by Monroe, after taking the counsel of his Cabinet and a few other statesmen, appears in two separated passages of the annual message, the wording of which is as follows, in its precise sequence:

"At the proposal of the Russian Imperial Government, made through the Minister of the Emperor residing here, a full power and instructions have been transmitted to the Minister of the United States at St. Petersburg to arrange, by amicable negotiation, the respective rights and interests of the two nations on the northwest coast of this continent. A similar proposal has been made by His Imperial Majesty to the Government of Great Britain, which has likewise been acceded to. The Government of the United States has been desirous, by this friendly proceeding, of manifesting the great value which they have invariably attached to the friendship of the Emperor, and their solicitude to cultivate the best understanding with his Government.

"In the discussions to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers. * * *

"It was stated at the commencement of the last session that a great effort was then making in Spain and Portugal to improve the condition of the people of those countries, and that it appeared to be conducted with extraordinary moderation. It need scarcely be remarked that the result has been, so far, very different from what was then anticipated. Of events in that quarter of the globe with which we have so much intercourse, and from which we derive our origin, we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense.

"With the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted.

"We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

"In the war between these new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

The late events in Spain and Portugal show that Europe is still unsettled. Of this important fact no stronger proof can be adduced than that the allied powers should have thought it proper, on any principle satisfactory to themselves, to have interposed, by force, in the internal concerns of Spain. To what extent such interposition may be carried, on the same principle, is a question in which all independent powers whose governments differ from theirs are interested, even those most remote, and surely none more so than the United States.

"Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the Government de facto as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every power; submitting to injuries from none.

"But in regard to these continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference.

"If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new governments, and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that she can never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves, in the hope that other powers will pursue the same course."

Conservation as a Foundation of Permanent Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY GIFFORD PINCHOT AT EIGHTH AMERICAN SCIENTIFIC CONGRESS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Gifford Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, on Conservation as a Foundation of Permanent Peace. The address was delivered before the Eighth American Scientific Congress in Washington, D. C., on May 11, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thirty-two years ago there was held in the city of Washington a conference which was the first of its kind. It was the first not only in America but in the world. It was also the first conference in the history of this country of the Governors of all the States and Territories with the President of the United States. Since it included also the Congress, the Cabinet, the Supreme Court, scientific experts, representatives of national associations, and outstanding citizens, it was one of the most distinguished gatherings ever brought together in this country.

But no one of these was the essential reason for its epoch-making importance. The reason why the meeting of the Governors with President Theodore Roosevelt in the White House in May 1908 may well be regarded by future historians as a turning point in human history, the reason why it exerted and continues to exert a vital influence on the United States, on the other nations of the Americas, and on the nations of the whole world, is this: It was called to introduce, and it did introduce, to mankind the newly formulated policy of the conservation of natural resources.

Even at that time the profound significance of conservation was beginning to make itself felt. In announcing his intention to call the conference, the President said: "The conservation of natural resources is the fundamental problem. Unless we solve that problem it will avail us little to solve all others. * * * It (the conference) ought to be among the most important gatherings in our history, for none have had a more vital question to consider."

In his opening address to the conference the President made this striking statement:

"So vital is this question that for the first time in our history the chief executive officers of the States separately, and of the States together forming the Nation, have met to consider it. It is the chief material problem that confronts us, second only—and second always—to the great fundamental questions of morality. * * *

"This conference on the conservation of natural resources is, in effect, a meeting of the representatives of all the people of the United States called to consider the weightiest problem now before the Nation."

This conference set forth in impressive fashion, and it was the first national meeting in any country to set forth the idea that the protection, preservation, and wise use of the natural resources of the earth is not a series of separate and independent tasks but one single problem. As the President said, "The various uses of our natural resources are so closely connected that they should be coordinated, and should be treated as parts of one coherent plan."

The conference asserted that the conservation of natural resources is the one most fundamentally important problem of all. It drove home the basic truth that the planned and orderly development of the earth and all it contains is absolutely indispensable to the permanent prosperity of the human race.

It spread far and wide the new proposition that the purpose of the conservation of natural resources is the greatest good of the greatest number for the longest time.

And it taught the people of the United States, and other peoples, the new meaning of the word "conservation," which in its present application to natural resources was then generally unknown.

By defining, describing, and making known the new word and the new policy, by endowing it with the approval and support of the leaders of all the States, of the great industries, and of the Nation itself, the Governors' conference put conservation in a firm place in the knowledge and the thinking of the people. From that moment conservation became an inseparable part of the national policy of the United States.

It is worth mention that this brilliant example of national foresight occurred, not in a time of scarcity, not in a depression, but in a time of general abundance and well-being. The unanimous declaration of the Governors ended with this discerning admonition: "Let us conserve the foundations of our prosperity."

You may find it difficult today, when conservation is accepted almost as widely as the Ten Commandments, to realize that only a generation ago there was no such thing as the conservation policy. The very word "conservation," as we use it today, had no existence. But that is the truth.

The conception which we know as conservation originated and was formulated in the United States Forest Service in the early winter of 1907. Conservation grew out of forestry. It was a contribution from the foresters of America to the permanent policy and the democratic principles of their country.

Like many another child of flesh or brain, conservation was born without a name. But it had to be given a name before it could be introduced to the people.

After discussion among perhaps half a dozen men, the name "conservation" was tentatively decided on. Thereupon it was submitted to and approved by Theodore Roosevelt, and the infant was christened accordingly. We know the growing youngster, 33 years old but growing still, by that same name today.

The hold conservation has gained in these 33 years upon the civilized peoples of the world is little less than amazing. Today the soundness of the conservation policy is everywhere accepted as a matter of course.

The Conference of Governors recommended and was followed by the appointment of conservation commissions by a majority of the States, and of the National Conservation Commission, which latter in January of 1909 submitted to the President the first national inventory of natural resources ever made. In February of the same year the North American Conservation Conference, the first international conference to consider the policy of conservation, met in Washington at the invitation of President Theodore Roosevelt.

In his address at the opening of the conference in the White House, the President made this highly significant statement:

"In international relations the great feature of the growth of the last century has been the gradual recognition of the fact that instead of its being normally to the interest of one nation to see another depressed, it is normally to the interest of each nation to see the others elevated. * * *

"I believe that the movement that you this day initiate is one of the utmost importance to this hemisphere and may become of the utmost importance to the world at large."

The North American Conservation Conference declared that the movement for the conservation of natural resources on the continent of North America "is of such a nature and of such general importance that it should become world-wide in its scope." Therefore it suggested to the President "that all nations should be invited to join together in conference on the subject of world resources and their inventory, conservation, and wise utilization."

What the conference thus recommended was, however, already under way. The President had foreseen that the North American conference would be the precursor of a world conference. Accordingly, to quote Elihu Root, then Secretary of State: "By an aide-memoire in January last (1909), the principal governments were informally sounded to ascertain whether they would look with favor upon an invitation to send delegates to such a conference. The responses have so far been uniformly favorable, and the conference of Washington has suggested to the President that a similar general conference be called by him. The President feels, therefore, that it is timely to initiate the suggested world conference for the conservation of natural resources by a formal invitation."

Secretary Root continued: "As was said in the preliminary aide-memoire 'the people of the whole world are interested in the natural resources of the whole world, benefited by their conservation, and injured by their destruction. The people of every country are interested in the supply of food and of material for manufacture in every other country, not only because these are interchangeable through processes of trade but because a knowledge of the total supply is necessary to the intelligent treatment of each nation's share of the supply * * *.'

"Reading the lessons of the past aright it would be for such a conference to look beyond the present to the future."

These statements make it evident that the President and the men in whose minds the plan for a world inventory was born regarded the proposed conference only as a first step. They believed that international cooperation between nations for the conservation of natural resources and for fair access to necessary raw materials would greatly reduce the danger of war and work powerfully for permanent peace. Such a result was a definite part of their plan.

With the concurrence of the Netherlands, invitations were sent to 58 nations to meet at the Peace Palace in The Hague in September 1909. Thirty of the nations, including Great Britain, France, Germany, Canada, and Mexico, had already accepted when President Taft, who succeeded Theodore Roosevelt on March 4, 1909, killed the plan.

Two attempts have been made to revive it. At the end of the World War President Wilson, at the suggestion of Colonel House, took steps toward securing world-wide cooperation in the conservation and distribution of natural resources. Unfortunately nothing came of it.

During President Hoover's administration a group of nearly 200 leading citizens from all parts of this country urged him in a public petition to take action along the same general line. Again nothing came of it.

But these checks notwithstanding, the conservation problem remains the fundamental human problem. Without natural resources no human life is possible. Without abundant natural resources civilized life can neither be developed nor maintained.

To the human race land is the basic natural resource. The demand for new territory, made by one nation against another, is a demand for additional natural resources. And I need not point out to you how many times this demand has plunged the nations into war.

In view of the foregoing, I have a definite plan to suggest—a plan for permanent peace through international cooperation in the conservation and distribution of natural resources.

THE PROPOSAL

National life everywhere is built on the foundation of natural resources. Throughout human history the exhaustion of these resources and the need for new supplies have been among the greatest causes of war.

A just and permanent world peace is vital to the best interests of all nations. When the terms which will end the present war are considered, the neutral nations should be in position to assist in finding the way to such a peace. That being so, it would be wise to prepare in time.

The proposal is that the nations of the Americas prepare now for an endeavor to bring all nations together, at the right moment, in a common effort for conserving the natural resources of the earth, and for assuring to each nation access to the raw materials it needs, without recourse to war.

In all countries some natural resources are being depleted or destroyed. Needless waste or destruction of necessary resources anywhere threatens or will threaten, sooner or later, the welfare and security of peoples everywhere. Conservation is clearly a world necessity, not only for enduring prosperity but also for permanent peace.

No nation is self-sufficient in essential raw materials. The welfare of every nation depends on access to natural resources which it lacks. Fair access to natural resources from other nations is, therefore, an indispensable condition of permanent peace.

War is still an instrument of national policy for the safeguarding of natural resources or for securing them from other nations. Hence international cooperation in conserving, utilizing, and distributing natural resources to the mutual advantage of all nations might well remove one of the most dangerous of all obstacles to a just and permanent world peace.

The conservation of natural resources and fair access to needed raw materials are steps toward the common good to which all nations must in principle agree. Since the American nations are less dependent on imported natural resources than European nations, and since they are already engaged in broadening international trade through negotiated agreements, their initiative to such ends would be natural and appropriate.

The problem of permanent peace includes, of course, great factors which the foregoing proposal does not cover. But it does cover that factor which is certainly, in the long run, the most potent of them all.

FACTS REQUIRED

If the foregoing proposal is adopted, facts in support of it will be needed, and a plan for assembling them. The formulation of a general policy and a specific program of action would follow.

Facts for each nation separately, for groups of nations, and for the whole world might well be assembled under the general classes of forests, waters, lands, minerals, and wildlife. In very brief outline they should include:

As to conservation—resources in existence, consumption, probable duration, waste, conservation if any, necessary reserves, and available surplus.

As to fair access—present interdependence of nations in natural resources (raw materials), with the origin, destination, and quantities of imports and exports; present barriers to fair access; and sources of pressure upon nations to acquire natural resources.

A WAY TO ASSEMBLE THE FACTS

The information just outlined undoubtedly exists in sufficient detail for the present purpose, and can be put together without original investigation. It could well be done through a commission appointed for that purpose representing all of the American nations.

The gathering of information through the creation of such a commission might, I believe, properly be recommended by the Eighth American Scientific Congress to the Governments of the American Nations.

Formulation by the commission of a plan and of recommendations to the American governments for a general policy and a specific program of action, including the presentation of the plan when prepared to neutral and belligerent nations, would follow.

Such a commission would be of immense and lasting value to the American nations. It could not but advance their interests, both individual and mutual, in addition to opening a road toward a workable basis for permanent peace.

Finally, the situation in Europe and in Asia suggests that action for the purpose outlined above was never more necessary that at present.

Keeping America Out of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the next 30 days in American life, perhaps the next 10 days, are likely to be the most important in the history of our Republic. You and I are faced with the most trying decisions which can be made by a free people. It is about these decisions and the part you can and should play in shaping our national destiny that I am going to talk to you tonight.

War hysteria has gripped America. This great God-fearing land of peace and plenty today finds itself in the shadow of the European war. Once again we hear the blood-stained slogans of the last war echo throughout the land. Appeals are being made for another "war to make the world safe for democracy" and for another "war to end war" by the same groups who so skillfully used these slogans 20 years ago to plunge this country into that struggle of death. The time is almost here when these immortal words of George Washington take on added significance:

> Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

So I say to you, while men still dare to call out for peace, it is time that you and I seriously consider the path we are traveling, analyze the goal we are approaching, and ask ourselves whether we really want to spill the blood of millions of American boys on foreign battlefields.

If we enter this European war it will be a total war. Wealth as well as men will be conscripted. There will be no bonds at high rates of interest; no high-salaried civilian jobs or occupations; no boom for agricultural prices; no $2 wheat and $20 hogs. In the industrial-mobilization plan—already prepared and in the President's files—the Government has seen to all that. This war would be a total war, I repeat. Sons would be drafted, taken from home, shop, and farm, forced to give their lives in bloody battle; dictatorial powers would be given to the President, enabling him to tax and seize the lifetime savings of the family. There would be no war millionaires this time; no fantastic high wages for industry. No, this conflict would not be a war to end war; it would be a war to end democracy in America and a war to end our system of private ownership which has made America the greatest country in the world.

If the war propagandists succeed in pushing America into this war the result will be just as Winston Churchill said it would be, when he was installed as the present-day dictator of England. He said:

> I have nothing to offer you except blood, tears, toil, and sweat.

My friends, if America goes to war, if we again sacrifice our boys on the bloody altar of the heathen god of Mars, it will be because America goes to the war, for war will avoid an adequately prepared America. It is now time to think clearly of ourselves and our own future. It is now time to face the facts squarely. It is now time to point out definitely that a million dead American boys in new European war graves cannot defend America as well as a million well-equipped Americans at home, prepared to protect this country against any foreign enemy.

And now, let us do some clear thinking, you and I. If we do this, I am sure we can all agree that the best defense for America lies in an impregnable, modern military establishment equipped to resist the methods and machinery of modern warfare, and not in sending expeditionary forces overseas. We must tighten our belts, improve our Government's financial structure, and prepare ourselves to the teeth, rather than take part in offensive battles overseas.

My friends, I am an American and my interest is in making democracy safe for the world by preserving it in the United States. I detest alike the un-American doctrines of nazi-ism, fascism, communism, and imperialism. It happens that I am the only Member of Congress of Luxemburger descent. The homeland of my ancestors has been overrun by the hobnailed boots and the giant tanks of the Nazi armies. My sympathies overflow for the victims of aggression. But I am an American first, and I must not and I will not allow my personal sympathies or my ancestral background to force me to plunge America into the torture and torment of war. To my mind, the most dangerous "fifth column" agents in America today are those war salesmen who, because of national sympathies or financial interests, or even misguided idealism, would push this country into a foreign war. No, these individuals will not join any foreign legion. No, they will not now volunteer to drive a war ambulance. No, they will not immediately give their fortunes to the Red Cross. But they want you to give up your savings, your liberty, and do the fighting and dying overseas.

Modern warfare has added to the protective value of our oceans. Today, a modern invader with any hope of success, would have to ship more mechanical equipment to this country than could be carried in all the ships of Europe and the very difficulty of supplying these huge machines with fuel would stall an army. The need of a 3,000-mile supply line would defeat any invader, for American ingenuity can break such a line and make a modern Gibraltar out of this whole continent if we will devote ourselves to the task of preparedness. By the same token, an American Army which today fights 3,000 miles away from home is gambling the destiny of its people against almost hopeless odds.

An amazing thing has happened in America. An organization called A Committee to Defend America by Helping the Allies has been formed, and it consciously or unconsciously is promoting the move toward war in this country. In recent weeks this group has spent thousands upon thousands of dollars in its drive toward war, by putting full-page advertisements in most of the big city papers of America. These advertisements urged all readers to write the President, their Senators and Congressmen to take every step to aid the Allies. Many stimulated letters and telegrams have come to Washington, and our peace today is far less secure than it was. To these advertisements have been added an expensive direct mail campaign, movie shorts, and numerous radio broadcasts urging intervention in behalf of the Allies. We have now reached the position where the next step is war itself.

Fellow Americans, the next few statements are the most important words I have ever spoken. Whether you act—or you fail to act—they may prove the most important words you have ever heard. They point out what you can do to keep this country out of war; they indicate what I sincerely believe you must do if the drift toward war is to be stopped short of sending your sons to the slaughter beds of Europe. If you want peace, you must fight for it here at home as hard as soldiers fight in war. You and millions of peace-loving citizens like you, must start an avalanche of letters, telegrams, postcards, and petitions to Washington if America is to remain at peace.

War propagandists are using every means and vast sums of money to stimulate the demand for war. Those of us fighting to retain our peace do not have the help of heavy contributions of money from people with business interests in Europe; we do not have the help of certain eastern newspapers which have connections abroad and which clamor for war; ours is simply a sincere fight to keep America out of war. Its success or failure depends on each of you.

Every thinking observer now realizes the President's policies, intentionally, ignorantly, or ill-advisedly, have put us on the road to war. There is still time to turn back—there is still time to prevent the final death-dealing step. That is why I am talking to you tonight.

I want every boy who hears me, especially you between the ages of 17 and 35, who will be the first to sacrifice your lives, to write the President, your Senators and Representative, right now, that you do not want to go to war. Girls, you who listen, immediately write to your elected officials in Washington, telling them that you do not want your sweetheart or brother to go to war and become a forgotten white cross on another foreign battlefield. You, fathers, whose sons would be the pawns of battle, you have a sacred duty to perform. Write to the President, your Senators, and your Representative, urging them to take no further steps into this war. You, mothers, whose boys mean more to you than life itself, I plead with you to force your elected officials to take a public stand against our entrance into war.

It is reported there are some Congressmen who would declare war tomorrow. Is yours among them? Has he declared himself? Has he openly pledged not to vote to send your loved ones overseas to die? No one should be permitted to take an "on the fence" or "off the record" stand on this all-important issue. Not only must you, yourselves, each of you, write the President and your Senators and Congressman, but you must get others to do the same; and they, in turn, must get still others to swell the tidal wave of telegrams and letters to Washington right now, before it is too late. And do not stop there. Think of the mothers and fathers of Europe, each of whom would give 10 years of his or her life to undo the havoc wrought by war now that it is too late. Will you here in America give the next 10 days of your life fighting for peace before the fateful words "too late" have closed the opportunity forever? You must write post cards, letters, or send telegrams tonight; you have neighbors you can get to do the same; you can circulate petitions in every city in the land; you can ask your preacher or your priest to plead for peace in church; you can write the editor of your daily newspaper your demands for peace; you can write every radio speaker or news commentator your desire for peace and your criticism of those who would lead us to war. You can keep America at peace, or you can permit America to drift into the bloodiest war of history. The time to act is now; and write every day until the fight for peace is won.

My friends, I have given you the facts. I have done all that I can do. We can have peace or we can go to war. What you do may well determine the results. My concluding prayer is that you will act before it is forever too late.

Vindication of Senator Holt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM WHEELING INTELLIGENCER

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief article from the Wheeling Intelligencer, of Wheeling, W. Va., written by Charles Brooks Smith.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wheeling Intelligencer of June 18, 1940]

SENATOR HOLT VINDICATED

(By Charles Brooks Smith)

Congress in the relief bill, it is apparent, made a sincere effort to meet many criticisms, and correct many faults of the operations of W. P. A. in the past. No member of the Congress was more interested and pleased in noting these changes than West Virginia's young Senator, RUSH HOLT. He advocated many of them long ago, as far back as 1936 and, by so doing, incurred the hate of the politicians who had their hooks into the W. P. A. pie up to their funny bone. It is another in the long train of Holt vindications. By next January when he says au revoir but not good-bye—as he sees it—to the Senate, he will be about as near 100 percent vindicated as any Member that ever underwent this depressing circumstance.

The Position of American Agriculture on National Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, 2D

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

STATEMENT OF POLICY OF AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement of policy formulated by the board of directors of the American Farm Bureau Federation to serve as the basis for planks to be recommended to the national party conventions. I make this request at the suggestion of Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Events of recent years, and especially of recent months, have focused our attention on the problems of national unity and national strength. National strength in the aggregate is the strength of the various groups which comprise the Nation. We emphasize especially the importance of a strong and unified agriculture for the tasks which lie ahead. Agriculture is more than the source of our food and fiber stores, however important these may be. It is an economic democracy vigorously loyal to the principles of political democracy. It is the great source of the youth upon which we depend to man and guide our democracy in generations to come.

Mistakes of the past with respect to agriculture must not be repeated. The last war left us with a heavy legacy of ruined land and ruined lives, and an overexpanded and overcapitalized plant. Farm prices soared for a short period in the late war and post-war years, and then collapsed. Industrial prices and wages remained high, and two decades of disparity for agriculture followed. The resultant disparity must be corrected and must not be permitted to happen again. Whatever the needs of this country, or the world, there will be no bottlenecks in the production of American farm products. The American farmer has not been practicing what some have termed scarcity economics. Food and fiber have been available in recent years in greater quantities than before the depression. He will continue to make these supplies available in abundance at fair prices. In return, the farmer expects protection from rash expansion of farm acreages and ruthless exploitation of soil resources. He also expects protection from the especially disorganizing effects which a disorganized world must have on his industry. We consider the present agricultural program, modified as may be necessary by events that cannot now be foreseen, to be the best hope of the farmer for the protection he has earned.

DEMOCRACY

In a world torn by strife where in many nations freedom has ceased to exist and tyranny rules instead, we should give serious thought to plans for safeguarding our democratic form of Government. Through smugness we must not lose the freedom our forefathers won. We still cherish that freedom even though it has become commonplace. As a nation we are confronted by grave problems, economic within and war without. Economic chaos is bound to follow this war. It is important to all the world that we be a stable, prosperous, self-governing democracy.

Our forefathers fought and died for the democratic ideals that have been preserved for us in our generation. The question now before us is whether we today are willing to labor, and to make sacrifices for the institutions that make up our Christian democracy.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

We recognize the importance of national defense—national defense which will maintain a nation of free institutions and free men. In a world where it is evident that such defense can be accomplished only by strength of arms however much we deplore it we support all essential steps for putting our armed forces on a strong footing. The task of rearming must be carried on with a maximum of efficiency and a minimum of waste and bureaucratic red tape.

TAXATION

National defense and national security are creating new problems in taxation and fiscal policy. The issues here must be met honestly and squarely. We do not question the financial stability of the National Government and we support the lifting of the debt limit to meet the extra demands of the present crisis. Long-run financial stability and a balanced Budget require that national income be raised to accord with the full productive capacity of the Nation, and a high agricultural income based on parity is an essential factor in achieving the goal. Increased taxes will be necessary, and in formulating a complete tax program for defense and domestic needs we demand adherence to the following principles:

1. That taxes be framed so as to bring back into production resources of men and materials which are and have long been idle.
2. That new taxes be levied strictly on the basis of ability to pay. Honesty requires that we accept taxes on personal and corporate income as the main sources of revenue. Evasion and leakages in these taxes should be rigorously checked.
3. That profiteering either by industry, labor, or agriculture be rigorously checked by means of an excess war-profit tax.
4. That steps be taken, so long as consumption remains far below normal, to avoid, so far as possible, taxes which depress unnecessarily our consuming power and thereby reduce national income and increase the problems of post-war readjustment.

WORLD RECONSTRUCTION

The stake of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of a peaceful world order is fully apparent. At all times it must be our declared policy to protect and develop free institutions on this hemisphere. If the opportunity for world reconstruction with well-intentioned foreign governments presents itself, we commend a policy of full cooperation and believe that we should bring to the task the financial and moral resources of this country.

EFFECT OF THE WAR ON AGRICULTURE

The present war, and also large expenditures on our own defense, and peace settlements the nature of which cannot be foreseen, will all have a profound effect on our agriculture. It may be that some domestic outlets will improve temporarily, but we must expect that both our domestic and foreign markets will suffer violent disturbance. Perhaps some of our present foreign markets will be lost forever. We insist upon the following measures to meet this situation:

1. The use of loan and storage operations and marketing agreements to cushion the shock of these disturbances as they affect producers of distressed commodities.
2. The continuation, perfecting and as may be necessary, the great expansion of present machinery for moving surpluses into domestic and foreign consumption.
3. Use of all reasonable safeguards against speculation in agricultural land with its attendant, disastrous effects on farm debt and family ownership and tenure.
4. Discourage bringing of new lands into production or breaking up of range lands where nothing can result save the eventual distress of the individuals concerned and the wastage of the lands involved.
5. Preparation for the sudden withdrawal of war demand or armament expenditures with measures which will cushion the shock of depression and restore the flow of peacetime purchasing power of all kinds.

EMERGENCY RESERVES

Hundreds of thousands of homeless and starving people are now cut off from their normal supplies of food and clothing; American farmers, who have hitherto supplied these people are now faced with disastrously low prices for the farm commodities that are dependent upon these markets; they are also faced, if the experience of the past is repeated, with enlarged demands in the post-war period and the prospect of inflated prices leading to disruptive expansion of farm plant; and as a nation we should now avoid wastage or loss in all essential food supplies and positive steps should be taken to store our surpluses against the time when they may be urgently needed either for our own use or for a hungry world.

Immediate steps should therefore be taken by the Federal Government to (1) make available to the Red Cross or other agencies funds for the purchase of such food and fiber supplies as can now be used to relieve distress in war areas, and (2) within the framework of the present agricultural program to take steps to acquire in volume such stocks of meat and dairy products and tree and field crops, both in raw and processed form, as will prevent demoralization of domestic markets and constitute a full reserve against any world need which we may be called upon to meet.

For the carrying out of the above policy we now urge appropriation of $100,000,000 to be used by the American Red Cross for present distribution of food and fiber to victims of war, and that complete provision be made as necessary for acquisition of raw or processed farm crops for storage against future needs.

THE FARM PROGRAM

Agriculture will meet all of the demands placed upon it by the national emergency; there can be no question about that. Agricultural production is now at higher levels than during the 1920's. But war and preparation for war will solve none of the problems of agriculture. Its position as a small-scale family enterprise, comprising some 6,000,000 individual units in a world of industrial giants and controlled prices, remains the same. As an export industry, the problems of agriculture will be intensified. Recognizing this, we consider it necessary:

1. To maintain intact the present farm program and its machinery for voluntary collaboration in production and surplus control between the farmer and the Government against the time when it will be needed more than ever.

2. To accept the principle of full parity income for all agricultural producers.

3. To place the financing of the agricultural program on a permanent and constructive footing by providing a source of tax revenues which will permanently equalize, as between agriculture and industry, the systems of price control and the tariff protection enjoyed by the latter. Rural poverty can never be a source of national strength.

CONSERVATION

Our national soil-conservation program should be coordinated and integrated with a much broader program, including forest and grazing conservation, wildlife conservation, the protection of our water resources, and increased emphasis upon the acquisition of submarginal land for national forests and recreational areas and more effective control of fire and disease in our forests. We strongly oppose the transfer of the Forest Service, in whole or in part, from the United States Department of Agriculture; the forest-conservation and grazing programs should be administered by the Department of Agriculture.

DISTRIBUTION COSTS

High and inflexible costs of distribution have lowered substantially the farmer's share in the consumer's food dollar over the past quarter century. Consumers have been paying more while the producer has been receiving less. Some increase in distribution costs is inevitable. However, outmoded and congested market facilities, racketeering, absence of consumer standards, and excessive duplication of retail facilities have been at least as important. We demand a vigorous program under Federal sponsorship for modernizing and coordinating terminal-market facilities in the large cities, a constant search for increased efficiency in all market channels between producer and consumer, prosecution of all who seek unlawfully to prey upon commerce in farm products, and prompt extension of consumer grades and standards for foods and textiles. We are opposed to efforts to burden chain stores and other mass distributors with discriminatory laws and taxes.

ILLEGAL RESTRAINTS

We insist upon the continuation and extension of the machinery which has been set up in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice for vigorous prosecution of monopolistic restrictions, collusive practices, misuse of patent privileges, and other toll gates and restraints on the free flow of trade. We ask that all measures within the Federal power be used to check and discourage the development of regional, State, and local trade barriers within the great free-trade area of this Nation.

FARM CREDIT

The need for adequate farm credit is vital to agriculture and a necessary adjunct to the program of national recovery. The farm-credit system should be strengthened, interest rates made as low as possible commensurate with the cost of money, cooperative features of the farm-credit system strengthened and farm-loan associations rehabilitated. Farmer ownership and control should be assured and the control of the Farm Credit Administration should be under an independent bipartisan board. Independent owner operation of our farms must continue to be the basic goal of farm-credit policy.

FARM SECURITY

The position of the especially disadvantaged and underprivileged members of the farm community must continue to receive attention. The work of the Farm Security Administration in the rehabilitation of farm families, aiding tenants to become owners, and in coping with the problems of dispossessed and migrant groups should be continued.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

The task of the future will be one of assuming leadership, already manifested in the negotiation of the reciprocal-trade agreements, for the reconstruction and restoration of world trade. We insist that, if the opportunity arises, this leadership be assumed and pressed vigorously. In the meantime, we must be prepared to recognize changed conditions in international trade and be prepared to meet these new conditions. We draw attention to our large stock of gold and ample credit resources and invite consideration of measures by which these can be used to aid in the reestablishment of world trade.

TRANSPORTATION

Transportation legislation should be limited to such laws as will maintain a highly efficient, economical system of transportation, under private ownership, with only such regulation as may be necessary to assure the public of fair and reasonable rates and a maximum of safety. No law or regulation should be permitted to restrict the inherent or natural advantages of any particular type of transportation where such advantages are reflected to the shipping public in rates and services.

RESEARCH

Recognizing the fact that agriculture is made up of more than 6,000,000 individual, relatively small farms, and is therefore unable to carry on extensive research on an individual farm basis, we insist on continuing support to research by Government agencies in all phases of agriculture. We believe that Federal money for farm research should be spent on a larger scale than has to date been contemplated. We consider research to be complementary to and not a substitute for the farm program.

COORDINATION

In the interest of greater economy, a higher degree of efficiency, the removal of duplication of effort, better understanding and permanency, we recommend such modifications of law or laws as seems necessary to provide for placing the full administrative responsibility of all lines of cooperative farm credit and all types of agricultural commodity programs under the direction of two independent Federal boards properly correlated with the Department of Agriculture.

We view with deep concern the growing tendency of governmental agencies to set up special field personnel to contact farmers every time a new program is to be developed or a new job is to be done. The extension service of our land-grant colleges has definitely proven itself the best qualified agency to carry out the educational work in connection with Federal programs affecting rural people.

We urge that the extension service in the States and counties be utilized as the educational and coordinating agency to contact and assist farmers in planning and carrying out all agricultural programs, exclusive of their regulatory and enforcement aspects, in cooperation with farmer representatives, and that adequate funds be transferred to the extension service in States and counties to provide the necessary personnel for such service.

MONEY

In monetary and banking policy we recognize the uncertainties which now rule in the world and their inevitable effect upon domestic problems. Faced with this situation, we consider it necessary that the President and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System be equipped with broad powers for the management of a properly coordinated monetary and banking policy. These powers, in conjunction with the taxation and expenditure policies of the Government, should be directed toward the achievement of the following objectives: The full utilization of our human and material resources, a stable price level with a dollar of constant debt-paying ability, and an equitable relationship between all parts of the price level. We favor a thorough study by Congress to develop such additional legislation as may be necessary to establish a strong and effective monetary and banking authority to achieve these objectives.

AGRICULTURE, LABOR, AND INDUSTRIAL MANAGEMENT

Agriculture, industrial management, and labor must recognize their common task in producing the abundance of useful goods and services which constitute prosperity. Agriculture in both good times and bad has continued to produce in abundance without regard for price. This is in sharp contrast with other groups, many of which have maintained price at the expense of production. This contrast in practice has resulted in a lack of balance or parity relationship between groups. These price disparities must be overcome. Agriculture challenges industry and labor to join with it in a national program to achieve this goal.

RED CROSS FUNDS

Our hearts go out in sympathy to the millions of homeless and destitute refugees in Europe, the innocent victims of cruel, ruthless aggression. We urge that every possible assistance be extended to them. We strongly favor an immediate appropriation by Congress of $100,000,000 to the American Red Cross to provide food and other needed relief to these unfortunate people.

Is Our Position Clear?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I think no editorial page in the country has contributed more largely to a belief abroad in an ultimate readiness on the part of the United States in certain events to pitch itself into Europe's war than has the Washington Post.

It is something more than heartening to observe, the last two mornings, from the same editorial page, a complete sobering-up process that is being enjoyed or suffered in that office. An editorial under the heading "Is our position clear?", appearing this morning, is deserving of printing in the RECORD; and I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 19, 1940]

IS OUR POSITION CLEAR?

Great Britain now faces the terrible choice of fighting Germany and Italy practically alone, or of making peace with Hitler. The London government will have to make decisions of the most vital moment to the British Isles as well as to the Empire. And those decisions must be made under circumstances that have changed with revolutionary swiftness since Britain declared war on Germany last September.

In this critical period the British are asking, as the French asked in the last hours before their appeal for a cessation of hostilities, what help they can expect from the United States. Their final decision is certain to be influenced by the American response. Therefore our Government has a grave responsibility to inform the British precisely where we stand.

That obligation has become the greater because of the interpretation which the French Government put upon President Roosevelt's message to former Premier Reynaud last week. Following an emergency meeting at Bordeaux, the French Cabinet issued a communiqué in which it said:

"The Government of the United States declares itself resolved to pursue to the utmost the policy of direct assistance to the Allies, which it has recently adopted, and will even develop it to the full extent of its resources, to the exclusion, for the moment, of participation in the conflict. It is for Congress to take such a decision under the terms of the American Constitution."

This statement mistakenly assumes that a Presidential declaration constitutes a governmental decision. It indicates a French belief that the United States has completely abandoned its neutral status and is close to a declaration of war on Germany. Are the British now making their decisions under a similar false assumption? That question should give the White House the utmost concern.

The Government of Great Britain knows, as that of France knew, that in the struggle against Nazi aggression it has the full sympathy of the American people. Mr. Winston Churchill knows that, on orders from the British Government, American industry is turning out valuable military equipment for its defense. Moreover, the United States is trading in some military supplies so that they may be sold by private corporations to British purchasing agents. This policy of giving indirect aid to the British has overwhelming popular support, and such cash sales are likely to be increased as the production of airplane factories and munitions plants is stepped up.

The British people must not be misled, however, into assuming from this that the United States is likely to enter the war. The resolve of the American people to avoid participation in this struggle is exceedingly strong. Even if it were less so, the self-imposed task of defending all the Western Hemisphere would necessitate a cautious policy with regard to involvement in the European conflict, and that is particularly true at a time when our preparations for national defense are just getting under way.

The question is whether or not the actualities of American policy in this critical period have been made clear at London. It seems indisputable that President Roosevelt gave France a misleading impression of the policy Congress has endorsed. It is clear that the French did not attempt to direct their course on the basis of the assurances they believed our Government had given them. But that does not minimize the necessity of correcting an interpretation that does not square with the facts.

It is well to remember, at this juncture, the criticisms and bitterness aroused in Europe when Congress refused to underwrite President Wilson's policy with regard to American membership in the League of Nations.

Unemployment

REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD today an address by Mr. J. H. Harnly before the Rotary Club at the Biltmore Hotel in Los Angeles on the matter of unemployment. This group of men, who were too proud to accept relief, worked out their problem in a very satisfactory manner with reference to sustaining themselves and with reference to their employment. I believe they are leading the way and can show many cities how the unemployed can be taken care of without going on direct taxation. I suggest you read it. Thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. President, members of the Rotary Club, guests, and visitors, the world's greatest teacher, Jesus, the Christ, in an executive conference with his disciples, closed by saying: "I have yet many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now, howbeit when He the Spirit of Truth is come He will lead you into all truth—know the truth, and the truth will make you free."

I take it that it is a Rotary cardinal principle to exchange experiences incident to your various occupations that you may be of better and greater service in both private and public life relative to true freedom, and my authority for addressing you is to share my unique experiences with you relative to the general welfare.

A real cleavage in the successful revolutionary party for American independence became apparent during the formation and adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and has stupidly persisted with ever-increasing insolence in a joint subversive front of modern political shysters that again threatens us with both State and National disaster. So I come to you as an advocate of sane jurisprudence and economy—the historic "Square deal and fair play" for traditional American free enterprise, ingenuity and integrity.

President Washington's first executive duty was to organize the democratic procedure of the federated States, under their National Constitution, into a functioning republic, and, he had the invaluable wisdom to appoint both the conservative but liberal minded federalist, Alexander Hamilton, and the liberal but conservative minded antifederalist, Thomas Jefferson, to his Council of State. The first United States Congress had the further wisdom to petition the preeminent Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, to prepare a revenue-producing treatise, involving protected free American enterprise and labor, relative to the collective financing of both public and private affairs consistent with the general welfare of progressive, free Americans in establishing their national independence against arrogant European exploitation. During the same formative period the diplomatic country gentleman, Thomas Jefferson, eminent Secretary of State, successfully wrestled with the complicated questions of international relations.

No economist or publicist has been able to improve Hamilton's invaluable thesis on protected American industry and free enterprise relative to both public and private collective finance, but the master minds of Clay, Webster, and Sumner consistently defended it in the Senate, and ex-President John Quincy Adams, in the House of Representatives, against the subversive endeavors of Aaron Burr, father of Tammany Hall, and the "Little Magician," Martin Van Buren, and their political spoilsmen. One hundred years ago Negro slavery was the subversive issue that brought the union of States to the brink of disaster and temporary disunion, but inspired patriotic moral rearmament and forced a coalition of Hamiltonian conservatives, Jeffersonian liberals, Jacksonian commoners, and Whig progressives for the support of the Republican Commoner, Abraham Lincoln, and the preservation of the Union and the conservation of American free enterprise. President Lincoln abolished the institution of slavery, but our economy of production and distribution is again in jeopardy and free enterprise terrorized by political paternalism and sophisticated exploitation, but again a Lincolnian coalition of free Americans is forming the vanguard for economic freedom and progressive enterprise through collective self-employment and coordinated work with free comprehensive industry.

The thesis of our self-employment is the free coordination of collective jobless labor with American enterprise and comprehensive industry for abundant surplus production, and relative bountiful distribution in kind, as the only logical solution for unemployed employables. The employable active members to care for the unemployable associate members in return for commensurate headquarters, utilities and gasoline through public funds. This facilitates economic freedom of distribution with liberty of production, relative to the commonwealth and general welfare of our citizens compatible with free American enterprise and labor.

Intelligent administration of collectively owned self-help industrial enterprise involving buildings and equipment, cash and contributary assets, goodwill and pay jobs, and compensation in kind for work-hour production, anticipates bountiful distribution of bread, milk, vegetables, and fruit; clothing and fuel; shelter and meals. That is certainly the economic solution for unemployment and rehabilitation. This has been thoroughly demonstrated through 8 years of successful achievement by the Unemployment Citizens' League of Santa Monica, sponsoring work-hour production and distribution in kind to all comers regardless of age, creed, race, or citizenship, and has never been without plentiful work for all jobless employables or unemployables, transients or indigents. This is a monumental rebuke to bureaucratic, politically subversive paternalism, costing California millions of dollars every month and the taxpayers for the Nation billions of dollars every year, most of which is worse than wasted in the midst of plenty to do through intelligent cooperation and coordinated work with free American enterprise and industry.

Individually we were jobless, without work, economic liabilities. Collectively we have coordinated, abundant work, are an economic asset, potent, helpful, independent, commending coordination with industrial enterprise, commercial ingenuity and professional and civic integrity, which propels our world of culture and affairs, the inevitable factors and invaluable benefactors in our united endeavor to achieve economic social security.

Eight years ago a few of us were gathering vegetables and fruit left in the fields and orchards because it did not pay the owners to save and market them, and in July 1932 we organized and secured an abandoned lumber yard and its office and buildings for our collective self-help endeavors, and comprehensive coordination with free private enterprise and industry. Public-spirited bakeries exchanged their surplus bread for the coordinated labor of the self-help league—two to five thousand loaves every week, 600,000 loaves from the Continental Bakery alone in 8 years.

The dairies exchange milk and its products—the Edgemar Farm Dairy 100,000 gallons of milk in less than 8 years. The gardens and markets exchange, vegetables; the orchards and packing houses, fruit; and the ranchers, potatoes. A grand total of over 7,000,000 pounds of bread, milk, potatoes, vegetables, melons, and fruit have been brought into our lumber-yard headquarters through coordinated, collective labor since July 1932, and distributed to more than 5,000 active and associate members and their 10,000 dependents, hundreds of them over 70 years of age, while State and national maladministration through cash doles and bonuses is supporting younger employables in arrogant idleness and political insolence, threatening both private and public affairs with bankruptcy and anarchy. You Rotarians with more or less patronizing courtesy are listening to this 74-year-old educator, professional accountant, auditor, and publicist, relative to the achievements of the self-employed in California As publicity director I interested the New Republic in publishing an article relative to the Santa Monica Cooperative last January 15, which was rewritten for the February Readers Digest. We also have a comprehensive write-up in the book published by the University Press at Berkeley, and another by Ed Ainsworth in the magazine section of the Sunday Times. These can be seen in your public library, but what is still better you can visit our headquarters and observe our practical achievement for yourself. But as a Hamiltonian conservative and loose-construction constitutionalist, as a Jeffersonian liberal and strict constructionist, as a Jacksonian commoner and Lincoln unionist, I certainly am more concerned about your collective attitude toward our accumulative social and economic problem than you can possibly be about mine.

But let me continue with my coordinated, cooperative thesis. The wardrobes of the independent who have, supply their partly worn shoes, hats, and clothing for our dependents who have not—their buildings, shelter, and utilities, gas, light, and water. It is coordinated enterprise that educates our children, pensions the aged, and cares for the indigent. It builds our roads, gives us fire, police, and sanitary protection, and maintains our beneficent institutions as collective self-help blazes the economic way to rehabilitation in every community of the American Commonwealth.

Bountiful production for the favored few anticipates coordinated, balanced production and distribution for all. The jobless who can and ought to work are our greatest potential resource, and local self-help industry the logical solution for reemployment and rehabilitation—blazing the economic, Santa Monica way, in the economy of God for the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world. Our creed is service; our faith work. Let the 100,000 employables on cash relief in California do what the 100 unemployables but experienced leaders of the Unemployment Cooperative Distribution Association of Los Angeles County are doing to keep off relief, and the accumulative failure of subversive paternalism will end, saving you Rotarian and other taxpayers of California millions of dollars every month.

Our necessary cash is derived from taking down trees and selling wood, wrecking buildings and selling salvaged lumber and kindling, gathering and selling junk and old papers, doing odd jobs, and in many other minor ways. This enabled us to erect seven buildings and purchase thousands of dollars worth of equipment, which we hold in trust for succeeding followers of our local cooperative, and we object to having our unequaled, economic, free enterprise, and achievement subverted into a vicious economy of production-for-use State socialism by political racketeers. We have sleeping quarters for 60 people and serve more than 5,000 meals a month—hundreds to transients sent to us by our city.

We publicly invite judicious investigation by boards of supervisors, chambers of commerce, and public-spirited civic and service groups so that intelligent, patriotic pressure can be brought upon the State administration and legislature to stop supporting employables in idleness, and adopt our alternative to county, State, and national bankruptcy, coordinated work in the midst of plenty to do.

The United States, under judicial constitutional procedure, has become the foremost government of the world by successfully mastering subversive tendencies through four well-defined periods of our national development: From Washington to Jackson, Federal; from Jackson to Lincoln, anti-Federal, ending in temporary disunion; from Lincoln to McKinley, national; and from McKinley to F. D. Roosevelt, international, and again involving temporary maladjustment.

And since the subversive forces, inspired by the sophisticated Howard Scott, the academic Norman Thomas, and the Communist Earl Browder, are presenting a united front, it behooves the progressive, patriotic, true Americans in every religious, every social, every fraternal, every cultural, commercial, and civic public-spirited organization to unite and overpower the premeditated maladministration of public affairs. The economic and civic integrity of our Commonwealth is in jeopardy as long as there are employable persons politically subverted by a cash dole or bonus. Finally, the logical cure for unemployment and poverty is work in the midst of plenty to do through collective coordination with American free enterprise.

Public Opinion on Peace and War

REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, the momentous issues of war and peace again confront the Nation. In the face of conflicting evidence, of contradictory reports, and inspired releases, the thoughtful American is at a distinct disadvantage. He is at a particular disadvantage in attempting to appraise the significance of the public-opinion polls conducted by the American Institute of Public Opinion and Fortune Magazine, for these polls take root in the magic of statistics.

Eight years ago statisticians predicted the downfall of the Literary Digest Presidential poll. Their predictions were drowned out by the inspired releases which emanated from the editors of the Literary Digest. In glowing words the Literary Digest editors described the uncanny accuracy of their polls. The Literary Digest is no more, but this same uncritical self-appraisal of public-opinion polls has built up a psychology of success which makes it almost impossible to dispute the claims of Gallup and Fortune concerning the accuracy of their polls. Anyone who has the courage to question these claims is at once branded as an obstructer of progress. The word of the day is "believe."

The more thoughtful have reason to ask questions. Only recently newspapers carried accounts of the difficulty which attended the enumeration of various citizens. The census, which is older than any living American, experienced difficulty in attempting to obtain complete cooperation from the public. Such difficulties do not seem to attend the efforts of Dr. Gallup's interviewers, for, according to his statements, representatives of his for 4 years were able to secure the most sacred opinions from a cross section of the public. In the face of such contradictions, a complete examination of the accuracy of public-opinion polls is necessary. Such an examination is imperative in view of the wide acceptance of these polls not only by the public but by legislators who quote them as authority.

During the next few weeks we shall learn whether party-nominating conventions are poll controlled or people controlled. Will they be the victims of the polls or the representatives of the people?

There are things in the Presidential campaign which cause the intelligent American voter to entertain some doubts as to the ability of democracy to select its leader. The preposterous claims to strength of certain inexperienced, and entirely untested, prospective candidates could not have been advanced a few years ago without immediately reacting unfavorably because of public ridicule. Now, those claims are kept before the people through the published polls. Since a claim to consideration for the Presidency is something which concerns us all, why not provide by legislation that the Congress, through a committee, be given an opportunity to learn just how those polls were taken and what is back of the claims to popular support of each candidate. The most astonishing thing in the whole situation is the fact that serious commentators quote the polls just as if they were quoting elections in which the universality and privacy of the ballot had been used to indicate public choice of candidates.

No one expects to curb advertising. No one expects through legislation to control the credulity of the reading public, and nothing can take the place of the final ballot at the general election. An editorial in one of the leading papers, recently, commenting on polls of public opinion said that the pollers who have given such positive results must either stand up and accuse the Republican convention of being flagrantly unresponsive to the will of the people, or that they must confess that their methods or calculations were wrong. I have pointed out in several speeches that there is no way of being certain of the accuracy of the polls but that the public welfare demands that their methods be studied and their records be opened to the Congress, just as the records of the utilities are open to the S. E. C. and the records of the railroads open to the I. C. C., on the assumption that the public has a stake in their operations.

At the present moment when public opinion is of the utmost importance and when feelings are rising almost to a frenzy, it is more urgent than it has ever been that the Congress should investigate and understand this new agency for creating public opinion. We must know what is the majority and what is the minority, speaking about war and defense policies. We shall probably learn it without the intervention of advertising agencies, but the agencies and the public ought now to unite in an effort to have the records opened to those Members of this Congress who are vitally concerned with public opinion in regard to the most important matters which have ever been before the citizens of this democracy.

I have pending before this House a resolution providing for a joint committee to investigate the conducting of polls purporting to measure public opinion with respect to questions or issues of national legislative concern, or national elections. I am assured by those who are in the polling business that they have no objections to such an investigation. It hardly seems necessary again to urge its immediate importance. I recently contributed to a symposium on this subject a brief statement on the band-wagon vote. I ask permission to incorporate my article from the Public Opinion Quarterly in my remarks to be printed in the RECORD. The article follows:

WHAT ABOUT THE BAND-WAGON VOTE?

Nation-wide polls, especially those taken by an advertising firm having Nation-wide newspaper connections, are a matter of national concern. Such polls have become a strong influence in connection with legislation and with candidacies. They are recognized as a potent, if not the most powerful, agency now used to influence public opinion. They have been copied locally by newspapers and propaganda groups. Certain polls are widely quoted in legislative bodies where their validity and correctness of interpretation are assumed. It now appears to be the duty of legislative bodies to appraise and understand the methods used in polling public opinion, to measure the actual and potential results, and to consider the possible dangers of an uncontrolled, private manipulation of public opinion for financial profit. It is claimed that the polls represent a cross section of the voters and that the results are subjected to scientific handling, so that deductions are a trustworthy guide to public opinion. I have been led to believe that public opinion is, very naturally, influenced by these polls, and that they create opinion rather than measure it. The fairness of the polls may be open to question, regardless of the integrity and ability of the pollers. The selection of the questions, the way in which they are formulated, and the approach to the individual may be used to create a certain reaction in the person polled. I am convinced that voters like to climb onto the band wagon and that polls greatly increase the band-wagon vote.

I am aware that this may not seem to reflect most creditably upon the intelligence of those who are, en masse, the bulwark of our democracy; but we can improve conditions only by first facing the facts. I know there are sturdy characters among us, men and women who form their own opinions and fight for them to the last ditch, voting regardless of results. I fear their total number is a small percentage, not sufficient to change the result in a closely contested election.

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS

Since I have been a Member of the Congress I have had several bills pending on the subject of straw ballots. In the days of the Literary Digest, I believed I had very startling evidence of collusion between the Digest poll takers and those interested in the results, so my early legislation was aimed at forbidding the use of the mails to those taking straw ballots. My recent effort has been a joint resolution creating a committee of five Senators and five Representatives "to investigate the conducting of polls purporting to measure public opinion with respect to questions or issues which have or may have a bearing upon any election held to fill any office under the Government of the United States, with special reference to the manner of framing questions contained in ballots or inquiries, the methods of selecting persons to whom ballots or inquiries are sent, and the reasons for conducting such polls."

The Rules Committee recently granted me a hearing upon this resolution, but, to date, the appointment of a committee has not been authorized. I am aware that congressional investigations become obnoxious when overdone, and that Members of Congress very easily tire of them and are loath to provide organization and funds for another investigation which may drag on endlessly. It has been my understanding that some of the polling firms would very much welcome an opportunity to tell a congressional committee about their business and their methods. I believe the public would be better satisfied if this could be done.

VOTING FOR THE WINNER

I recall an incident occurring in the election of 1916 which well illustrates the influence of the band-wagon vote-for-the-winner theory. It happened in Portland, Oreg., where nearly 40 percent of the voting strength of the State lies, in the presidential election when the candidates were Hughes and Wilson. Voting had been light during the morning of election day. At 2 o'clock the Oregon Journal, a paper which had waged an apparently successful campaign for Wilson, came out with banner headlines, "Hughes elected." A subheading ran something like this: "Hughes carries Atlantic border." The time was then 5 o'clock in New York City from whence the news had come. Immediately Wilson supporters who had not yet voted in Portland thought, "Well, what's the use? Hughes is surely elected." Thousands did not vote at all, others switched their votes to Hughes, who carried the State by a margin of about 6,000 votes. Thus the Portland Journal, having waged a strong campaign for Wilson, inadvertently defeated him, in Oregon, in the closing hours of the campaign by a headline transmitting news from New York City.

The Literary Digest poll in 1924 undoubtedly gave Coolidge a million votes he would not have received had it not been for an opinion-molding poll, one which created a belief in the minds of many voters that Coolidge was a sure winner. In 1928 the effect was not quite as marked, but the Literary Digest poll unquestionably added to Hoover's majority. In 1936 the Literary Digest sang its swan song, and was so inaccurate that it committed suicide. Unquestionably many of the polls taken today are just as inaccurate in measuring public opinion. Someone may raise the question, "If polls are so influential in the matter of public opinion, why, then, did not the Literary Digest poll of 1936 defeat Roosevelt?" Eighty percent of the press had filled their columns for weeks with reasons why Roosevelt should not and would not be reelected. Radio voices had predicted his defeat. Why, then, did he win? The answer is that Roosevelt in 1936 was just unbeatable, and that he was elected by the grateful masses, who are never polled.

YOU CAN'T BEAT HIM

I have found from actual experience reaching over a half century of public life that the strongest argument I can make and that my friends can make for me is that I am sure to win. "You can't beat him." That makes more votes, brings more sentiment and support on election day than any other argument which can be put forth. It has been said, and I think truly, that one-fifth of all the voters try to pick a winner. It is said that another one-fifth pick their man on name familiarity. Think of the last time you stood in a voting booth, pencil in hand, scanning a long list of names. Did your pencil just automatically make a cross opposite the name of the candidate you thought would win, or the name with which you were most familiar?

I have seen public opinion in small towns changed at the last minute by polls taken in cigar stores, pool rooms, and barber shops. If a candidate is unscrupulously inclined, and has plenty of money, he can have friends take polls of picked sections and groups of people, then have his own organization manipulate the results and draw the desired conclusions from them. By giving the whole proceeding an air of respectability, authenticity, and fair dealing, he can influence the results of an entire election. The candidate whose name is omitted from the poll finds himself in a very dangerous position. Such treatment is tantamount to a widespread belief that his candidacy is negligible.

Americans have come to feel that they must protect the sacredness of the ballot. This is one of our traditions, and we have enacted into law the necessary means of protection. We must also take steps to overcome the effects of powerful subsidized propaganda which is now a controlling factor in election of candidates and in legislation on measures of momentous public concern.

Keynote Address Before Mississippi State Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. G. GARLAND LYELL, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following keynote address delivered by Hon. G. Garland Lyell, of Jackson, Miss., before the Mississippi State Democratic convention, Jackson, Miss., June 11, 1940, to wit:

This is no time for words unless they are translated into action. The laws of God and man have been and are being ignored and flaunted by dictators of European warring nations and the "fifth columns" here and abroad. These dictators are never so pleased as when violating their solemn treaties and pledged words and when raining their hell of shot and shell and poison gas upon God-fearing and God-loving helpless men, women, and children. The sacrifice of the blood of these innocent victims but whets the appetites of these inhuman and fiendish tigers to shed all the blood of all worth-while humanity to further satiate their thirst for more blood and still more blood. Their only god is hate and their only desire is to continue to rape, murder, and to destroy all that we have been taught to believe and know to be sacred in the sight of good men and a just God. The churches and temples of the Almighty have been profaned and destroyed while his prayerful worshippers upon bended knee cry out in their anguish: "My God! My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

The only regret and disappointment these inhuman fiends have is that they have not been able as yet to extend their withering "blitzkrieg" beyond wrecked and ruined European homes, schools, churches, and orphanages and hospitals, beyond the battlements of heaven itself and blast Almighty God himself from his throne and let Hitler rule as King of Kings and Lord of Lords, and let the deadly bombing planes fly through the heavens to destroy the angelic hosts and banish forever peace on earth and good will to men. Mankind is being crucified by these arch fiends and murderers. Every home of the humblest followers of the lowly Nazarene is being converted into a never-ending Gethsemane where murderous tanks, shot and shell, gas and incendiary bombs blast and destroy innocent babes, no longer lulled to peaceful sleep by holy lullabies of their mother's love, but their little bodies shattered and blasted from the arms and heart of that mother who gave them birth.

Czechoslovakia, Austria, Poland, Finland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland have been engulfed in the flaming jaws of the most bestial Moloch of all time and eternity, and fair France and God-fearing, law-respecting England are being blasted and blighted by murder from the skies and upon many battlefields as they strive to resist dictators whose only god is an armed and murderous might that feeds upon the pure blood of the children of God, and whose pincer-like jaws have closed upon millions whose innocent blood will never satiate a thirst for gore that is confined to people across the seas. Those man-eating sharks are just as thirsty for the blood of Americans.

Now what are we going to do about it?

What is our duty to the Americas; and to make sure that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth?

Abraham Lincoln, who uttered those immortal words, also said: "Determine that the thing can and shall be done, and then find the way."

This situation in world affairs challenges the heart and soul of the United States and of every loyal and patriotic American. We should not tolerate for long any "fifth column" or anyone who is disloyal or not loyal. He who is not for us is against us, and hell is too cool a place for such traitors. We have not imposed upon any minority. There is no Sudetenland in the United States. We will not stand up against a wall and put to death by firing squad, or private assassination, anyone who does no violence by word or deed to our beloved America in which he lives and which supports him and gives him a chance in this land of equality of opportunity. But, by the gods, no unpatriotic citizen of this democratic America can be guilty of treason and sedition and go unpunished. No one crying for free speech may use that speech to undermine our institutions and laws and give comfort to an enemy, domestic or foreign. The only red in our flag is that of pure patriotic undefiled Americanism.

"Flag of the free heart's hope and home,
By angel hands to valour given,
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all their hues were born in heaven!
Forever wave that standard sheet,
Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet
And Freedom's banner streaming o'er us?"

No flag of a "fifth column," or other enemy within our gates, shall be permitted to prostitute that color by flaunting in the air of this land of the free and home of the brave, a flag that would seek to supplant the Stars and Stripes; to supplant patriotism by Hitlerism, fascism, communism, or any other "ism" that would overturn our form of government and give aid and comfort to our enemies. There is no middle ground, no neutral zone, no room in this country for anything but 100-percent Americanism.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recently decided that the regulation of Minersville, Pa., school board requiring school children to salute the United States flag was constitutional.

We may safely trust the sound sense and judgment of true Americans to prevent undue excitement and alarm over present conditions in our own country, but the man who cannot see and observe these vicious forces at work in the United States is blind and dumb. It is the duty of every patriotic American to keep his eyes and ears open to see and hear any threat of danger from such sources. These pernicious influences are not only secretly at work but they are out in the open. It may be too late to save America if such people are permitted to form their "fifth columns" and regiment them to carry on war against our institutions within our own gates. They not only plot and plan behind closed doors to overthrow this Government, but they come out in the open. America must wake up and stay awake.

We must remember that the emblem of this Republic is an eagle and not an ostrich hiding its head in the sands. From the deepest valleys to the loftiest crags, we should see and know what is going on in this Republic. Only a few days ago in New York City the Communist Party held its national convention. Its general secretary, Earl Browder, was lavish in his praise of Soviet Russia as the "only one really neutral great power" in the world today, and that it was the protector of weak nations; he said it was a "beacon light" of the working class. Browder asked: "Who are the 'fifth columns' in the United States?" He shouted in answer to his own question, "Martin Dies, the Roosevelt administration, and the Republican Party leadership."

The platform adopted by the Communists at the New York convention promised opposition to all war loans and credits to the warring imperialist powers; to stop the sale and shipment of armaments and munitions to the belligerents; and to resist the militarization and armaments program of the administration and Congress. Twenty-two thousand Communists in Madison Square Garden at the end of a boisterous session adopted a platform that is an insult to Americanism, if not treasonable. With red faces they waved their red flags and wound up by nominating for President of the United States Earl Browder, who is out on bail pending an appeal from his conviction and 4-year sentence for passport fraud. The Vice Presidential candidate, a fit running mate for him, is an Alabama Negro named James William Ford.

What a stench in the nostrils of decent, patriotic Americans is the poison gas turned loose at that Communist convention.

The pure and wholesome atmosphere of this democracy should not be contaminated with such foul and deadly gases.

Let us remember that in the American melting pot and in the birth and perpetuity of America many patriotic people of foreign birth have played a splendid part. We owe a debt of gratitude to all persons, whether foreign-born or native-born Americans, who have contributed in a proper way to carrying out and exemplifying to the world the principles of true Americanism. But that person, whether native or foreign born, who lives within the confines of this Republic and does not conform to and support its institutions, its laws, and the principles upon which it is founded is, in the last analysis, a contemptible ingrate and a dangerous traitor.

Since the outbreak of the war, boundary lines have oscillated upon the map, always extending the territory engulfed by the war machine of the dictator. As the ruthless invaders have blasted their way into these innocent victim countries, they have been welcomed with open arms by perfidious traitors heading "fifth columns" in such countries.

America is aroused. On Thursday, May 17, a special defense message was delivered by that patriotic American, Franklin D. Roosevelt, now President of the United States, and who will become, almost by acclamation, the next President of the United States. President Roosevelt said to the Congress of the United States:

"These are ominous days—days whose swift and shocking developments force every neutral nation to look to its defenses in the light of new factors. The brutal force of modern offensive war has been loosed in all its horror.

"New powers of destruction, incredibly swift and deadly, have been developed, and those who wield them are ruthless and daring.

"No old defense is so strong that it requires no further strengthening and no attack is so unlikely or impossible that it may be ignored.

"Let us examine, without self-deception, the dangers which confront us. Let us measure our strength and our defense without self-delusion.

"The clear fact is that the American people must recast their thinking about national protection.

"Motorized armies can now sweep through enemy territories at the rate of 200 miles a day.

"Parachute troops are dropped from airplanes in large numbers behind enemy lines. Troops are landed from planes in open fields, on wide highways, and at local civil airports.

"We have seen the treacherous use of the 'fifth column' by which persons supposed to be peaceful visitors were actually a part of an enemy unit of occupation. Lightning attacks capable of destroying airplane factories and munitions works hundreds of miles behind the lines are part of the new technique of modern war.

"The element of surprise which has ever been an important tactic in warfare has become the more dangerous because of the amazing speed with which modern equipment can reach and attack the enemy country.

"There are some who say that democracy cannot cope with the new techniques of government developed in recent years by a few countries—by a few countries which deny the freedom which we maintain are essential to our democratic way of life. This I reject.

"I know that our trained officers and men know more about fighting and the weapons and equipment needed for fighting than any of us laymen, and I have confidence in them.

"I know that to cope with present dangers we must be strong in heart and hand; strong in our faith; strong in faith in our way of living.

"I, too, pray for peace, that the ways of aggression and force may be banished from the earth; but I am determined to face the fact realistically that this Nation requires a toughness of moral and physical fiber. Those qualities, I am convinced, the American people hold to a high degree.

"Our task is plain. The road we must take is clearly indicated. Our defenses must be invulnerable, our security absolute. But our defense as it was yesterday, or even as it is today, does not provide security against potential developments and dangers of the future.

"Defense cannot be static. Defense must grow and change from day to day. Defense must be dynamic and flexible, an expression of the vital forces of the Nation and of its resolute will to meet whatever challenge the future may hold. For these reasons, I need hardly assure you that after the adjournment of this session of Congress I will not hesitate to call the Congress into special session if at any time the situation of the national defense requires it. The Congress and the Chief Executive constitute a team where the defense of the land is concerned.

"Our ideal, our objective, is still peace—peace at home and peace abroad. Nevertheless, we stand ready not only to spend millions for defense but to give our service and even our lives for the maintenance of our American liberties.

"Our security is not a matter of weapons alone. The arm that wields them must be strong; the eye that guides them clear; the will that directs them indomitable.

"These are the characteristics of a free people, a people devoted to the institutions they themselves have built, a people willing to defend a way of life that is precious to them all, a people who put their faith in God."

The Governors of our sovereign States have spoken in unmistakable fashion. On June 3 at Duluth, Minn., 19 chief executives attending the National Governors' Convention overturned a 32-year-old tradition of not announcing any conclusions as a result of their discussions and approved a statement to the effect that "since there exists in the world today a crisis brought on by ruthless and unprovoked aggression which respects neither the territorial integrity, the sovereign rights, nor the peaceful intentions of neutral states and seems to threaten the very existence of democracy itself, and since it has been clearly and unmistakably demonstrated time after time within recent weeks that such aggression undertakes and respects only force, and that nations unprepared and consequently unable to defend themselves are speedily and without warning overrun, subjugated, and destroyed, and, since the Governors assembled in this conference are not only the civil administrators of the several States but are commanders in chief of the National Guards and have a grave responsibility for the effectiveness of this and other important units of our national defense.

"It is therefore the consensus of opinion of this conference, in view of the situation confronting our common country, that all necessary steps should be taken immediately to provide adequately and effectively for the defense of these United States, and each State pledges her resources, agricultural, industrial, and military, to that end."

In a matchless address delivered on May 13 to the American Society of International Law at its thirty-fourth annual meeting in Washington City, our great Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, urged a faith in international law and a return to national morality and respect for law. May I quote parts of that profound and patriotic utterance:

"It is no exaggeration to say that never before, in the entire history of the human race, has the problem of the preservation and development of order under law presented itself with such urgent acuteness. Never before has it been so fraught with import for the future of mankind.

"The concept and the structure of a law of nations rose and evolved out of a spirit of protest against the ravages of international anarchy. In the ancient world and during the Dark Ages of the modern world, there widely prevailed a concept that each nation was a law unto itself, the sole arbiter of its international conduct, fully entitled, if it possessed sufficient strength, to engage in aggression and aggrandizement, to destroy by armed force the independence of other nations and to subjugate other peoples. Force reigned supreme; human liberty, national independence, confidence in safety and security on the part of nations and individuals were in constant jeopardy.

"Today mankind is the unhappy victim of another challenge of this sort—a powerful challenge which threatens to wipe out the achievements of centuries in the development of international law and to destroy the very foundations of orderly international relationships. In the face of this challenge, it is of the utmost importance that every citizen visualize clearly the cardinal features of international law and of order based on law, as well as the conditions which would prevail if they were destroyed.

"The specter of a new descent into the conditions of international anarchy which characterized the Dark Ages looms on the horizon today. I am profoundly convinced that it menaces the civilized existence of mankind, of every nation, and of every individual. Every nation and every individual should be actively on guard.

"Our own Nation—powerful as it is and determined as it is to remain at peace, to preserve its cherished institutions and to promote the welfare of its citizens—is not secure against that menace. We cannot shut it out by attempting to isolate and insulate ourselves. We cannot be certain of safety and security when a large part of the world outside our borders is dominated by the forces of international lawlessness.

"We cannot close our eyes to what is going on elsewhere in the world and delude ourselves with the mere hope that somehow—somehow—all wars will pass us by. Never in our national history has there been a more desperate need for a clear understanding by every responsible citizen of our country of what is taking place in the world and of how it affects us. Such understanding is essential to a wise charting and application of our national policies. Under our system of government, it is the most effective safeguard for the maintenance and promotion of the national interest.

"The world today is torn by conflicts, the outcome of which will affect the lives of the future generations in all countries. The world today is threatened with an orgy of destruction—not only of life and property, but of religion, of morality, of the very basis of civilized society. The spread of international anarchy not only undermines law, justice, and morality among nations, but also inevitably impairs, within nations, these essential foundations of civilized existence.

"In the fact of existing conditions, we have no choice but to expand our program of armament construction to a degree necessary to provide fully adequate means of defending this country's security and its rightful interests. But if mankind is to avoid a long-continuing period of chaos and retrogression, it can only be through the firm establishment of order under law. Never before has there been a greater need for our people to place the support of a wholly united public opinion behind our Nation's efforts to exert the great weight of its moral influence in favor of a revindication and revitalization of the basic principles of order under law, which alone can give lasting insurance of safety, security, and peace.

"Upon those of us who devote their lives to the improvement and application of international law there devolves today a special duty. It is our task to help our fellow citizens to a better realization of the crucial importance which preservation of international law and of order based on law has for them and for their country. It is our task to make the immense significance of international law a living reality in the mind and heart of every American.

"While doing this, we should constantly and persistently search for ways and means of strengthening the structure of international law and of making more effective the translation of its principles into firmly established international practice. We should spare no effort to demonstrate that the spirit which has made possible, over the centuries, immense forward strides in the development of international law still lives.

"Stunned by the cruel events which unfold all around them, millions of men and women have become a prey to doubt, hopelessness, and despair. It is all the more necessary for us, who believe in the eternal vitality of international law and of international morality, to hold fast to the conviction that law and morality will triumph over the forces of lawlessness and chaos which have again risen to challenge the very concept of order under law—just as they have in the past triumphed over similar challenges. I am certain of that triumph. I am certain that we and others who hold our beliefs will not falter in that faith or fail to do everything possible to restore and extend the full sway of effective international law over relations among nations."

The duties and responsibilities of all patriotic Mississippians and of this Mississippi Democratic convention are obvious. You may be relied upon at all times safely to measure up to that duty and responsibility. Your unselfish patriotism and love of your State and Nation bring you here today from every county of our beloved Commonwealth. You will adopt appropriate resolutions at this convention, that will reflect your loyalty to democratic principles and to the Democratic Party, but above and beyond all that they will give to this Nation and to the world your patriotic challenge and your love and devotion to this Republic and to our great American Government. Your resolutions will reflect love of country and a pure patriotism that should motivate the private and official life and conduct of every loyal American. You may be relied upon to choose loyal and patriotic Mississippians to represent this State at the National Democratic Convention. And you and other patriots from other States will draft a platform that will be pure and patriotic in word and in ideals. It will pledge anew the loyalty of the Democratic Party to this Nation, and it will invite the active cooperation and best thought of all other loyal Americans, whether Democrats or not.

The national convention will wisely resolve and wisely choose its leaders. Only one question appears to be decided. And that is who will be the Democratic nominee for the Vice Presidency. With one voice and with one mind and in perfect accord this convention and the Democratic National Convention will select as the stalwart champion of Democratic principles, ideals, and exalted patriotism and the voters of this country will in due course elect for another 4-year term, that great American, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

With his knowledge of world affairs, and his grasp of all problems at home and abroad, he will lead this great Nation as the triumphant and everlasting pure democracy that will continue through the ages to serve its people and show forth to the world a government of law and order and a service and blessing to humanity.

The record of the present Democratic administration is familiar to all.

We may safely rely upon the correction for the future of any mistakes that may have been made, and to continue those policies which have stood the test of operative experience.

One thing we do know is that the State of Mississippi has wielded a powerful influence in national affairs and has received more benefit than at any other period of its history.

Patriotic Republicans will rally to the support of proper measures for the good of the Nation and for protecting it against those persons and influences that would cause its downfall.

We are a government of parties, but in this great emergency party lines will be largely forgotten in rallying to the support of President Roosevelt, who will most assuredly be renominated and elected.

Let us reconsecrate ourselves for the discharge of the duties that lie before us. Let pure patriotism and unselfish ambition characterize our daily lives. With undying faith in our country and in our God this Nation shall not perish from this earth.

Yesterday bloodthirsty Mussolini joined the murderous Hitler in the welter of blood, and the night grows blacker still. But let us hope and pray and remember it is always blackest before the dawn of a brighter and better day.

"God give us men: a time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinion and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagog
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty, and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo; Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land and waiting Justice sleeps."

See to it that none but true, patriotic, and loyal Americans be in positions of trust and confidence. Banish selfishness and profiteering; let labor and capital each try to outdo the other in patriotic service. Then indeed will this Nation show forth to the world a patriotism pure and undefiled "that will gird this Commonwealth with the resistless splendor of the moral law, the invulnerable panoply of States, the celestial secret of a great nation and a happy people."

"The Lord of Hosts is with us. The God of Jacob is our refuge."

Finland Pays—Heroic Nation Cradles Freedom and Keeps Its Word

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I introduced House Joint Resolution 561, authorizing the postponement of the amounts payable to the United States by the Republic of Finland on its indebtedness under agreements between that Republic and the United States dated May 1, 1923, and May 23, 1932. A similar Senate resolution has now passed both Houses of the Congress and has been signed by the President. The purpose of this resolution was to recognize the fine spirit and integrity of Finland in being the only one of our World War debtor nations to keep its word. Owing to the stress confronting Finland at the present time, due to the recent war forced upon it, it seemed proper out of a spirit of fair play that the United States should at least postpone these payments to a time that they might be met more advantageously by Finland. However, on June 15, 1940, the Minister of Finland delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury a check for $159,398, being full payment of the installment due on its war debt. I took occasion to say in this House recently that when the annals of our times shall have been written there will be no more heart-gripping record than that of heroic little Finland, fighting against overpowering odds in defense of her firesides and civilization—fighting to hold back the hordes of barbarism threatening to engulf her. It may be said Finland lost the contest, but she won the enduring gratitude, admiration, and respect of the civilized world. From all the pages of history we find no record surpassing the outstanding heroism, courage, and indomitable defense of home of the fighting men and women of Finland. Civilization for all time is enriched by Finland's unsurpassed accomplishment.

Mr. Speaker, on March 20, 1940, Hjalmar J. Procope, Minister of Finland, said, at Richmond, Va.:

> Finland still has its greatest heritage—freedom and independence. The same Finland, within new borders, has retained its democratic spirit * * * and all have turned their attention to vital reconstruction.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following recital of the history of Finland and the crisis through which it has recently passed, and its program of reconstruction:

FINLAND—ITS HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT—WAR AND THE PROBLEMS OF RECONSTRUCTION

PART I. INTRODUCTORY

Finland has just suffered one of the greatest crises in her existence. But after 3 months of aggression by Communist Russia, Finland remains an independent state, economically and politically free, despite the compulsory peace through which Finland had to cede one-tenth of her territory.

The Finns have been compelled many times in their history to repulse enemy invasion. Since Finland's creation as an independent state in 1917 and her war of independence in 1918, she lived in peace until the Russian aggression of November 30, 1939. The facts concerning this attack are therefore of great importance to all those interested in Finland, and in the question of whether or not a small democratic nation has a right to existence and independence among the larger nations of the world.

It was hoped in the beginning that the case of Finland would prove a test case; that Finland could, with the aid of other democracies, repel the aggression.

But though the Finnish Army was not defeated and though the Finnish soldiers defended their land valiantly, still they could not withstand the ever-increasing hordes of Russians storming over the border. Guns, munitions, and planes were lacking. And though offers of help were forthcoming, there was no way in which armed forces could be made available to Finland. Hence, a compulsory peace had to be made, with Finland ceding to Russia approximately 10 percent of her land, where some 11 percent of the population lived, where the lost capital in forests, industrial, railway, and public properties amounts to more than $360,000,000. It had cost Finland $200,000,000 to fight her short war, and more than $40,000,000 in damage was done by Russian air raiders and bombardments.

At the time the war broke, the Finns were enjoying a period of prosperity. They were building a durable, equable economy. During 1939, until September, when the European war began, Finland's exports were higher than ever before. There was practically no unemployment, no poverty, and very few large fortunes. Finland had achieved a workable and working democratic system, which, even after the ordeal of the war and in spite of all the losses inflicted by the peace, she will maintain. She will maintain her traditional policy of an independent nation among other free nations of the world.

PART II. FINLAND'S RELATIONSHIPS WITH RUSSIA

The Finns are a people distinctly different from, and have neither national nor racial affinity with, the Russians. They are Scandinavian in character.

Until the nineteenth century the country was part of the Kingdom of Sweden. Political and social rights and privileges enjoyed by the people of Sweden were equally enjoyed by the people of Finland; the Kings of Sweden were also the Kings of Finland, and the two peoples built up in northern Europe a civilization second to none in the world.

During the seven centuries in which Finland and Sweden were united there were many wars with Russia. Because of Finland's geographic position, she often became the battleground. Until the nineteenth century the enemy was always thrown back.

In 1807, when the Swedes and Finns refused to join Napoleon's continental blockade of England, Napoleon, Emperor of France, and Alexander I, Czar of Russia, agreed upon a major invasion of Finland. The record of this invasion and of the menace which Russia subsequently became, is amply put forward in a League of Nations report: [1]

"The Finns had been obliged to wage ceaseless warfare against their eastern neighbors, but it was only in the sixteenth century that Russia, expanding toward the west, became a constant menace to the Swedo-Finnish Kingdom. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, however, the struggle against Russia was crowned with success, and in 1617, under the Treaty of Stolbova, eastern frontiers of Finland were fixed which were almost identical with those of today except in the north near the Arctic Ocean. Little by little, however, the Swedo-Finnish Kingdom, weakened by the successive wars of the eighteenth century, lost its military importance, and, during the Napoleonic wars, Finland, already partly annexed by her eastern neighbors, was invaded by Russian armies and attached to Russia by the Treaty of Hamina of 1809.

"Czar Alexander I convened the Finnish States-General at Porvoo, where he solemnly declared that Finland would be administered in conformity with the Swedish Constitution, thus conferring on Finland complete internal autonomy. The Czar assumed the title of Grand Duke of Finland.

"In 1811, the territory formerly annexed to Russia was restored to Finland. All that Finland had in common with Russia was her sovereign and her foreign policy. In other matters the administration of the country was completely independent. Finland had her own army, currency, customs, etc.

"With a few exceptions, the autonomy of Finland was respected by the Russian sovereigns up to the end of the nineteenth century. Under Czar Nicholas II, however, Russian oppression began to be felt. In 1899, an illegal manifesto issued by Nicholas II reserved to the sovereign the right to demand the application of common laws to Russia and Finland without hearing the States-General. After that the National Army was disbanded and an attempt was made to incorporate Finns in the Russian Army. It was hoped to Russify officials, and the press was submitted to a severe censorship.

"The reverses suffered by the Russians in their war with Japan caused a temporary weakening of the Russian autocratic system. The Czar retreated; the illegal measures were repealed and, in 1906, parliamentary reform of a distinctly democratic nature was introduced.

"The old Diet consisting of four orders was replaced by a chamber of representatives elected by equal universal suffrage based on proportional representation. Women also were entitled to vote.

"But, from 1908 onward, a new wave of oppression, more severe than the first, broke over the country. Several Finnish officials who were regarded as dangerous were deported to Siberia. At this moment the patriots known as the Militante (Activists) began to work conscientiously for the liberation of their country.

"The collapse of Russia at the end of the World War brought the liberation of Finland into the realm of possibilities. On December 6, 1917, the Finnish Parliament issued a declaration of independence. After this declaration, however, the country still had to be cleared of the numerous Russian garrisons which occupied it as conquered territory, and a Communist revolt which broke out in January 1918 had to be suppressed. It was only in 1918 that the legal government became master of the situation.

"In 1920, a treaty of peace was concluded at Tartto with the U. S. S. R., which ceded to Finland, beyond her former northern frontiers, the territory of Petsamo."

From 1920 forward Finland lived in peace and progress until the 1939 invasion.

[1] Special supplement to the Monthly Report of the League of Nations, December 1939.

PART III. FINLAND'S PROGRESS

The story of Finland during this last 20 years is inspiring. Faced with rugged, difficult terrain, and with few other raw materials than wood, the people were able to erect a small empire of industry and agriculture as solidly founded as any other in the world.

The country was economically sound. Wise legislation and a rising export trade, coupled with scientific advancement, had developed her resources considerably.

Before the World War, Finland had rather large trade with Russia. In 1918, the Russian market disappeared and Finland sought new markets. So she developed important markets in Great Britain, United States, Italy, Germany, South America, and other countries. By 1939 Finland was buying 15 percent more than she was selling to the United States.

Finland was among the first nations to enter into a trade agreement with the United States under the Hull reciprocal-trade agreements. The Finnish-American agreement, signed on May 18, 1936, resulted in an increase in both exports and imports, with the flow of United States commodities to Finland showing the larger increase.

Agriculture

In 1930 almost 60 percent of the entire population of Finland was occupied by agriculture. Since that time industry was increased and has absorbed slightly more of the population. During the last 20 years the Finnish people cleared 1,536,000 acres of land for cultivation, an area equal to twice that of the State of Rhode Island. In the last 8 years, some 500,000 acres have been cleared, equal approximately to the cultivated area ceded to Russia by the recent Moscow treaty.

Industry

Finland has been rapidly developing copper and nickel mines, and her large forestry resources—the largest of any European country—provided the basis for industrial and commercial development. During recent years as much as 85 percent of her total exports have been composed of forest products, particularly pulp paper, some timber, and plywood. In 1937, Finland was the fourth largest producer of chemical pulp. The paper industry was also rapidly expanding and has become an important part of the Finnish economy. Other branches of Finnish industry were also well developed, particularly mechanical and textile manufacturing.[2]

PART IV. FINLAND, THE DEMOCRACY

Built up largely on the same principles as the Constitution of the United States, with the legislative, executive, and judicial branches each independent of the other, the Government of Finland is purely democratic. Its constitution is the only one adopted in Europe since the World War that is still in effect.

In the Finnish Parliament 7 parties are represented. Its 200 members are elected by universal suffrage, which was introduced in 1906, when women were given the right to vote and to sit in Parliament. The press is entirely free, and Finland has more newspapers and periodicals per capita for its population than any other country in the world.

Approximately 60 percent of all the people are farmers, and every man can own his own land if he so desires. Only 6.5 percent of the total land area is owned by corporations or companies, as against 52.1 percent privately owned, 39.7 percent owned by the state, and 1.7 percent by communities.

Industrial workers have an 8-hour day and holidays with pay for all up to a maximum—after 10 years' service—of 1 month. Children under 14 do not work, and only 6 hours of work in a day are permitted between the ages of 14 and 16. Finnish workers more often than not have their own home or garden plot, and there is no slum problem. Factories and mills are among the most up to date of any in the world, keeping well abreast or ahead of all technological advances.

Unemployment has been practically unknown in Finland for years, as it was at the time of the Russian invasion, and this was not attributable to a munitions economy such as existed in so many nations of Europe. The Finns are probably the healthiest in Europe, as attested by the highly developed athletic competition throughout the country and their victories in Olympic games

As a consequence of compulsory education there is no more literate race anywhere, and among persons over 15 years of age more than 99 percent can read and write. Even the poorest child can take advantage of higher education, with three large universities open to all citizens.

Already before the separation from Russia cultural development flourished. Finland's scientists, poets, artists, architects, and sculp-

[2] According to the report of the League of Nations. The report further states:

"Generally speaking, Finnish industry is highly dynamic and in a state of rapid quantitative and qualitative expansion. The index of Finnish industrial production (on the basis of 1929=100) was 156 in 1938, as compared with an average of 112 for the whole world. Moreover, since 1929 the process of rationalization has progressed more rapidly in Finland than in any other country for which such information is available. During the decade 1929–38, the physical output per working-hour increased by about 50 percent. The same tendency to expand is shown by the growth of the merchant marine, the tonnage of which increased from some 300,000 tons in 1929 to 580,000 tons in 1938.

tors have achieved world-wide fame. The name Sibelius is known wherever music is played. In Paris, London, and New York Finnish art and architecture are known and admired. In the different branches of science Finns have gained wide recognition. There can be no better evidence of the freedom of man which existed in free Finland.

PART V. PRELUDE TO WAR

Since the country became independent, Finland's only aim in her foreign policy had been to live in peace and peaceful cooperation with other nations. She never joined any bloc of large European powers, but followed, like other Scandinavian states, a policy of strict neutrality. She had taken nothing from anybody and did not threaten anyone.

With respect to Russia, she always tried to maintain normal and peaceful relations.

In 1932 a nonaggression pact had been concluded between Finland and Russia, in which it was agreed that all disputes which might arise between Finland and Russia, and which could not be settled through the usual diplomatic channels, should be submitted to a mixed conciliation commission composed of four members—two representing each country. All differences were to be settled between themselves, and by peaceful means. In 1934 this nonaggression pact was reaffirmed, to remain in force until 1945.

Delegations were sent to Russia from time to time to lay a foundation for better trade relations. In recent years Finland's trade with Russia was slightly over 1 percent of its total.

Russian-Finnish relations were as quiet as could have been expected after the outbreak of the European war in September, and Russia had declared she would respect Finland's neutrality the same as that of other states. However, early in October 1939 the Finnish Minister in Moscow received word from Mr. Molotov, Foreign Minister of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, that Mr. Molotov wished to see a special representative from the Government of Finland for an exchange of views "to negotiate on various questions of political and economic character."

In view of developments which had recently taken place in Russian relations with other small states adjacent to Russia, the seriousness of the Russian attitude toward Finland was obvious. Poland had been divided between two totalitarian states. Esthonia, Latvia, and Lithuania had been compelled to allow Soviet military garrisons at important strategic points within their countries and to accept treaties of mutual assistance further impairing their independence of action.

The Finnish Cabinet empowered former Prime Minister Dr. J. K. Paasikivi to act as the Government's special representative, and the invitation to Russia was accepted.

In announcing that the delegation would go to Moscow, the Finnish Foreign Minister said, in part:

"We stand by northern neutrality and our unconditional neutrality, which has been repeatedly affirmed. We threaten none, take no advantage, and will not adhere to any great power or group. Our sole desire is to live in peace with all and to remain outside conflict."

The first conference of the delegates was held at the Kremlin on October 12. In addition to Dr. Paasikivi, the Finnish delegation included Colonel Paasonen, formerly military attaché in Moscow, and M. Nykopp, of the Finnish Foreign Office. Stalin, and Molotov led the Russian delegation.

It became obvious at once that Communist Russia was trying to establish control over Finland and sought vital territorial surrender; territory involving main highroads into Finland. During the previous winter the Russians had proposed an exchange of certain islands on the Gulf of Finland, and the Finnish Government was willing to agree to this. But in that first meeting the Russians brought out a map on which a new frontier had been drawn across the Karelian Isthmus, a frontier involving more than the mere security of Leningrad, upon which the demands were predicated. They demanded also the ceding of a military base on the Hanko Peninsula at the entrance to the Gulf of Finland, and territory on the Arctic coast.

It was obvious that these proposals meant the mutilation of Finnish independence. They were based upon a pretense that the 180,000,000 people of Russia feared aggression from the 4,000,000 people of Finland, and that in order to guard against such aggression it was necessary to undermine Finnish sovereignty. The high-handed nature of the demands in themselves was contradictory of any fear of Finland on the part of the Soviet.

On October 10, President Roosevelt called attention to the friendship between the United States and Finland in a letter to the President of the Soviet Union, and added:

"The President expresses the earnest hope that the Soviet Union will make no demands on Finland which are inconsistent with the maintenance and development of amicable relations between the two countries and the independence of each."

In its report to the League of Nations, the Finnish Government explained:

"A large country is protected by its very size. To require a small state to renounce its means of defense is tantamount to destroying that state's liberty. By giving up its means of defense the small state falls under the domination of the great power by which the demands were presented, or becomes a battlefield of great powers. The U. S. S. R. is not exposed to any danger of indirect aggression by great powers through Finnish territory. The most effective way of guaranteeing it against such dangers for all time is to allow the Finnish people the possibility of insuring—as it is firmly determined to do—the application of its policy of neutrality by effective defense designed to maintain the independence of its country, and not to deprive it of that possibility."

The Finnish Government thereupon agreed to make specific concessions which, it believed, would achieve any possible protective objectives of the Soviet Union.

These were immediately rejected. The Russian proposals became adamant demands, and after a series of conferences a deadlock was reached by November 13.

For a few days all was quiet. Then a campaign of abuse of Finland was commenced in the Russian press and over the radio. This campaign had the twin objectives of molding an anti-Finnish sentiment among the Russian people and undermining Finnish morale at home. It charged that the Finnish ruling classes did not desire an agreement, while the working classes, on the other hand, were most anxious to secure friendly relations with the Communists. This allegation had its answer in the unity of the Finnish people during the time of the negotiations and during the war.

Still seeking a peaceful solution, the Finnish Government moved to avoid border incidents by shifting its artillery back from the Finnish-Russian frontier, beyond range of Russian territory. Despite this it was announced in Russia on November 26 that Finnish artillery had fired on Soviet territory, killing and wounding several soldiers. And at midnight of November 29 came the beginning of the end of peace.

Molotov, in a radio speech to the Russian people, accused the Finns of the border incident which the Finnish Government had offered to submit to a neutral commission. The gist of his speech was:

1. He accused the Finnish Government of "irreconcilable hostility" toward Russia, despite repeated offers on the part of Finland for peaceful arbitration.

2. He denounced the nonaggression pact between Finland and Russia.

3. He broke off diplomatic relations.

4. He warned the Red Army and Navy of millions to be prepared for aggression from the Finnish Army of a few hundred thousand.

With this broadcast the Finnish Government and the Finnish people became finally aware that it was not peace but aggression and the seizure of territory that the Soviet sought.

Meanwhile, when the crisis had reached the breaking point, on this same momentous evening of November 29, the Government of the United States moved to preserve peace. The American Minister in Helsinki, Mr. Arthur Schoenfeld, and the American Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow, Mr. Walter Thurston, expressed to the respective Governments the willingness of the United States to extend its good offices for the settlement of the controversial questions between Finland and the Soviet.

The Finnish Foreign Minister immediately notified the American Minister of Finland's readiness to accept the offer. Russia did not accept. Its only answer was the armed attack upon Finland.

Even then, while the Finnish Government and the American Government still sought peace, the Communist troops were on the move. Russian bombers were being loaded while Molotov spoke, and "red" pilots had received their instructions. Three hours after the United States Minister had visited the Finnish Foreign Office in Helsinki, Russian artillery began to bombard Finnish territory. At dawn on November 30 the Soviet air force attacked Finland, brutally bombing and machine gunning 14 Finnish towns and localities and ruthlessly killing civilians, including women and children.

Further evidence of the real goal of the Russians came the day after hostilities began, when the U. S. S. R. broadcast the announcement that it had set up a new democratic government for all Finland in the village of Terijoki in Finnish territory on the Isthmus of Karelia, near the Finnish-Soviet frontier. This government was composed of Soviet citizens and mercenaries of the Comintern who had once been residents in Finland but had departed years before to ally themselves with the Communists.

This, then, was the first step toward the sovietizing of Finland. The actual objectives of Stalin and Molotov were bared at last.

PART VI. THE WAR

The Finnish report to the League of Nations states:

"On November 30 Soviet airplanes appeared above Helsinki about 9 a. m. and bombarded the city and the neighboring airdrome. The attack was repeated the same day about 2:30 p. m., and on this occasion dozens of civilians, chiefly women and children, were killed. The following day there was further bombardment of several towns and other centers of population; there were several dozen casualties and much damage was done. The sole purpose of these air attacks was, without doubt, to annihilate the civil population and cause material damage. It may perhaps be suggested that the bombs fell accidentally on objectives other than those aimed at. But low-flying airplanes were seen to turn the fire of their machine guns directly against private houses, schools, and women and children rushing to take shelter. The land and naval forces have shown the same cruelty and the same flagrant disregard for the elementary laws of warfare; they have spared neither women, children, nor even shipwrecked civilians."

With bombs dropping about the cities and with people lying dead and wounded in her streets, Finland tried once more to set up a conference between the two governments.

By radio, the Finnish Government expressed its willingness to accede to all Russian demands and requests which were not inconsistent with Finland's policy of strict neutrality, which did not threaten her national defenses, and which would not affect her freedom and independence as a sovereign state.

This availed nothing. Seeing that war was inevitable, the Finnish Parliament on December 1 set itself to carry on the defense of the nation. The cabinet resigned to make way for a coalition war cabinet, which reflected the unity of the Finnish people by including all parties from the social democrats to the conservatives.

On December 2, in a broadcast to the United States, Finnish Foreign Minister Väinö Tanner expressed the hope that Finland "which wishes to carry out the work of peace, might, as soon as possible, see her relations with the Soviet Union become once again peaceful." He declared:

"The Finnish Government will not refuse to take part in negotiations for the restoration of peace. Nevertheless, anyone who believes that the Finnish people can be bought by threat of force and the terror launched to make concessions that will amount, in reality, to the loss of their independence, is mistaken."

On February 1, President Kyösti Kallio voiced another offer to conclude "an honorable peace with Soviet Russia and end this barbaric senseless attack."

In the meantime, outraged governments the world over were expressing deep sympathy for the plight of the Finns. President Franklin D. Roosevelt was one of the first. He indicted Soviet Russia's aggression, declaring:

"The news of the Soviet naval and military bombings within Finnish territory has come as a profound shock to the Government and people of the United States. Despite efforts made to solve the dispute by peaceful methods to which no reasonable objection could be offered, one power has chosen to resort to force of arms. It is tragic to see the policy of force spreading, and to realize that wanton disregard for law is still on the march.

"All peace-loving people in those nations that are still hoping for the continuance of relations throughout the world on the basis of law and order will unanimously condemn this new resort to military force as the arbiter of international differences. To the great misfortune of the world, the present trend to force makes insecure the independent existence of small nations in every continent and jeopardize the rights of mankind to self-government. The people and Government of Finland have a long honorable and wholly peaceful record which has won for them the respect and fond regard of the people and Government of the United States."

All the civilized world joined President Roosevelt in condemning the Communist aggression, and with the beginning of the raids upon civilians from the air protests of the inhumanities became universal. In the meantime, all the women members of the Finnish Parliament appealed to the women of the world for support. The appeal spoke of the incessant bombing outrages, and said, in part:

"The people of Finland have always dreamt of living in peace and working industriously in the conditions provided by niggardly nature. Love of battle and conquest have never been implanted in our children either in homes or schools, only the defense of the liberty of their country has been regarded as a sacred duty. As far as we have been able with our small resources, we have endeavored to maintain peaceful and friendly relations with our neighbors. In spite of this Finnish homes have been made to go through a terrible nightmare during these last few winter months. Innumerable homes have been destroyed by air raids, hundreds of thousands of people have been forced to leave their homes, members of families have been scattered far and wide. Day and night mothers with new-born infants, old people, and invalids have had to be ready to seek protection in snowdrifts and woods from barbaric air attacks. Every Sunday not only those brave soldiers who have been killed in action, but also women and children, the victims of bombing raids, are laid to rest in our cemeteries throughout the country."

On December 20 former President Herbert Hoover said:

"The forces of primitive savagery have been unloosened upon the world. The Finns are the victims of today. Every decent person in the world is praying to God tonight that these brave people shall yet be saved from this tide. For the world today witnesses one of those heroic stands for freedom of men that comes but few times in the centuries. It is a star illuminating the no man's land of civilization. Its glow will light the minds of men and give hope to liberty for centuries to come."

Millions of persons throughout the world contributed to help Finland defend its borders and to aid its suffering people. In the United States, the Finnish Relief Fund, the American Red Cross, and Fighting Funds for Finland gave valuable aid, with organized labor, the churches, and virtually all segments of American life rallying to the cause of the Finns.

On February 11, President Roosevelt again spoke in support of Finland, asserting: "American sympathy is 98 percent with the Finns in their effort to stave off invasion of their own soil. That American sympathy by now is axiomatic."

Pointing out that the Russian Soviet is a dictatorship while Finland is a republic which could not have "any ulterior designs on the integrity or the safety of the Soviet Union," President Roosevelt added:

"It (Russia) has allied itself with another dictatorship, and it has invaded a neighbor so infinitesimally small that it could do no conceivable, possible harm to the Soviet Union, a small nation that seeks only to live at peace as a democracy and a liberal forward-looking democracy at that."

PART VII. THE PEACE

During the course of the war, the Finns won victories, but they also suffered tremendous losses owing to the overwhelming number of the attacking army and their inexhaustible supply of war materials.

More than 17,000 young people gave their lives. Forty thousand more were wounded. Women, children, and the aged were killed and wounded in Russian bombings behind the lines. The Russians lost perhaps as much as 10 times as many men, but after having hammered the Finnish lines for more than 3 months, having lost all these men, the Russian troops still advanced only a few miles. In most cases they got no farther than the distance from Washington to Baltimore, or about 40 miles. But the Russians always had fresh troops to put in, modern war materials to furnish them with. The Finns had to fight without being relieved.

The Finnish Army was never defeated; nor did the morale of the civilian population break. The conclusion of the peace and Finland's acceptance of the Russian conditions were not brought about by a break-down either of the inner or the outer front. There was no military catastrophe, but finally the physical strain upon the troops at the front seemed too heavy and no help was in sight. England and France promised their help in the form of troops, but how could they reach Finland? Petsamo, the Finnish port in the north, was far away and occupied by Russian troops. Sweden and Norway, through which the shortest way to send help would be, considered their policy of neutrality would not permit them to allow the transfer of troops. Thus, was Finland driven to a hard peace.

Finland lost all the Karelian Isthmus; the ancient city of Vipuri, which always was a stronghold against the east; all the shores of Lake Ladoga; and a great district on the northeastern frontier; a part of the Arctic coast; and many islands in the Gulf of Finland. One of the most serious losses was the port of Hanko in the southwest, which Finland was compelled to lease to Russia for a period of 30 years.

However, in contrast to the three Baltic states south of the Gulf of Finland, Finland has not granted Russia the right of maintaining garrisons in other parts of the country; nor has she made with the Soviet any treaty of mutual assistance or surrendered any other political prerogatives. Refusing to link her national policies to those of the Soviet, Finland is a free and independent state. She is determined to maintain and protect this position.

On March 20 H. J. Procopé, Minister of Finland to the United States, told a group in Richmond, Va.:

"Finland has just fought another war and has, in the words of my President, signed a compulsary peace. But this does not spell the end of Finland. We have lost land and lives as well, but we still have our greatest heritage—freedom and independence. We still have our forests, our soil, our water power in our streams, and, mostly, our industrial equipment; and the same Finland, within new borders, has retained its democratic spirit. The Finns, the peasants, the workmen, the intellectuals, all who built our nation, who fought to protect it through many generations, who so valiantly held their own in this war against one of the world's largest nations—they all have turned their attention to vital reconstruction. They know how to rebuild as well as build a nation."

As yet, the cost of the compulsory peace has not been completely calculated. Thousands upon thousands of civilians who were forced from their homes during the war were stripped of their possessions. Four hundred and fifty thousand people were moved from ceded areas. Ten percent of the cultivated land of Finland was handed over to Russia. Ten percent of industry and 16 percent of railways were lost. The value of growing forests, industrial enterprises, and railways, and houses has been placed at 18,000,000,000 marks, or $360,000,000. Many hospitals, churches, schools, the Technical University of Helsinki and the age-old castle of Turku, were all destroyed.

It will never be possible to accurately estimate the cost to Finland of the cessation of her industry during the period of the war; of the mobilization and demobilization of her entire population; of her lame and crippled and wounded soldiers, who will remain partially or completely out of actual production during the rest of this generation. All these things are the cost of Finland's war.

From this tremendous toll comes the three phases of rehabilitation: (1) the repairing of damage: (2) the rehibilitation of industry to compensate for losses; and (3) the resettlement of 500,000 persons forced from their homes in the ceded areas.

While this rebuilding process will demand sacrifices from the entire population and, probably, a lower standard of living for a period, Finland remains confident that with adequate help from other democratic nations the rehabilitation will be accomplished and Finland will resume its economic progress.

Finland faced great hardships when she won her independence from the Soviet 20 years ago. She was forced to seek heavy foreign loans which reached their peak in 1931 and amounted to between two hundred and twenty-five and two hundred and fifty million dollars. Between 1932 and 1937 Finland redeemed foreign bonds to an amount exceeding $125,000,000, and at the outbreak of the war her total debts to foreign countries were exceeded by deposits abroad. Her post-war debt to the United States of $110,000,000 has been reduced to approximately $15,000,000 at the outbreak of the war.

PART VIII. THE FUTURE

As the peace came, Finland turned to restoration and rehabilitation.

Field Marshall Mannerheim told his valiant soldiers:

"Our fate is hard now that we are compelled to give up to an alien race, a race with a life philosophy and moral values different from ours, the ground which for centuries we have cultivated in labor and sweat.

"Yet we must put our shoulders to the wheel in order that we may prepare on the soil left to us a home for those rendered homeless and an improved livelihood for all, and as before we must be ready to defend our diminished fatherland with the same fire with which we defended our undivided fatherland."

He continued:

"We did not want war. We asked peace, work, and progress, but we were forced into a struggle in which you have done great deeds which will shine for centuries in the pages of history.

"More than 15,000 of you who took the field will never again see your homes, and how many are those who have lost forever their ability to work?

"But you have also dealt hard blows, and if 200,000 of our enemies now lie on the snowdrifts gazing with broken eyes at our starry sky, the fault is not yours. You did not hate them or wish them evil; you merely followed the stern law or war, kill or be killed."

President Roosevelt, on March 13, added to his statement of December 1, indicting Russia, this conviction:

"The people of Finland, by their unexcelled valor and strong resistance in the face of overwhelming armed forces, have won the moral right to live in everlasting peace and independence in the land they have so bravely defended * * * the people and Government of Finland have again increased the respect and warm regard in which they are held by the people and Government of the United States, even though it is clear that by virtue of an attack by a neighbor many times stronger, they have been compelled to yield territory, and to accept a material weakening of their own future defense of their independence.

"The ending of this war does not yet clarify the inherent right of small nations to the maintenance of their integrity against attack by superior force."

Foreign Minister Tanner said:

"* * * peace imposes a heavy burden on this country. Only with great hesitation has the government consented to it.

"The decision was all the more difficult to reach in that no one could foresee what the near future would bring.

"In this case it will become evident only at a later stage as is the case of all great political decisions, whether the decision was right or wrong."

But with the peace, hard as it is, comes reconstruction. Mr. Tanner continues:

"You know how hard it is to leave a place you love—so hard, that you can never feel the same toward a new place. The only consolation for those who lost everything is their knowledge that they still belong to the same nation as their brother Finns.

"The government has declared in a proclamation that the care of those citizens will be one of its first and most important duties. Although the war has destroyed property worth hundreds of millions of dollars and although under the peace treaty we lose enormous areas and plants, our irreparable loss is the loss of that human material which cannot be replaced. For those who remain we shall try to build up a new life. We shall try by domestic works to reform and settle to win again in our reduced territory the areas we have lost.

"And as we trusted in the sympathy and the help of the civilized world when we took up the battle for our existence, we do so again now that we embark on the reconstruction and resettlement of our country."

"Learn by Our Folly," British Paper Urges the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article under the heading "'Learn by Our Folly,' British Paper Urges the United States."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"LEARN BY OUR FOLLY," BRITISH PAPER URGES UNITED STATES

(By the Associated Press)

LONDON, June 17.—Lord Beaverbrook's Daily Express—advising Americans editorially to "learn by our folly" and "don't be English"—admonished the United States yesterday not to believe "that 3,000 miles of Atlantic can save you."

The editorial mouthpiece of Britain's minister for aircraft production called upon the United States to ignore "soft words of reassurance that come from Germany."

"Prepare to meet your foes," the editorial added. "Make big sacrifices now in order to build up your own forces. Squash your saboteurs, your "fifth column" traitors who work quietly behind the scenes to prevent you from spending your great wealth to be prepared."

The newspaper warned the American Nation to "watch the Nazi propagandists who settle in the small countries near you ready for a stab in your side or your back, as we in this country suffer by the presence of such Nazis in Eire."

"There is no time for subtlety now. We give you advice from the bitterness of our own lessons."

Reciprocal-Trade Agreements and Their Relationship to the Export Market for Industrial Products and Protection to American Industry and Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, while the new European war is progressing and threatening to destroy much of the products of modern civilization and causing such anguish to all of us, and while obviously every citizen of this Nation hopes and prays for an early peace, we must be realistic enough to thoughtfully survey and continue our study of all of the more important economic problems which continue to concern us and which at the conclusion of the war will undoubtedly stand out as of supreme importance and which at that time will demand the best thought of all of us.

In this connection I know of no subject more important to keep constantly in mind than the multitude of problems which center around the so-called reciprocal trade agreements program which is so important a feature of the present national administration. Indeed, so important is the subject that the administration was willing to resort to absolutely every conceivable device in order to secure the renewal of the Trade Agreements Act, thus extending its operation for another 3-year period. It is because of this continued attitude on the part of the administration that I address myself to some of the more important problems which it seems to me merit continued thoughtful study.

First of all, of course, we must all recognize that as a result of the European war the negotiations of new reciprocal-trade agreements in the immediate future no longer worries us. In other words, while the present situation continues, there can be no thought of trade agreements with such countries as Norway, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, and Italy in northern and western Europe. The Belgian agreement cannot be revised as intended to any advantage; while there would not seem to be any practical basis for attempting to launch agreements with the 8 or 10 smaller Baltic and Balkan countries or Russia. The same would appear to be largely true so far as countries in South America, Africa, and Asia are concerned, as well as other small scattered areas. In other words, so far as reciprocal-trade agreements are concerned, the war has probably forced a much-needed and much-desired vacation. But this does not mean that we can safely forget the subject and go to sleep at the post. There is all the more reason why we must continue our study and be prepared for vastly more difficult periods which undoubtedly are not far ahead of us.

I propose to give only passing or very brief consideration to the significance of reciprocal-trade agreements from the standpoint of the foreign market for the products of American agriculture and industry. I am satisfied from a study of literally all data available and of reports which have been made that foreign concessions made to the United States in all reciprocal-trade agreements thus far negotiated had substantially no important value. In many cases concessions made were merely restoring conditions which had prevailed earlier. In other words, some countries prior to the agreements had advanced tariff rates, narrowed quotas, and so forth, and then agreed to return at least partly to the previous arrangement. In many other cases, what were called foreign concessions to us were mere gestures which did not and could not result in any important benefit to us because these same foreign countries in many cases proceeded at once to "cover their tactics" by introducing some other devices to accomplish the same purpose which they previously had in mind.

At the present time our foreign market depends almost wholly on the purchasing power of the people in foreign countries and their need for commodities which we have available and are able to supply them. In other words, if they have the money to buy and hold the commodities and are willing to pay our prices, they proceed and we have a certain quantity of exports as a result. It is quite true that some of our low-unit cost products, resulting from mass production, great efficiency, and technical advancement, have found and will continue to find the foreign market until other foreign countries through the same processes of perfection are able to undersell us because of their lower wage rates, longer hours, and other advantages which they may have. In the meantime, no important measurable advantages have come from the trade-agreements program.

So far as agricultural products are concerned—and manufactured products made from agricultural raw materials—the same applies as that just stated with reference to other industrial products. If foreign people need what we have and if they have the money to buy or the purchasing power, they will proceed to take whatever part of our supplies are available provided our prices are not out of line with prices for the same commodities produced in other areas.

Probably it is not necessary to go further at this time in our discussion of the futile attempts which have been made to secure special advantages in foreign markets, except to say that practically all foreign countries now have surrounded themselves with such a multitude of quota-control devices, licenses, permits, and so forth, and with exchange-control devices, including blocked exchanges, and so forth, and with other trading forms such as compensating agreements, barter arrangements, and Government purchasing agencies, that there is no good reason to believe that the people of foreign countries, largely bankrupt, will be in position to greatly increase their purchases in this country, except requirements for military operations, or unless we furnish them the money with which they are buying, and that, of course, we should not do unless we literally want to give away our products.

My purpose is to make a somewhat more detailed reference to the import side of the problem. There are three or four outstanding problems which must receive consideration before any attempt can be made to analyze or to review such problems which may concern individual industries or groups of labor.

It must now be perfectly clear that the administration has in mind one fundamental purpose and that purpose is to secretly proceed with a complete general tariff revision downward. Already reductions in rate of duty have been granted to all countries—not merely to those with whom agreements have been negotiated—in the case of well over a thousand different agricultural and industrial products. The clear-cut purpose of the administration is to write a complete revised Tariff Act with lower rates of duty in the case of practically every commodity. There is, of course, much pretense that the rate is being carefully studied in each case. But this is being done in a secret manner and the public is not being permitted to come into the discussion or review the results, and the general purpose of the administration is to make the study and then reduce the rate of duty. In other words, set up the facts and figures in such a way as to justify downward tariff revision. Every individual industry, therefore, and every group of wage earners in American factories and group of operators on American farms should have clearly in mind this first broad general purpose—to reduce all rates of duty as rapidly as possible and as much as possible to all countries without regard to any concessions secured from abroad.

And it is further clear and may as well be stated that the general desire is to make a 50-percent reduction all along the line. It is true that in a few cases the first reduction is less than a full 50-percent, but when the administration returns to the same commodity and makes a second reduction, it necessarily follows that the sum total of reductions made are the full 50 percent. So then we have before us as the first proposition that we face a general downward tariff revision as nearly as possible 50 percent all along the line.

The second proposition is that, taking all agriculture and all industry, the reductions already made have not resulted in widespread disaster to American economic conditions, although numerous individual cases can be cited where very definite injury has already resulted. The reason no widespread injury has resulted to American economy is that wars now raging over large parts of Asia and Africa as well as Europe have turned the attention of all of the more important agricultural and industrial countries away from the American market. On the one hand, literally tens of millions of workers have been called into military operations. On the other hand, millions are engaged in making machines and materials for destruction. In every war, in fact, foreign economic life is in a chaotic condition, and as a result we have been temporarily protected against injury from our own unwise conduct.

It has been said that literally tens of thousands of workers formerly engaged in making lenses and other delicate glass products and other tens of thousands engaged in making watches, clocks, and so forth, for peacetime use are now giving all of their work to the making of precision instruments for military purposes such as compasses, range finders, speedometers, altimeters, binoculars, and a dozen other products. I could cite a hundred other illustrations, but this will suffice to illustrate the point in mind. In other words, merely because the American market is not being flooded with the products of foreign countries does not mean that concessions made in rates of duty have not been unwise. We are living in a fool's paradise thinking that the whole tariff structure can be literally torn to pieces without grave injury to American standards of living, wages for American industry, and markets for American agriculture.

The third major proposition I desire to call attention to is the fact that even though wars are bitterly fought and tremendously destructive, and even though the number of killed and wounded may number a million or two, peace will ultimately and abruptly return to the world. We all hope for this and we feel confident that it will not come until the major contestants have largely exhausted their military resources. Then, again, literally tens of millions of workers will return to the farms, the forests, the fisheries, the factories; the outside world will be largely bankrupt. These tens of millions will have become accustomed to long hours of labor with very low wages or no wages at all other than the fact that the government feeds and clothes and shelters them. In the meantime, too, foreign countries are being equipped with the very latest and most modern machine tools, power machinery, and all of the improvements of modern times. In the great iron and steel industries, in the great textile industries, in the great glass, china, and porcelain industries; indeed in all of the great industries of modern times, whether foods, fibers, leather products, or other industrial fields, foreigners are speeding up the installation of the most efficient technical and scientific and mechanical means of production. Thus, with the close of the war, with the most perfect and efficient equipment, with millions of laborers demanding an opportunity to work, and with long hours and meager wages, we must be prepared for a competition from abroad which will be so violent as to have a very early repercussion in the United States.

Here we shall stand a relatively rich country with extremely high standards of living, accustomed to all of the necessities, comforts, and luxuries, but with extremely high costs of production and with high prices and with a world seeking an outlet for their products. In this position we stand with the national administration systematically cutting away the American protective system built up over a century.

I have now briefly discussed three major general considerations. Permit me to turn my attention for a moment to consideration of some of the more important repercussions which we must be prepared to meet. On the one hand, it is perfectly clear that our great volume of war-stimulated exports to the warring nations and to others engaged in preparedness will collapse. On the other hand, it is apparent that we shall face an effort on the part of untold millions of foreign workers trying to dispose of their products in this market. How shall we meet this new situation?

The present administration says we shall meet it by further reducing our tariffs. In other words, that we shall meet it by lowering the flood gates and letting the products come into the American market. It is difficult to see how that line of reasoning could possibly be constructive or helpful to America. First, what effect would it have upon agricultural products. Obviously, if great quantities of farm products are poured into the American market from foreign sources, they will have the effect of depressing prices and displacing the products of our own farms. If farmers think they have had a difficult time during the last decade of world-wide economic depression, they have in prospect ahead of them something so much more serious that it hardly lends itself to description.

Then what about labor in industry? Of course the rabble rouser and free trader immediately say, Let the manufacturers reduce their profits and lower prices to meet the new competition. But manufacturers have been making relatively very little in the way of profits. Indeed, over the last decade profits have been so small and so few and far between that there is no possible way to meet the new competition even if the payment of all dividends were abandoned for a period of years. In the meantime, the national administration piles debt upon debt and deficit upon deficit so that taxes are increased daily. Considering the increasing cost of production and related difficulties daily imposed upon industry, it must be perfectly clear that industrial management cannot face this situation by cutting profits or by attempts to save a few dollars in overhead. Fixed charges already have a strangle hold on many industries.

But if this flood of competition cannot be met by industrial management from savings in overhead items including profits, how then is it to be met?

It would seem that there are only two major alternatives. On the one hand, if domestic prices are held at a level sufficient to cover cost of production, the volume of imports will increase by leaps and bounds because of the lower costs and prices of foreign products, and this means only one thing—it means unemployment in the United States. Then, this alone might create all sorts of serious problems for the National Government and the States and bring about conditions even more serious than those witnessed during the last decade.

But industrial management has had an experience with unemployment and the Nation has had an experience with this same problem, and it is quite conceivable that new approaches would be found more desirable than merely closing factories in order to live on the lower cost and lower price imported products. The other approach would apparently be lowering the standards of living of American wage earners. Obviously, this would start with the 10,000,000 wage earners in American factories. Longer hours, lower wages, and poorer living and working conditions would all stare us in the face. Is American industry and American labor prepared to meet this challenge?

It is well enough to shrug one's shoulders and say that however difficult it might be, we none the less would be forced to meet this foreign competition. The administration still pretends that this could be done in the face of a 50-percent widespread reduction in tariff protection. But longer hours, lower wages, and all of the accompanying distress means something even more than has already been noted. When the great body of wage earners from factories find themselves with longer hours and lower wages, their purchasing power is reduced to the point where all wage earners in every other walk of life are forced to take a similar treatment. The millions of workers in stores, in transportation, in offices, and in all other walks of life must, therefore, be prepared to follow the fate of the 10,000,000 producers of products in American factories.

And the farmers of the United States will find find that they in turn, from this approach to the subject, will face the same disaster. If the 75 percent of the people who do not live on farms are forced to longer hours, lower wages, and other equally unsatisfactory conditions, the American market for American farm products will be destroyed. Prices for farm products will follow the collapse in prices for industrial prices and the wages paid to industrial workers.

It is not my purpose to merely draw a pessimistic picture of possible dangers ahead. It is my purpose to appeal to industrial management and wage earners in the factories of America as well as the farmers and to all other people engaged in all other enterprises to commence to make a realistic study of this situation. Surely, all thinking people must realize that when the millions now engaged in world wars have returned to peace pursuits in a bankrupt condition, they will offer to the one outstanding relatively prosperous nation of the world such a flood of products produced at such low costs as to merit consideration on our part. Surely, whatever administration is placed in control in Washington must be mindful of the necessity for protecting the American market. In the past this protection has largely taken the form of the American tariff system. The present administration says that this tariff system is to be thrown away. It is my judgment that this is one of the most serious mistakes in the whole New Deal program.

In concluding, I think it should be stated that there need be no fear of panic if proper steps are taken during the summer and at the time of the general election early in November. Fortunately, trade agreements do not automatically come into existence. Furthermore, they are not permanent laws which cannot be gotten rid of. All that it is necessary to do at this time is to resolve to get rid of the present administration and the present program. If this is done in November, then a new administration can within a very few months cancel the outstanding trade agreements or make such modifications as time justifies. Beyond that, they can proceed to correct such errors as do exist in the tariff structure by a proper revision to fit American conditions and world conditions which we know will exist at the conclusion of the disastrous wars now raging.

Earlier in this statement I said that because of chaotic world conditions American industry has not yet been seriously damaged. Indeed, because of this fact, the administration has been disposed to ridicule all opposition and ask, "What are you crying about?" "Show us the injury," and so forth. The truth is that, if time permitted, I could very readily give ample illustration of serious injuries already resulting from the program. I am going to take time only to call attention to a small number of illustrations.

The trade agreements with the United Kingdom became effective January 1, 1939. There were only a few months during which results could be measured before the outbreak of the world war. However, we may reasonably compare imports of a few specific commodities with imports during the same months of the preceding years. Thus, taking the first 3 months of 1939, we find imports of 32,422 pounds of worsteds under 4 ounces. This contrasts with an average of 17,240 pounds during the first 3 months of each of the 3 preceding years—1936, 1937, 1938. In other words, imports approximately doubled. And imports have continued since that time. Thus, during the first 3 months of 1940—even though wars were already raging—imports climbed up to 39,065 pounds.

Take the next item on which tariff concessions were made: Worsted over 4 ounces. Average imports during the first 3 months of 1936, 1937, 1938 amounted to 231,119 pounds. In contrast, imports during the first 3 months of 1939 more than doubled, to 549,201 pounds. And the increase continued down through the first 3 months of 1940.

Take the next item: Woolens over 4 ounces. Average imports during the first 3 months of the preceding 3 years were 979,337 pounds. During the same 3-month period of 1939 imports were up fully 50 percent, to 1,358,901 pounds, and this increase continued through the first 3 months of 1940.

I do not wish to load this statement with details with reference to numerous industries. I could cite the experience of the zinc producers, the tens of thousands of workers who produce this important raw material in the mines of America; or I could cite you the experience of the workers in the lace factories, who make the very delicate products so well known in this country, which come from the lace-making industries. Indeed, I could cite you scores of other illustrations. I cite you only this one to show you the character of the problem confronting America, and this pertains to American industry. And this means not merely the industrialist, but the wage earners, and in turn wage earners in all other walks of life, and in turn the operators of our farms and the workers employed by our farm operators.

In conclusion may I not merely call to your attention the application of the signal adopted by the railroads of America at every dangerous crossing, "Stop, Look, and Listen." We must not permit this subject to be carelessly waved aside on the claim that there are more pressing problems now before us. Preparedness is as important in this field as military preparedness. Unless we are prepared on a broad comprehensive front to deal with the problems of America as they arise, we shall face disasters that will shake the very foundations of our economic structure. It will lower the level of the American standard of living to that of the low-wage, low-cost-production countries that will invade our markets. The administration's proposal for a giant cartel is an admission that the trade-agreement program has failed.

Now Comes Hemisphere Cartels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, after pig killing, cattle shooting, plowing under crops, the famous Potato Control Act, now the processing taxes, happily interred by action of the then constituted Supreme Court; then the Bankhead Cotton Control Act that has prostrated the cotton business of the South and encouraged the planting in many new areas in South America and Asia. Then came destructive, so-called reciprocal-trade agreements that curtailed acreage in the United States and opened our markets to low-cost areas in other lands. The ever-normal granary and other catch phrases. Many new bureaus, tens of thousands of new Federal employees to harass and regiment the American farmer. As the many schemes unfold themselves and, one after another, prove failures, one is constrained to remember the remark of Abraham Lincoln when, after the late Alexander Stephens, on meeting him to discuss terms of surrender, shed a long, old-fashioned comforter, several coats, and finally got down to hardpan, Lincoln said, "Did you ever see so many shucks on such a little nubbin?" Mr. Speaker, may we not have an American policy for American farmers? Put their own interests first and an end to these abortive attempts to regulate a score of other countries' interests to the detriment of ours.

Loyalty of Americans of Italian Ancestry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE AND EDITORIAL FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN AND AN ADDRESS BY HON. A. A. BERLE, JR.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article and editorial from the Baltimore Sun and an address by the Assistant Secretary of State:

[From the Baltimore Sun of June 18, 1940]

ITALIANS IN UNITED STATES WILL BE LOYAL, NEW YORK MAYOR SAYS—LAGUARDIA ASSERTS THEY ARE OPPOSED TO "CRUEL PHILOSOPHIES"—A. A. BERLE ASKS THEM TO MAKE POSITION CLEAR TO OUTSIDE WORLD

In a fiery speech constantly punctuated with applause and yells of approval, Mayor LaGuardia, of New York, last night told more than 600 Baltimore Italian-Americans that citizens of their common ancestry as loyal Americans are united in opposition to the "cruel philosophies of totalitarian states."

"Nothing must take place in this country," he said in his address in the Lord Baltimore Hotel sponsored by Italian-American business and professional men, "that would have even the remotest semblance of division.

WANTS NO DOUBT

"I want to appeal to the whole country that there be not one scintilla of doubt against any citizen of Italian blood."

Preceding the mayor, A. A. Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, asked for the help of "all Americans of Italian ancestry in the United States * * * in making it clear to every outside element in the world that Americans are undividedly loyal to the United States."

He asked that Americans demonstrate that "this loyalty does not differ in the least because the names may be Italian or English, or German or Irish, or French or Polish, or Scandinavian. * * * I am glad to salute this group of Americans of Italian ancestry and name as one of the bulwarks of the essential unity of the United States, which no power on earth can tear apart."

SAYS FRENCH SPIRIT LIVES

Referring briefly to the defeat of the French armies, Mayor LaGuardia said the "territory of a happy country may have been conquered, but the spirit of the French people has not and never will be conquered.

"No one can tell me that the Italian people will forget 'Ave Maria' to say 'Ave Hitler.' No one can tell me that the Italian people, with music in their hearts and beauty in their souls, were ever made to goosestep in back of any dictator."

CITES ITALIAN SETTLERS

"The blood and sweat of the Italian people helped build this country," the New York mayor said, pounding a table, "and we want everyone to know that we are one family together with our sister republics in this hemisphere, and that we all say 'hands off' to all dictators.

"I know that the honor and safety and security of American people are safe in the hands of President Franklin D. Roosevelt."

Mayor LaGuardia was introduced by Representative THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, whose district includes the city's "Little Italy." The visiting executive was welcomed to the State by Governor O'Conor, and to the city by Mayor Jackson and Richard C. O'Connell, president of the city council.

WANT TO BE LOYAL

"It is not necessary," Mayor LaGuardia said, "for descendants of Italians to proclaim their loyalty to our country. We are loyal to this country because we want to be loyal. We are part of every bit of growth and development of this great Republic.

"I know I speak for every one of you, for we have contributed our share in making this country the greatest country on the face of the earth. In a speech the other day I said that I could vouch for 99.99 percent of the Italians in New York. And that one one-hundredth of 1 percent we have indexed and cataloged.

REALIZES RESPONSIBILITIES

"We are in the midst of a great world crisis. We realize fully the responsibilities that it brings to us. What I know of European conditions I learned first as a representative of this country in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. And I learned a lot about Italians when we were fighting a common enemy more than 20 years ago. Today it is the same enemy, the enemy of progress and freedom and liberty."

Turning toward the Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. Berle, Mayor LaGuardia remarked that her forefathers came over on the Mayflower and that Mr. Berle came over on the Half Moon.

"But our people," the diminutive mayor said, to the immense delight of the audience, "came over on the Santa Maria."

CITES RAILROAD TIES

"We took a great part in the making of America," he continued. "Travel over the great railroads across the western plains and look at the ties. Every one of them was put down with the sweat and blood of Italian citizens. Go to the coal mines, and you will find that the fuel is brought from the bowels of the earth by Italians. * * *

"Look at the beautiful landscaping of flowers, and it was done by some Italian. Go to the Capitol and look at the fresco in the rotunda. An Italian did the work. Listen to the United States Marine Band, and you will hear musicians who came from the island of Sicily.

"These hard-working immigrants gave their all to the building of this country. They belonged here. Yes; they were exploited. They suffered hardships. Why? Because here in this country they saw possibility and hope for their children—you and me—who now take part in the Government itself.

"* * * I don't believe there is any division of thought by clear-thinking people in the world on the division of Europe. No one can accept the cruelty of this philosophy that invades happy homes. * * * The Italian people haven't changed in the last 20 years. They still have the love of life, love of home, love of family.* * *"

WARNS OF DIVISION

He warned the Italians in this country that there should be no semblage of division of loyalty lest the "cruel leaders of Europe have misapprehensions."

"What makes the Germans strong?" he asked. "Is it tanks? No. Airplanes? No. It is the unity of the German people. There is a policy of hatred by destroying minorities, by murdering objectors, by destroying peace-loving men and women.

"In this country we have mutual respect for one another, but in moments of crisis, such as now, we must marshal all forces; we must subordinate private opinion for the good of the country.

CAN MAKE CONTRIBUTIONS

"That is where you and I can make contributions not only to our own country, but perhaps another contribution. Perhaps it will be our lot to demonstrate that a great race that has contributed so much in beauty and in art and inspired self-government and liberty, that has put its blood into America, can be free men and women and live in peace and harmony to enjoy the blessings of peace and liberty.

"Here is the land that bears the name of one Italian navigator. whose symbol is Columbia, named for another. America stands as the hope of the entire world, come what may."

PRAISES ITALIANS HERE

After praising the part Italians have played in Maryland, Governor O'Conor warned that this is no time "for division of opinion based upon any other foundation than the country's best good.

"My 20 years of experience in the public life of this State with Italian-Americans has given me the opportunity to know of their devotion to this country and their adherence to its ideals and principles. I can vouch for their complete and undivided loyalty and support in any cause affecting the interests of this Nation."

PASS RESOLUTION

By acclamation the audience passed a resolution introduced by Dr. Frank C. Marino and seconded by Vincent L. Palmisano, which said in part:

"Resolved, That we, the Italian-American men and women of Baltimore, pledge our full strength and cooperation in the fulfillment of a proper and adequate national-defense program; and we urge all people in the United States who have found a new way of living under the American system of government and who are now a part of the industrial, commercial, agricultural, financial, and general economic and social life of the United States, to proclaim and reaffirm allegiance to our flag, and to cooperate loyally with the President and Congress of the United States in upholding the Constitution under which we are governed and under which the ideals of life and liberty are guaranteed and protected."

ADDRESS BY HON. A. A. BERLE, JR., ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE, AT THE DINNER OF THE ITALIAN BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL MEN'S COMMITTEE, BALTIMORE, MD., JUNE 17, 1940

The great glory of the United States has been its ability to make a Nation out of many elements. To do this, we have followed a course entirely different from those which once were customary in great countries. We have not suppressed the different inheritances of different races; rather, we have gloried in them. We have not asked immigrants coming to our shores to forget the cultural traditions of the countries from which they came. Instead, we have asked that they bring into this country the best of their inheritance. As a result we do not have here, and God willing, we shall never have race enmities, race hatreds, or race groups. We are all Americans, whatever our ancestry.

One of the groups on which the United States has come to rely with particular affection and respect is the group of Americans who are sprung from Italian stock. They figure today in many of the most important posts in our national life. Some of the most important positions of public honor and trust are held by these men, as is witnessed by the presence here of Congressman D'ALESANDRO, and of Mayor LaGuardia; of Mayor Rossi, in San Francisco, and Mayor Maestri, in New Orleans. They stand high on our university faculties, and in the life of our business communities.

The United States now has to face a new technique of international friction. Attempts are sometimes made to develop, within this country, race groups and race hatreds. With it usually goes the attempt to mobilize groups of people for foreign political purposes. I need hardly tell you that activity of that kind when it proceeds from foreign sources or follows foreign guidance, is directly opposed to the American ideal. You know, better than I, that if anyone tried to get up a race group here to act on orders from overseas, he would not be serving the interests of any American.

I want to ask your help, and the help of all Americans of Italian ancestry in the United States, and indeed the help of all groups who have, and are proud of, a common-race background. I want you to help in making it clear to every outside element in the world that Americans are undividedly loyal to the United States; and that this loyalty does not differ in the least because the names may be Italian, or English, or German, or Irish, or French, or Polish, or Scandinavian.

We in this country know that these groups are loyal Americans. We know they came here to become Americans; and we are proud of the things they have done. In this country we need no assurances of loyalty.

It is perfectly clear that anyone who thinks Americans can be detached from America, or tricked into "fifth columns" because they are supposed to have some particular race background, does not know America.

The United States exists because wave after wave of immigration came to settle the country. They had been caught in a system overseas which forced them to hate each other; here they are friends. Abroad, their blood and their children's blood had been spilled in fighting each other, from generation to generation; here the children intermarry, and families live side by side in decent human peace. On the American seal it is written, "Out of many we are one." Mayor LaGuardia, one of the great leaders in the country, is to speak to you tonight, and particularly to Americans of Italian background. In his presence I am glad to salute this group of Americans, of Italian ancestry and name, as one of the bulwarks of the etssential unity of the United States, which no power on earth can tear apart.

[From the Baltimore Sun of June 19, 1940]

MR. LAGUARDIA RESTATES THE IDEA OF AMERICA

Mayor LaGuardia put the American idea into about as few words as has often been managed at the Italian dinner Monday evening. Guests of the evening included the Assistant Secretary of State, Adolf A. Berle, Jr., and Mrs. Berle. Mrs. Berle's people (the Bishops) came over on Captain Jones' Mayflower, the mayor insisted, Mr. Berle's, on Captain Hudson's Half Moon—"but our people came over on (Captain Columbus') Santa Maria."

There are, to be sure, differences in the dates when various groups of pioneers first reached these shores. The Italians were among the first and among the last; the Dutch and the English got here about the same time, the English in the largest numbers. The Germans began coming in numbers in the first quarter of the nineteenth century in as fine a single contribution as we have had from any source. The Irish began to arrive at about the same time, and the Scandinavians, Poles, Lithuanians, and a dozen others have come in more recent times.

Moreover, individuals of all races have come before and after the major migrations from their original homes. And, individual or mass migrants, they and their children are now all as American as the Cabots and O'Raffertys, of Boston; or the Carrolls and LaGuardias, of New York and Baltimore. What Baltimore Americans of Italian extraction proclaim at a formal dinner they have already proclaimed in our industry, our business, our art, and our culture. We have known these things all along; but it does us good to be reminded all over again in darkening times.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS STAR-TIMES

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, since wide circulation has been given to an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 11, and because of the high standing throughout this country enjoyed by this great newspaper, I believe that it is timely as well as relevant, since the Post-Dispatch editorial "To the Brink" has by leave been reproduced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to present to the Congress and the country at large, through this medium, another expression of representative public opinion in these times of stress presented by another great St. Louis newspaper, the St. Louis Star-Times. As between these two editorial opinions there lies a choice to be made by the people of this country in the light of the course of events. The editorial follows:

[From the St. Louis Star-Times]

LINDBERGH AND THE POST-DISPATCH

This Nation of some 131,000,000 people is facing perhaps the greatest crisis encountered in the century and a half of its existence. The fact that the crisis is approaching down the street instead of being right on top of us does not lessen its magnitude or ominous character.

To prepare to meet that crisis by combat or to turn it aside by preparations so adequate as to discourage would-be aggressors is the task before the Nation today. To meet that task the duly elected President of the United States, in consultation with diplomatic, military, naval, and civilian advisers, has charted a course.

In the main the rank and file of the people and the leading business and political leaders of the Nation, regardless of party, are behind President Roosevelt's leadership during this period of peril.

But a few powerful obstructionist forces have arisen to question the correctness of the President's policies and to discredit his leadership. Among them are Col. Charles Augustus Lindbergh and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Air-Mail Pilot Lindbergh's feat in successfully spanning the Atlantic has made him a top man in the news and insures readers and listeners for his every word. But this feat does not necessarily qualify him as an expert in foreign relations, preparation for war, or, in fact, anything except long-distance piloting of an airplane.

Yet because of his publicity value and access to a microphone, he can indulge in a series of public pronouncements to the general effect that President Roosevelt, Secretary Hull, Chief of Staff General Marshall, Chief of Naval Operations Admiral Stark, and countless other Presidential advisers do not know what they are talking about and that he knows all the right answers, one of which is that it makes no difference to the United States whether Hitler or the Allies win in Europe.

The position of the Post-Dispatch is still more extraordinary. Here is a newspaper which blandly assumes that its impassioned assaults on Mr. Roosevelt's Charlottesville speech last week represent public opinion in this region. The President took us "to the brink," it says. The President "exposed his hand," it goes on 3 days later, citing the response the first editorial evoked, and "the people * * * are answering him through the Post-Dispatch."

A modest claim, indeed. There appears in the Post-Dispatch no slight doubt of its own omniscient wisdom in correctly interpreting the President's mind. There appears no doubt of its wisdom in deciding that this country need not feel apprehension about the conquest of Europe by Nazi arms and the explosive revolutionary doctrines of Hitler. There appears, even, no glimmering suspicion that an eight-to-one favorable response from some of its own readers might not represent a fair cross section of opinion in this region about Mr. Roosevelt's policy.

To propagate its opposition to the President, the Post-Dispatch goes beyond the normal processes of a newspaper. It has furnished all Members of Congress with copies of its editorial efforts. It attempts to create, in effect, a second editorial voice through the use of radio—reading over its own station the text or sections of its utterances—a practice, which, to say the least, is unusual.

The Post-Dispatch, in seeking to sustain its suspicions of the President, even accuses Mr. Roosevelt of aping Mussolini, working up "a war fever without permitting the * * * people to express their true convictions." Yet at the same time it is using every instrument at its command—freely and openly, without let or hindrance, under the guaranties of the Constitution—to express its own convictions and to allow readers to express their convictions. A more extreme distortion of the President's actions would be impossible.

What are the facts about the Charlottesville speech which has caused the Post-Dispatch to assail Mr. Roosevelt with such language as "reckless, jingoistic President," "insane half-war stuff," and "oratory is about all Roosevelt has got"?

The speech was made, quite evidently, in the knowledge that the French Army was at the point of capitulation. Mr. Roosevelt, unable to speak openly of this fact, did the next best thing—promised the Allies economic assistance in language so clear and forthright that, if there was any hope of salvaging their defenses, the French Government would be encouraged to go on.

This was not a change of front. It was a reassertion of the policy of economic aid which he repeatedly has championed ever since war broke out, which has been overwhelmingly endorsed by public opinion in every scientific sampling poll, which was implicitly ratified by Congress when it repealed the arms embargo for the specific purpose of letting Britain and France tap the resources of American production.

The Star-Times believes that Mr. Roosevelt was right in this Charlottesville speech and that, in advocating aid to the democratic powers, he has continually been right.

The isolationists—that band of Senators and journalists who have obstructed and largely frustrated his efforts—are themselves the real menace to our peace and security. If ever this Nation is forced into war with Nazi Germany, it will be their responsibility.

They made us move hesitantly, half-heartedly, while Hitler built his military machine and then overran Europe. They played on the people's hatred of war to weaken the President's leadership and make it more difficult for him to buttress the Allies with our economic strength.

And now, when the fateful future is upon us, when the world is cracking, when only Britain stands between Hitler and the Western Hemisphere, they rage and fume that the President is taking us "to the brink." Anyone but a fool senses the tremendous changes we shall have to accept to cope with a totalitarian Europe. But our isolation mongers tell us still that we need not fear the Fuehrer, and heap upon the President—our responsible leader—abuse and mockery.

This is the dreadful self-deception, the underestimation of Hitler, through which Chamberlain and Daladier betrayed European democracy. This, if it should be believed by the people, is the American Munich.

Happily, there is little evidence that it is believed. The Star-Times is persuaded that the Post-Dispatch is not, as it claims to be, a chosen instrument through which the people of this region will obstruct the President. The Star-Times believes that the great majority of the people, along with this newspaper, support Mr. Roosevelt's foreign policy.

Our America and Our Duties

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, with France finally compelled to surrender after making a valiant fight against great odds, and with the United States pledged by President Roosevelt to support the Allied cause to the fullest possible extent, the position of this country has been made even more hazardous by the occurrence of the past few days. However universal may be the sympathies of the American people toward Great Britain and France in the war now being fought against Germany and Italy, I find from receiving word from my people that they do not approve the idea that President Roosevelt should be vested with authority to plunge the United States into that conflict. It has been the hope of a vast majority of Americans that this country could remain neutral and would not be involved in European affairs.

We Americans are devoted to the ideals of peace. This is our America, our democracy, ours to govern, ours to advance, ours to perfect, and ours to make more glorious. Every American has a solemn and lofty duty laid upon him—a duty in proportion to his ability, his resources, and his intellect. This is our America. If it is to remain our America we must stamp out the "fifth column" and all the other foreign "isms" which seek to undermine things American. We must not tolerate the espionage or sabotage of foreign agents, nor the treachery of any domestic group.

We do not want war. We have never drawn the sword except to vindicate the violation of sacred rights. We want to lead our own life and attain our national destiny without foreign aggression or involvement. Neither do we covet the territory nor the riches of any other land. We do not want entangling alliances with foreign nations. Neither do we propose to be the victim of foreign aggression or conquest. We do not want a foot of foreign territory, not a mile of any country under the sun, but, by the same token, we will not give up a single inch of American territory to any aggressor on the face of the earth.

The American people and the American Government want peace. We pray that the United States may not be dragged into a war anywhere on the globe. Our flag is the flag of peace, freedom, and international good will. It is the emblem of a free, liberty-loving, and peace-loving people. There cannot be peace except in armed defense. We shall arm, not for war, but for peace. Let us say to any power on earth who challenges our security or threatens our safety, "We want no war with you, but if you challenge our institutions or attack our territory we shall resist on the sea and under the sea, on the land and above the land, with a navy, with an army, and with an air force unconquerable and irresistible."

The Constitution gives Congress the sole power to declare war, but the Chief Executive, so disposed, is in a position to make a dangerous approach to such declaration, as was done by President Roosevelt in his speech at Charlottesville, Va., a few days ago. The President, who has requested for himself nearly all of the prerogatives of Congress short of declaring war, who already has asked authority to mobilize the National Guard and the Army and Navy Reserves, would have Congress immediately adjourn.

I am of the firm conviction that with the European situation as it now is and as it is likely to be during the next few weeks, it seems important that every Congressman should stay on the job, through the entire summer if necessary, instead of leaving one man in charge. It is my firm conviction that it is the duty of Congress to remain in session during this crisis so as to be in instant readiness to perform the duties placed upon it by the Constitution. Any other course would be a serious neglect of the Nation's vital interests.

HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

ADDRESS BY DR. ARNAUD C. MARTS, PRESIDENT OF BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following baccalaureate address to the 1940 graduating class of Bucknell University by Dr. Arnaud C. Marts, president of Bucknell:

Members of the class of 1940, you have had to listen to me many times since that September evening in 1936 when I first faced you in the Vaughan Literature Auditorium. You were the first freshman class I welcomed on arrival, and I can still recall your vibrant, eager, almost electric expectancy as you poised that evening on the threshold of your college experiences. Now, this morning we approach the parting of the ways. A perfect flood of ideas wells up within me on this occasion, things that I might say at this moment of parting. Most of them I must leave unsaid, for the time is short. The next few moments seem very sacred to me, and I shall choose my thoughts and my words most carefully. You may be sure that what I shall say to you now will be said in the full consciousness that this is my last opportunity to make any contribution to your Bucknell education.

You entered Bucknell at a time when you and we believed that this generation of civilized mankind, would live together in peace and decency, and that you could devote yourselves to the arts of peace. Now, as you leave, you find yourselves in a world of awful war.

I shall not harrow your emotions by describing this shameful tragedy which the greed of a relatively few men has brought crashing down on the heads of hundreds of millions of men and women who wanted to live in peace and brotherhood. We can only say with Caesar as he stood on a battlefield where 80,000 dead lay, after his battle with Pompey. Caesar had not wanted that battle, but had been forced to it by Pompey. "Alas," said Caesar, as he surveyed the awful shambles, "he would have it so."

Certain men, whose coarseness of spirit we simply cannot comprehend, "would have it so" with our bright world. We must face it as it is, and rededicate our whole strength and ardor to making it a better world in our day. It is not the first time in the history of the race that brave men and women have had to face the collapse of their dreams. Let us repeat those magnificent words uttered by Horace centuries ago, "Though the great world be overthrown, let us still be undismayed." Abraham Lincoln said, at a time of great danger, "This, too, will pass."

Robert Brown sang of the same eternal hope and faith in these words:

> "If I stoop
> Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud,
> It is but for a time; I press God's lamp
> Close to my breast; its splendor soon or late
> Will pierce the gloom; I shall emerge some day."

As I come to these final words to you, I choose to speak to you of a strong, eternal inner strength which will enable you to withstand and prevail. I have called this message "The Fifth Column," because the term has come to signify a mysterious weakness and treachery from within.

The term first came into use 3 years ago when General Franco was marching on Madrid. He is reported to have said, "My army consists of four columns marching upon the city from four directions, and a fifth column of internal weakness which will betray and crumple the city from within."

What has the "fifth column" to do with what I want to say to you? Simply this: There is a "fifth column" which can betray an individual, just as surely as there is one which can betray a nation. The individual's "fifth column" is his lack of a great and eternal faith, his cynicism toward moral issues, his confusion regarding everlasting values, his moral and spiritual flabbiness.

It is no picnic or circus that lies ahead of us. Neither is there any reason for panic or fright. It is to be one of the most challenging eras in the history of the human race. All of us are beginning to comprehend this dimly, "as through a glass darkly," and are beginning to take inventory of our spiritual resources for this titanic struggle ahead. It is to be an elemental contest in the long run, an endurance test which, after machines have done their horrible worst, will be decided in the end by the sheer strength of moral character, unselfish courage, and of a sublime faith in life's noblest values.

In this time of inventory and testing, our people are yearning and hungering for these basic virtues. All over the land men and women, one by one, are tearing away the shams, rejecting falsehoods, casting aside the tinsel and crying in their souls, "Give us truth and sincerity and honor." We must destroy this "fifth column" of inner weakness before it destroys us.

During all our 4 years together my chief concern about you has been at this point, because I am well acquainted with the world which you are now entering, and know all too well the weaknesses and cynicisms that are sapping the strength and thwarting the lives of millions who are living without strong faith and high idealism. I have seen cynicism weaken the past two generations of American youth. I have seen cynicism and cruel faithlessness utterly destroy the youth of two great nations. I have tried to save you from this cynicism and flabbiness and failure by upholding before you, as strongly as I knew how, high idealism and an unshakable faith in a better world.

During your lifetime you have been subjected to a bombardment of bitter cynicism which utterly befuddled many youths of your generation. Some of our most brilliant novelists of the present day have made cynicism their profession, a highly paid vocation of bitter words and half truths and scornful judgments. For pay, they have sold a whole generation of youth down the river into a slavery of bitterness, cynicism, and confusion.

Now, under the shock of today's tragedies, this shallow mood is challenged, and many of the bright young scoffers are changing their tune.

One of them, now the honored Librarian of Congress, recently made public confession of the cynical tricks they had played on the lives of your generation of youth in these words: "The post-war writers, of whom I was one, who educated a generation to suspect the tags, the slogans, and even the words, left that generation defenseless before an aggressor whose whole strength consists in destroying respect for law, respect for morality, respect for the Word."

Many of the Nation's teachers joined in this cult of cynicism also. Their original purpose was probably a sound educational one—to break down the smug satisfaction most young students have in a very little knowledge, and to make an honest doubt the cornerstone of a wider knowledge. But too many of our teachers in America in recent years (not at Bucknell, I am proud to say) have used all of their zeal in tearing down immature faiths and have shown no zeal or capacity to inspire their students to reconstruct a mature and genuine faith in the great values which have been proved over and over again in the past 10,000 years of the race's quest for truth and stability.

Dorothy Thompson has recently written: "Our universities have been given over for years now to a philosophy of historic relativism, under which there are no absolute standards for anything. It takes a very strong human being to live in a world where there is no right or wrong, no God in the sky, no rules that everybody must obey, but where everything is relative. Most people completely lose their bearings in such a universe."

Walter Lippmann has added, "This tragic ordeal has come about because men thought it clever to be cynical, and enlightened to be unbelieving, and sensible to be soft."

You have probably not been aware of it, but my whole purpose in trying to serve Bucknell has been to help you at this point of your greatest need and maximum danger. I have done all I have known how to do as your leader, by word and by example, to give you faith in life's noblest and eternal values, to save you from the mass betrayal of cynicism, cheapness, and softness. Now, at the end, I cannot let you face this world without once more giving you my last solemn testament that there are a few great faiths worthy of your everlasting trust:

First. The first great faith, in which you can believe with all your hearts, is American democracy. Modern cynicism has made it extremely unpopular to express a love for America. One who does may be called a Babbitt, or a Rotarian, or a Hundred Percenter. It has been part of the pattern of our recent superficial living to laugh at those who profess a love for America. How often have you heard someone say, "Maybe the Russians have something," or "I guess we need a Mussolini here," or "I'd like to see Hitler turned loose in New York."

At a recent meeting in Indiana of representatives of over 200 colleges and universities, one college president made this report: "There are plenty of people in the schools of America who believe America is not worth saving."

As for me, if America is not worth saving, then there is no known society worth saving. What has communism done for Russia that we should feel anything but abhorrence for it? What has national socialism done for Germany that we should have any feeling except loathing for it? As I look at the tragedies in other lands brought by these weird experiments, I feel toward America as did the man who landed in Baltimore recently after a year in Germany and fell to his knees and kissed the dirt of this Nation.

You members of the class of 1940 have never seen America at its best. About the time you were born, the real America of long, happy tradition underwent a change, from which it has not yet recovered. It has been a sick America during all your lifetime, to date. The pre-World War America of personal integrity, of social modesty and dignity, of humanitarian zeal, of happy family life, of quiet enthusiasm for cultural and intellectual values, of simple religious faith, of ambition and confidence in the future—this was the true America which you have never known. One form of national illness in the 1920's brought on another form of national illness in the 1930's, and in your 20 years of life you have not yet experienced a well America. Some day you will, I hope and believe. But even with our national illness and our obvious shortcomings, America represents the highest stage of human and social happiness on this planet, worthy of our love and faith and loyalty. America sick is a nobler land than any well nation that I know. Here in our Nation lies the very hope of civilization itself. Do not let a "fifth column" of doubt about America betray you into withholding your uttermost devotion to it.

When I came to Bucknell 4½ years ago there were many needs clamoring for action. It was obvious that I would have to ask many friends for many gifts for many purposes. The very first thing I asked for was an American flag that I could stand on the platform on occasions like this. An alumnus of Bucknell responded to my request and bought this beautiful flag—the finest he could find. It was the first gift to Bucknell under my leadership.

When Old Main was rebuilt I instructed the architect to provide a place for the flag over the center of Roberts Hall. On the first day we moved into the Roberts Hall I took an American flag in my hands, climbed the ladder up through the trap-door which leads onto the roof, and personally broke out the flag on the halyard, and gave instructions that the flag should fly there every clear day.

I love America.

The second eternal faith which you can embrace with all your hearts is a faith in a living and loving God, Creator and Father of a moral universe.

"What!" you cry. "Believe in a living and loving God in this day; Creator of a moral universe; believe in that, now?" Yes, believe in that now, more firmly and unshakably than ever before. If this present world tragedy can teach us anything at all, it is to put more faith rather than less in the great God of a moral universe.

Perhaps I am not talking about the same kind of God of whom you are thinking. Some are saying, "There just can't be a living God, or He would stop this war." Others' idea of God is someone to pray to to stop a headache. Still others plead to God to save them from the sorrow of the death of a loved one. Some ask God to send rain when their cornfields need it, or to send the sun on spring festival and homecoming days. Some want God to help them in examinations. The little 6-year-old boy ended his evening bedside prayer with this petition, "Now, God, please bring me my pajamas which are hanging in the clothes closet."

I am not asking you to have faith in that kind of a God. The God in whom I ask you to believe is not a nursemaid, nor a substitute for an aspirin tablet, nor a rain maker, nor a tutor, nor a professional hostess whose duty is to make the customers feel happy all the time.

I do ask you to put your eternal faith in a majestic God, who is operating this world on moral laws which are just as exacting and precise and observable as are the physical laws on which the universe operates on schedule time day after day, year after year, century after century, age after age, without deviation and without default. The same great Mind that created these precise physical laws created equally precise moral laws. The very core of the moral law is "Love thy neighbor as thyself." It is as silly of us to disobey that basic moral law as it would be to disobey the basic physical law of gravity.

Don't lose your faith in God, because when men disobey His great majestic rules of the universe they bring suffering upon themselves. That would be a queer perversion of logic. On the other hand, can you imagine the grace and beauty of this human world if all men would obey this law of neighborly love simultaneously?

Put your faith in Him openly against the cynics. Bow your head to His will; submit your life to His law of unselfishness; worship Him on Sunday and every day; believe evermore in His plan for brotherhood. Soon you will feel a new zest, a new power, a new sense of dignity, of values, of eagerness to live and lift and serve. For you will be hooking up your life to the cosmic high-tension lines of the universe, through which flow the everlasting powers of creative life itself. There can be no "fifth column" of doubt, of cynicism, of befuddlement in the heart and mind of a person who has made dynamic contact with the living and loving God. That person knows the meaning of life. The lives of millions of people, including my own, have been transformed, quickened, electrified by making this contact with the eternal God of majesty, of moral law, and of tender love.

If there are any among you who sincerely want to make contact with such a God and cannot seem to do it, if you will get in touch with me I will try to help you.

Third. You may have faith that there is a right and a wrong in human affairs, and that in the long run the right will prevail. Civilization is a constant contest between right and wrong; a see-saw battle in which first one then the other triumphs for the time being. Evil is enthroned now, to be sure, for its brief day of glory. I may never see the world forces of right prevail again in my lifetime, but you will in yours. "God does not pay every Saturday night," goes a French proverb. But He pays eventually, in His own time and in His own coin.

This evil is now enthroned, but it has millions of unwilling subjects. I predict a most uncomfortable reign for it, and I prophesy that you, in your day, will see right enthroned again—provided you will banish any "fifth column" of doubt that there is no difference between right and wrong.

Recently we have seen a befuddled young king make a most difficult moral decision at a time of terrific stress. When the country his father had defended was invaded, he asked help from his neighbors. Eighteen days later, when 300,000 of his neighbors had responded and were fighting on his soil, he laid down his arms and left them alone to their fate. It is not for us to judge him; history will do that over the long, impersonal perspective of time. But we can learn a lesson from his tragedy. His real tragedy was at a moment 4 years before, during days of peace and relative tranquillity, when he canceled the treaty his rugged father had written in blood with his democratic neighbors. This young king could not see any difference between democracy and despotism, between decency and evil, between a right and a wrong. This confusion of moral values in time of peace became a "fifth column" of weakness which betrayed him in time of stress.

You will not be called on to make any such decision as he had to make. But your decisions will mean as much to your own happiness and usefulness as his did to him. Whenever you rationalize as right what you know to be wrong, whenever you surrender your decency and your honesty because someone has discovered smooth ways in which you can be indecent and dishonest, you are creating within your personality a "fifth column" that will eventually betray you.

The historian Froude has described a group of men and women—the Calvinists of the past three centuries, who had abiding faith in the right as they understood it, and whose strong convictions laid the foundations of our civilization on this continent—in these words: "When all else has failed; when patriotism has covered its face; when human courage has broken down; when intellect has yielded; when emotion and sentiment have dreamt themselves into forgetfulness that there is any difference between lies and truth, the form of belief called Calvinism has borne ever an inflexible front to illusion and mendacity, and has preferred rather to be ground to powder like flint than to melt before enervating temptation."

Never have we so desperately needed a generation of intelligent young men and women with an undying faith in right versus wrong as we now need you. And never has a generation of youth so much needed, for its own soul's good, to gamble its all that there is a difference between right and wrong; and that it will rather be ground to powder like flint than to lower its high ideals of right. There is a black and there is a white in human conduct. There is a wrong and there is a right. When everything is gray, neither wrong nor right, the "fifth column" has moved in and will betray you. I hope and believe that you will put your faith in the right as you understand it, and gamble your life on it, win or lose.

Fourth. Put you faith also in these arts of peace which you have learned at Bucknell, these enthusiasms for wholesome, creative expressions such as music, literature, sport, science, art, and the like which enrich and ennoble human life. Keep these interests and cultivate them as your hobbies. There may be hard external times ahead, but no matter—if you can carry these cultural nourishments in your minds and souls. "Man shall not live by bread alone." You know how to fill your knapsacks with food that will never perish, except by your own neglect.

"If, between dawn and darkness, you can find
Somewhere, some secret loveliness to lie
Cool on the heart, some attribute of sky,
Hushing the vicious wheeling of the mind;
Some attribute of earth—a willow-frond,
Lifted by wind; three snow-white birches bowed
Over a pool; a shell, a stone, a cloud—
You will have found the rainbow's pot of gold;
Wise men, since earth was very young, would give Kingdoms for such. Nothing betrays them—cold,
Nor heat, nor storm. Possess them while you live;
Then, dying, test them from the closer range,
Change within substance defying change."

—John Williams Andrews.

Finally, have faith in your children. In the years ahead many of you will become mothers and fathers of little children, whose minds and souls will be innocent of the failures and sins and shallowness of our day. Keep cynicism and falsehood and selfish flabbiness away from their tiny, sweet worlds. Breathe into their souls from their first instants of awarness these great truths and loves and faiths by which men become free and noble and happy. Twenty years from now begin to send us a generation of Bucknellians prepared in spirit and in character to become builders of the city of light. Together, you as parents, we as teachers, can create such a generation ready to live like intelligent and unselfish brothers under the fatherhood of a living God.

It is queer how many ways there are to describe the Bucknell way of life. This talk has just been another way of saying, "Be true to the Bucknell way of life." It also has been just another way of saying, "Be true to the Christian way of life." For faith in high idealism and integrity and brotherhood are precisely the values for which Jesus lived and taught and died. A great man of another desperate day was often discouraged, but his courage was renewed time after time until final victory by his loyalty to Christ. Said he, "Again and again I have been tempted to give up the struggle, but always the figure of that Strange Man hanging on the Cross sent me back to my work again."

"O Risen Christ,
By the power of Thine empty tomb,
We beseech Thee,
Out of this death bring life,
Out of this jungle-promise, philtres of love,
And simples of healing, and garlands."
—Florence Converse.

And now your Bucknell education is over. Tomorrow I shall hand you your diplomas. In the years to come you will think of your experiences and of your friends here with appreciation and tenderness and affection. If you should include me in your memories, please do not think only of me as the president under whom this or that building was erected, or this or that accreditment of Bucknell was obtained, or this or that move in behalf of faculty or of students was taken. Think of me, rather, if you can do so sincerely, as your friend who gave what he possessed of strength and devotion, in a day of cynicism and of false and shoddy values, to keep you from being betrayed. That is why I have carried on with you and for you in these grueling 4 years. If memories of Bucknell cause a flicker of quickening of strong faith and high idealism as you think of me, I shall be fully repaid.

Now you cease to be college students, and you take your places as colleagues with the rest of us who are battling for the eternal values of human civilization. It's going to be a grand battle. I congratulate you on the privilege of living in this hour, when we are to drop all the trappings of sham and pretense and oppose courage and honor and character and faith in their sheerest, elemental form to the naked forces of falsehood and cruelty and despotism. Great days lie ahead for moral heroes. May each Bucknellian of the class of 1940 be a moral hero.

The National-Defense Program

OF
HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER
OF SOUTH CAROLINA

RESOLUTION OF THE SOUTH CAROLINA BANKERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a resolution adopted by the members of the South Carolina Bankers Association at its fortieth annual convention at Myrtle Beach, June 3, 1940.

It would appear that this resolution is in line with the President's program, and I am sure will meet with the hearty approval of Members of Congress, in that we are very anxious to do everything possible to carry out the defense program as suggested by the President in such manner as to be able to get prompt and efficient results in building up our defense so as to be able to defend and preserve our country and a democracy for which our forefathers fought, which has been serving the purpose of our people all of these years against the invasion of any foreign foe.

The resolution follows:

Whereas our country is faced with the gravest necessity to quickly build up its defenses and to avoid, by unity of purpose, the inefficiencies of past performances: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the South Carolina Bankers' Association, affirm our belief—

That the defense program should be carried forward under practical labor conditions and efficient management by leaders and directors of ability and experience in their fields, appointed without regard for party or sectional lines and unhampered by burdensome regulations and conditions of labor employment;

That selfish local beneficiary measures and all ideas and actions for political or section gain must be abandoned in the interest of this most pressing program;

That the public is reconciled to the large expenditures in prospect and requires only that waste and extravagance be avoided;

That, accordingly, the tax burden should be fixed without political fear; and, finally,

That our citizens are of one mind in the matter of national defense, understanding the problem of their representatives and ready to make the necessary sacrifices, but watchful to see that the program is not jeopardized by political appointments; be it further

Resolved, That bankers, businessmen, and farmers should write their Congressmen assuring support of action taken along these lines, and that copies of this resolution be sent to our Senators and Representatives in Washington.

A Job for Government—Training Skilled Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, throughout the entire country factories engaged in producing the goods that America needs are clamoring for skilled workers. From every personnel executive comes the cry for trained men, men equipped to handle the machines necessary to give America the thousands of products which make our material civilization possible. With the outbreak of Europe's "total" war has come a startling recognition in our own country that we must repair our defenses promptly. The emphasis given to mechanized military forces by the Nazi drive into France has already been reflected in our industrial centers. And as the Nation faces the gigantic task of defensive rearmament, the need for trained and skilled workers is imperatively demanding attention.

Twenty years ago Congress enacted legislation providing for Federal assistance to public-trades schools established in every section of the country. Under this program, when a community established a school for the training of mechanics and apprentices, meeting the standards set by law for teaching, hours of study, and type of curriculum, the Federal Government lent its financial assistance. Thousands of foresighted educators in America who had urged the development of an intensive industrial training program cheered this legislation enthusiastically. They saw it as the beginning of a long-range program to make industrial education respectable. For years teachers had been speaking of the nobility of labor, but in practice the high schools of the Nation, with virtually no exceptions, have emphasized and glorified academic training designed to enlist its graduates in college courses. Few and far between were those teachers who truly believed in the value of an industrial training. For the most part only those boys who were regarded as scholastically inept were urged to enroll in mechanical courses.

With this atmosphere prevalent, industrial training was doomed from the start. When State after State enacted legislation providing that every high-school teacher must have a college diploma, the death knell of the trade schools was sounded. For no matter what the reason may be, very few of the teachers available for work in trade schools could produce these precious diplomas. They were for the most part journeymen mechanics skilled in their trades, most of them thoroughly capable of teaching the work they knew without the blessing of the diploma. But this adverse legislation led to an almost complete breakdown of trade education. The high schools began to offer what was little more than elementary manual training, using this as a relatively small part of a larger program based upon other subjects.

To meet their needs thousands of plants installed company schools to train the men their industries required. Private trade schools sprang up, and for those who already had jobs furnishing a backbone of economic sufficiency, correspondence schools came into existence on a large scale to supplement daytime work.

Today we have recognized the failure of our systems. Neither the company schools, the private schools, nor the few public trade schools which have survived the academic invasion have proved capable of furnishing the men America needs today.

Here is one of the most startling commentaries on the present American scene which faces us. Thousands of young men emerge each year from high school utterly unable to find jobs. Yet simultaneously there are thousands of jobs requiring skilled men going unfilled. These are not positions which offer little pay for long hours. On the contrary, they are opportunities which offer good pay even at the very outset of employment, with prospects for substantial increases as skills become certain and fixed.

Here is a challenge to government which should not go unanswered. The New Deal has spent millions of dollars in its effort to assist youth. It has created a National Youth Administration, a Civilian Conservation Corps. Yet neither of these costly enterprises offers any training which will enable their beneficiaries to establish themselves on the day when this assistance ceases. Turn that money into the establishment of trade schools where young men can learn a livelihood. Turn that money into the task of making industrial training the noble expression which orators are constantly praising.

Let the diploma from the trade school become as cherished as the high-school diploma which offers no specific training. No one for a moment means to suggest that today's high-school training is worthless. It has unquestionable values. Yet there is a place in our country for a different kind of training sponsored by public funds. We have seen the need for encouraging this type of education. Now is the opportunity for all of us to cooperate in establishing it.

Gonzaga High School Graduation Exercises

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK, OF NEW YORK

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I made on Monday evening, June 17, to the graduating class of Gonzaga High School at Memorial Constitution Hall:

Reverend Fathers, distinguished guests, parents, friends, and members of the graduating class, this is one of the great days in the lives of you boys of the graduating class and one that will always be remembered, especially your close associations with each other, the trials and troubles of your studies, and your social gatherings. All will be fond memories in later days.

No doubt many of you boys will continue to study elsewhere in institutions of higher education. Some of you will seek employment, as conditions may be such that will necessitate your so doing.

You can make your life path easy or you can make it hard. It all depends upon you yourself. You can make your life a success or a failure. That also depends upon you.

You should never go out with defeat in your mind, but always with the idea of succeeding, because if you feel at the start that you are going to fail, you are defeated before you have started.

You must never feel you have superior knowledge to others or that you are more important. If you do, you will find that a handicap in life.

Mark Twain, the great American humorist, told the following story concerning himself: When he was 16 years of age, he thought his father was one of the most ignorant men with whom he had come in contact. Five years later, when Mark reached the age of 21, he was astounded and surprised that his father had become so intelligent within a period of 5 years.

Eliminate selfishness and greed from your everyday life and in so doing you will find comfort as the years go on.

Be honest, be tolerant, be fair and just, as you are living in a country where there are great opportunities for anyone who is ambitious or desirous of making a success of his life.

This country is made up of people from all parts of the world and under our Constitution there is no discrimination against nationality, creed, or race. I doubt if there is another country in the world where the freedom of religion is so recognized as in our United States, and I hope it will continue. However, we have in some of our higher institutions of education men who are trying to instill nonreligious ideas in the minds of the youth. God forbid the day that religion would be destroyed, because if that day ever comes, civilization would be lost.

Let me say to you graduates that if you are true to your God and church, you are bound to be true to yourself and to your country.

It is only a matter of a few years when the youth of today will be the men of tomorrow, taking over the reins and management of this Government. For that reason, no matter what university or college you may attend, bear in mind your early religious instructions and training. By so doing you will not only save yourself, but help save this Government under which you live, and contribute a great deal to civilization.

Never let intolerance or hatred enter your life. Always remember that you owe a duty to your fellowman, and no matter what your position in life may be, if you perform it honestly and to the best of your ability, you are making your contribution to the country and to the world as a whole.

The ordinary or common laborer toiling in the street is making his contribution just as much as the President of a bank or railroad, as his work is necessary if we are to continue the progress that civilization has made.

Some years ago I heard a small boy recite the following piece:

"You needn't laugh because I'm small.
Being big, sir, isn't all.
I'm just as much a man as any man,
If I do everything I can."

When you leave this school today it is almost like a step into a new world, and do not forget the teachers of this school who have given unselfishly so much of their time and energy to prepare you for this great day.

Also your parents. How they have looked forward to this important event in your life. Some of them have, no doubt, made a great sacrifice in order that you might attend this fine school and be one of Gonzaga's graduates today.

Some of you may go far in this world, but no matter what heights you reach never forget your father and mother who always have your interest and welfare at heart.

I wish to take this opportunity of thanking Father Wiesel for his kindness in inviting me to speak on this occasion. I also wish to congratulate Father Garner and the faculty for the fine work they are doing with the boys of Gonzaga.

In conclusion, may God guide you boys of the graduating class to a nobler and better life. I personally wish each one of you every success and happiness in the future.

Action, Not Words, Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE S. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM WILMINGTON (DEL.) JOURNAL-EVERY EVENING

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Journal-Every Evening, of Wilmington, Del., for June 18:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Journal-Every Evening of June 18, 1940]

ACTION, NOT WORDS, NEEDED

Of those well-meaning and patriotic citizens who are clamoring for a declaration of war by the United States, two questions may well be asked: What do we do after that, and What do we do it with? Until some satisfactory answers to both these queries are furnished, all talk of declaring war on Hitler or Mussolini is just so much froth.

Perhaps it can be contended that an American declaration would hearten England. But it could scarcely tell the British more than they already know. They understand that they have our full sympathy and that we are taking every possible step to help them secure the implements of war. Even the President, of whose affection for the democracies and hatred of the dictatorships there can be no doubt, has said that we are doing all we can.

As for Hitler and Mussolini—who imagines that they would be disturbed by having the United States declare war on them? They have lived long enough to pay no attention to words which cannot be translated into immediate and effective action. They heard

Premier Chamberlain say that Great Britain would come to the rescue of Poland—and nothing happened to hinder them in their vicious plans. They heard themselves berated by Mr. Roosevelt, Secretary Ickes, and various other American public officials—and what did they care or have to fear?

So it is today. A formal declaration of war by the United States could effect scarcely any change in our status. The people do not want to send their sons to fight overseas and the military equipment we have is not substantial enough to make even a sizable dent in the situation.

All the world knows—few better than Hitler—that America is unprepared for war. Our wise course is to remedy that condition with the utmost speed. Let our munition plants do our talking for us. Or, as BRUCE BARTON has so wisely said: "Distrust the speeches of politicians and do everything you can to hurry the making of planes and more planes, ships and more ships, guns and more guns. The less Hitler hears from our politicians, and the more he hears from our factories, the better. Weapons are the only language he can understand."

The Bituminous Coal Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

BROOKINGS INSTITUTION REPORT

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for many months I have been attempting to explain to the Members of this House the futility of the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937. The House of Representatives demonstrated its attitude about 6 weeks ago when it cut the appropriation for the Bituminous Coal Division for the next fiscal year. Unfortunately—especially in this time of emergency—the Senate restored the funds. Over $2,000,000 which could well be spent on airplanes, tanks, and antiaircraft guns are about to be poured down the sink of futility for another year.

Recently I have been greatly encouraged to see my views upheld by the Brookings Institution. My contentions are upheld in the following report which appeared in the Chicago Tribune on June 17. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include this report for the information of the Members of this House.

[From the Chicago Tribune of June 17, 1940]

FEDERAL PRICE-CONTROL EVILS ARE DISCLOSED—POLICY IS ASSAILED IN NEW STUDY

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 16.—The Brookings Institution, asserting that there was a trend toward Government regulation of industrial prices and production, said today that "the more widely such policies are followed the less is the net benefit" to owners and employees and "the larger is the cost to the community as a whole." The conclusions were reached in a study of the relationship of government to economic life made by the private research organization.

Citing regulation of the bituminous-coal industry as an attempt to protect the domestic market of an industry "which finds the demand for its products declining," the report said:

"Short-run gains to coal workers and operators appear possible, but it is improbable that there will be any long-run gains. The use of substitutes is likely to increase, while higher wages may further stimulate mechanization of the industry and force diminution of direct employment.

OUTPUT CONTROL REQUIRED

"Consumers may pay permanently higher prices for the product. More significant, however, is the possibility that Government price regulation in such a highly competitive industry cannot be made effective without Government control of output."

The study also reached these conclusions:

1. That preparation for war "inevitably means greatly augmented Government control of economic life."

2. That Government controls over public utilities should be modified "so that utilities will find less to be gained through efforts to obtain favorable valuation and rate actions by regulatory commissions and more to be gained by exploring possibilities of reduced rates and expanded service."

STATES OTHER OBJECTIONS

3. That the "exercise of managerial powers by the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining railroad charges is producing a situation in which neither private management nor public authority can be held clearly accountable for the financial solvency and general operating effectiveness of the regulated enterprises."

Growth of governmental power and responsibilities, the report contended, has taken place "in such piecemeal fashion that its full import has not been grasped," and as a result "there has been a development of Government functions which might not have been approved in its entirety had it been presented as a general program."

New Deal and a Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

LETTER FROM ALBERT E. POTTS, PASTOR, PLYMOUTH CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from a constituent, published in the Herald's Open Forum on June 17, 1940:

EDITOR OF THE HERALD:

For 7 years the New Deal has deluded the American people, demoralized American democracy, discouraged American business, and disorganized American industry. If the New Deal is granted 4 more years of power, the United States will be delivered, lock, stock, and barrel, into some form of Marxism. I make that as a prophecy. Please make a note of it.

The New Deal has deluded the American people into believing that a government is the people's beneficent benefactor and an inexhaustible giver-out of jobs, doles, and pensions. The New Deal has deluded the American people into believing that hard work and thrift are out of date and quite unnecessary practices for all those who wish to attain the abundant life. The New Deal delusion is that governmental regulation alone will achieve the abundant life for each individual. While the New Deal has been preaching such puffle to the American people, Hitler and Mussolini were telling their people "that they have many lean years ahead, and that they must sacrifice and work hard if they wish to achieve the abundant life." The New Deal has made it just about impossible for any American leader to preach such plain truth.

The New Deal has demoralized American democracy by preaching to the American people an utterly un-American class-war propaganda. Millions of American people have been so deeply influenced by the New Deal preachments of class-war propaganda that they now suspect every successful business and professional man of being their social enemy. At this very moment the New Deal's most effective argument against certain Presidential possibilities is that they are successful businessmen.

The New Deal has discouraged and disorganized American business and industry: First, by direct governmental competition; second, by unfair restrictions and regulations; third, by excessive taxation.

Thus has Government expanded while business and industry have declined. As business and industry decline, fewer and fewer people keep their jobs. As the army of the unemployed is increased, the Government must dish out more doles, jobs, and pensions. The more that Government dishes out to the people, the more money it demands from business and industry. Like a parasite, the New Deal destroys the life on which it feeds.

Further, during the reign of the New Deal, hundreds and hundreds of subversive organizations, mostly affiliated with Moscow, have been undermining American democracy: First, by their preachments of class war propaganda; second, by piloting our national-preparedness policies. These subversive organizations, with serpent-like cunning, wormed their way into virtually all of our social institutions, but especially into our Protestant pulpits and into our schools of higher education. With satanic skill they brought their propaganda to bear upon our institutions that form public sentiment and succeeded in divesting the American people of their patriotism and also of their fighting spirit, even the spirit to fight to protect our own national wealth. Thus through a so-called peace program the United States has been disarmed of spiritual preparedness and military preparedness. While all this went on in the United States, Hitler and Mussolini were molding their people into loyal units and into perfect fighting machines.

Now, after 7 years, the New Deal proposes to do something about it, and it starts to clamp down on these subversive elements. What a laugh that is! Now they can all fold up and go back to Moscow and Berlin, because the damage that they set out to do is all accomplished.

For 7 years the New Deal has watched Hitler and Mussolini make elaborate preparations to loot the world of its wealth. It has heard them boast of what they intended to do. But all that the New Deal did about it was to prepare speeches against what it was pleased to call the aggressors. Before the head of any government makes a public speech about "quarantining" an aggressor nation that is armed to the teeth, he should make sure that he is backed up by a people with a fighting spirit, and with the biggest and best army and navy in the world.

Now, to cap it all, the New Deal has the gall to demand a third term.

Adding insult to injury, the New Deal turns to successful businessmen, whom for years it pictured as public enemies, and demands that they by their willing cooperation virtually endorse New Deal policies, and take hold of the situation and by working with a deluded and suspicious people, and a demoralized democracy, and a crippled industry, immediately make up for 7 years of New Deal folly.

Well, all that I can say is, that never in all the history of the world has any people ever had to put up with a more screwy mess than this mess which the New Deal has dished up to us.

It is high time that the American people snapped out of the hypnotic spell that the New Deal has cast over them and elected someone to take charge of our national affairs who will shoot off something besides his mouth.

Pastor, Plymouth Congregational Church.

Protect America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 19, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CLARENCE J. M'LEOD, OF MICHIGAN, JUNE 18, 1940

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. CLARENCE J. MCLEOD, of Michigan, made over the National Broadcasting Co. red network, June 18, 1940:

To their consternation the people of America have awakened to the fact, and it is a fact, that our democracy is imperiled. Modern wars are waged in two ways simultaneously. We know now that the enemy strikes not only with military forces at the border, but that he likewise strikes inside the border with vast and highly trained "fifth columnists."

No nation alert to its own well-being can neglect either of these attacking forces. Thank God the Nation is finally alert and is preparing to meet any enemy which may attack us on any of our four borders. We must not, however, neglect to prepare to put down with every force at our disposal those who, within the Nation, would sacrifice it. The resolution which I am sponsoring is one means by which we can subdue those elements within our population which would lay bare our breast for the stroke of enemies without.

It will do us little good to build up our armed forces to reasonable strength after years of neglect if we continue to permit saboteurs, "fifth columnists," and other subversive elements so to weaken our moral fiber as to bring about our disintegration at the moment of trial.

I believe that we have been following a clear, constructive course in the United States, with the exception of the past few years, and the great Nation we have today is a result of carrying on under the Constitution the wonderfully laid plans of our country's fathers. It was federation and unity of purpose that carried the original Thirteen Colonies through the Revolutionary War. It was to preserve this unity, this federation of States, that the Civil War was fought. This unity must ever be protected.

But now we are warned, and in no uncertain terms, that the even tenor of our national way may be seriously disturbed. Always a law-abiding, law-respecting people, with implicit faith in the Constitution as the basis of all our laws, we now find demand, by a fast-growing sinister minority, for unhampered privilege and affirmation to undermine our democratic freedom. No one will deny that so far we have acquiesced.

"It is among the evils, and perhaps not the smallest, of democratic government, that the people must feel before they will see. When this happens they are aroused to action." Those are the words of our first President. He foresaw at that time the many difficulties that would beset the Republic and the anxious moments that our people would undergo until "roused to action."

There have been many trying periods in the history of America. There were the dark days between the Declaration of Independence and the ratification of the Constitution when even the most ardent patriot was pessimistic that there would ever be a United States of America. Likewise, during the War of the Rebellion there were months when the most enthusiastic champions of the Union were doubtful whether the United States could be preserved. During these struggles we cannot be unmindful of the aid and comfort rendered the enemies from behind the lines. Washington had his Tories, and Lincoln had his Knights of the Golden Circle.

Several weeks ago I introduced in the House of Representatives a resolution which provided that any political party or organization which advocates the overthrow by force of the form of government of the United States as established by the Constitution should not be recognized as a political entity. The resolution further provides that the Congress recommend that the several State legislatures enact legislation prohibiting the recognition of any such organization or party on the official ballot for the election to any office within the State and for the choice of Presidential and Vice Presidential electors and for the election of Senators and Representatives in Congress. This resolution is known as House Concurrent Resolution No. 55.

By enacting this resolution into law, we will have taken the first definite step to prevent the boring from within which is slowly but surely freezing the very arteries of pure democracy. I contend further that by stamping out the subversive groups and movements which are boring from within we will have accomplished the first and most important step for our national defense. I am happy to say, at this time, that the resolution is gaining support each day, and I hope that before the close of this session of Congress it will have become a law

Today, when a large part of the world is again convulsed in one of history's cyclonic episodes which is imprinting an ineffable stain upon the vaunted civilization of our 20 Christian centuries, a person who tells America to waken, that the undermining of democracy is in progress, can no longer be called an alarmist. On the other hand, the person who today still refuses to listen to facts and listlessly scoffs at the un-American progress and entrenchment about us, is nothing less than a traitor.

In the European conflict it has been shown that enemies within the overrun countries have been as dangerous and as damaging as the actual armed forces of the invaders. The "fifth column" in Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France give adequate testimony to the effectiveness of traitors in causing the complete breakdown of all internal defense, leading to ultimate annihilation. We need no more pointed examples to show us that the real enemies of our country are to be found within our own borders. "Fifth column" and streamlined Trojan-horse tactics are by no means unknown to us in this country, as we find damaging European ideologies have sprung up and flourished under the cloak of democracy, with little or no protest from the majority of our people. We must recognize these forces for what they are and take steps now to frustrate their contemptuous plans.

We are indeed blind if the brutal lesson of the past weeks in Europe has been lost on us. Our security as a nation and as a people, together with our American way of living, may well suffer a similar fate unless we stir ourselves to take preventive measures. The strength of America lies in our adherence to the principles which have built America, the principles which have made America great. They are worth protecting.

Each edition of the press and each news broadcast is stressing more graphically than I can hope to, the effectiveness of the "fifth column" movements that were originally introduced into unsuspecting nations under the cloak of political world theories. We observe the manner in which the Nazis have operated in Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium, and find it well nigh incredible that they were able to enlist the support and sympathy of some of the citizens of those countries to the end of having them become a party to the destruction of their own lands. Yes; it is difficult to believe, but it is tragically true.

The Communist Party of the United States has taken exactly the same position as that taken by the Norwegian Communist Party, and the same position as that taken by the Finnish Communist Party—all acting on the party line as Trojan-horse traitors for Stalin. Is it any wonder that at the beginning of the present conflict the French Government jailed its Communist Deputies? The present debacle in which France now finds herself is in no small measure attributable to the militant and aggressive group of Communists who dominated and virtually controlled the popular front. By their ability to elect members to the Chamber of Deputies, they were powerful in preventing the adoption of adequate national-defense measures. In the face of an immediate foreign invasion, the French Communists and their allies threatened a general strike which would have paralyzed their country. Don't tell me these stooges of Stalin had the interests of France at heart.

Please keep in mind that this is the same so-called political party that is represented on the American ballot.

The last 48 tragic hours which have brought the international structure of the world tumbling down, make imperative a readjustment of American thinking.

Congress would be derelict in its duty, would be almost guilty of treason were it to adjourn and leave the Nation's Capitol at this time. We must face the reality of a chaotic condition brought about by barbarous war—war such as has never before been seen in the world—war of a type, which until the last 2 months was inconceivable.

New forces, new events, new methods have been let loose. What do they mean to the United States? What do they portend for our national welfare—what can be done, what must be done if this Nation is to survive in this new kind of polity?

The immediate job before Congress is dual in nature. First, we must make our borders absolutely impregnable to any attack from without. Second, we must wipe out the nests of infection from which subversive elements are spreading poison among the 130,000,000 loyal, but often too acquiescent citizens. We must erect on every hand every conceivable barricade to stop the forces working for internal disintegration.

We may as well face the fact—the truth, that your National Government has been no more alert to the developing of modern war methods than desolated France, imperiled and dismayed England, destroyed Holland, and betrayed Belgium. Your leaders, just as the leaders of these devastated countries, have never advanced beyond the World War days of 1914 in their military thinking. These European leaders have betrayed their own people. They have sent their youth forth to war without any realization of what they would encounter. Those innocent lives were sacrificed horribly to a stupid and apathetic leadership.

The warning is clear. Your national leadership is just as guilty as was the leadership of those once great nations which now are in ruins. Faced with this cataclysmic situation Congress is told by the President to adjourn—to go home. I cannot conceive this to be the method by which we can overcome years of neglect and failure.

We are either for America or against America. There can be no divided allegiance when our country and our American institutions are concerned. If we are for America we must be strong and courageous enough to declare that no longer will we coddle or tolerate dangerous wildcat doctrine spreaders who would destroy the form of Government which affords them protection. No longer can we let the word "liberalism" include that kind of free speech, and be the subterfuge for slander, degradation, and the destruction of America.

Those who proclaim their patriotism so loudly and so often have now the opportunity to demonstrate their love of country by putting their every effort into a concentrated drive against these poisonous groups. We are matching wits with the cleverest, most unscrupulous group of madmen history has ever known. There is no lie too vile, no means too low, no treachery too base, no crime too great, nor a wrong too grievous for these forces of hate to use in destroying us from within.

No longer can we carry on as just passive, silent, inactive, or perhaps just happy-go-lucky Americans. There are responsibilities facing us which we cannot shirk. If we are Americans and 100 percent for America, we will not want to shirk these responsibilities; rather, we will protect and pass on our heritage for generations to come. On the other hand, if we refuse our responsibility and prefer to live in an ultra-liberal state, letting this land of ours be known to all the world as the clearing house for all crack-pot ideas and the experimental ground for all oppressive doctrines, by reason of misuse and misinterpretation of free speech—let us say so.

It is not enough that we say we are opposed to the doctrine and philosophy of communism, nazi-ism, and fascism—we must resolve to do something about it. My resolution, if approved, would be a message to every nation that the United States of America is not a stooge Nation for destructive "fifth column" movements. Let them know, once and for all, that our domestic freedoms cannot be violated with impunity.

It would be nothing short of criminal to underestimate the gravity of the danger we are facing. The task before us is to awaken a love of country in each and every man, woman, and child in our land.

The moment demands an energetic application of all the fundamental precepts of Americanism. The responsibility of preserving and protecting our American ideals rests equally upon each of us. Our people must be rallied for united action against the forces that would destroy us.

It is by no means inevitable that we in America should suffer the treacherous betrayals that have occurred in other lands. The sleeping conscience of America must awaken, and, once awakened, must act. This is our common task, this is a job for every individual American.

In closing, let me say America must be made aware of the fundamental truth, that the condition upon which God has given liberty to man is eternal vigilance. Eternal vigilance is the price we must pay for liberty.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for many years during the summer months my family and I have had the honor of being vacation constituents of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY]. His district comprises the entire Green Mountain State. He serves it well.

It gave me keen pleasure to read in the Bennington (Vt.) Banner several days ago the following editorial which gives deserved recognition to my August Congressman, also June and July.

Congressman CHARLIE PLUMLEY getting degrees from three colleges looks to be receiving more than a proper share in the allotment but it may be remembered by some of the folks that Mr. PLUMLEY made a record as a college president before he made a still more notable record in Congress. Thirty years ago PLUMLEY had a job with a big rubber company out at Akron in its legal department and would undoubtedly have more money today if he had stayed in Akron and grown up with the country. He didn't do it. Norwich University, a little college in PLUMLEY's home town of Northfield, was in trouble and needed a new president to lift it out of an old rut, and invited PLUMLEY to come back home and see what he could do. He accepted the call, and in less than two decades, doubled the size and quadrupled the service of Norwich, built up its endowment to two millions. Then he resigned and was elected to Congress, where he has proved to be one of its most useful Members and ranks with the leaders. We suspect that Mr. PLUMLEY's degree from Boston University was earned fully as much by his service as a college president as by his career in Congress.

Harvard Report on W. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

HARVARD REPORT ON W. P. A.

Harvard University sends us a report on one of the most intensive studies ever made of W. P. A. If you want to know more about it than we have room to tell you here, order from your bookseller Applicants for Work Relief, by Dr. Elizabeth W. Gilboy (Harvard University Press).

Is W. P. A. a shovel-leaning gang of loafers?

The Harvard report says that the majority of persons applying for work relief are hard-working people who were well able to support themselves before depression unemployment set in and that most of them had put off seeking work relief until their little savings were gone. Many even went heavily into debt before seeking relief.

"The majority were responsible citizens who lost their jobs as a result of economic circumstances before which they were powerless," says the Harvard report.

Harvard did not set out to prove that W. P. A. was a good thing. Harvard sought facts. So before any of us resume throwing about loose criticism of W. P. A., maybe we had better read the book by a committee that knows what it is talking about.

Time Essential for Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's press carries a full-page advertisement, "Stop Hitler Now."

WISHFUL THINKING—GRIM REALITY

We yield first place to no man in grieving over the fact that we are unprepared and unable to do anything effective in turning the tide of battle over there.

We take second place to no man in our determination that American boys shall not be sent to their slaughter over there.

We are adamant in our determination to keep out of this thing until we are fit and to prevent further acts of war on the part of this administration, tending to drag us into a war for which we are utterly unprepared in both material and leadership and which could only end in disaster for us.
